HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

FIFTH SESSION OF THE TWENTY-FOURTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, APPOINTED TO MEET 5 AUGUST, 1886, IN THE FIFTIETH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

SIXTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1890.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 26th June, 1890.

ANGLESEY ASSIZES AND QUARTER SESSIONS BILL.—(No. 125.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

*LORD KENSINGTON: My Lords, I rise to ask your Lordships to give a Second Reading to this Bill, which has passed the other House of Parliament, and to explain in a very few sentences the object of the Bill. It is to repeal a very old Act of Edward VI. In consequence of the Act, great doubt seems to have arisen in the Island of Anglesey as to whether Quarter Sessions for that county can be held in any other place except the Town of Beaumaris. Beaumaris may have been a very convenient place at the time the Act was passed, in the reign of Edward VI., but as I am informed it is very inconvenient now. It is quite in a corner of the Island, there is no railway in connection with it, and all parties interested are unanimously in favour of getting the power which other places have of choosing the place where the Quarter Sessions shall be held. As I am informed, the Grand Jury have on more than one occasion made presentments to that effect; the County Council have unanimously passed a Resolution in favour of the repeal of the Act; and at Quarter Sessions, though there was a division of opinion, the majority was three to one—the figures being 12 to 4 in favour of the repeal of the Act. The promoters of the Bill, and those in that county who support it, ask for nothing more than to be put in the same position as other counties, namely, that they should be able to choose the place which is most convenient for holding those Courts. I beg to move the Second Reading of the Bill. As there is no detail in it at all, if your Lordships have no objection, I will move that it be referred to a Committee of the whole House.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

INFECTIOUS DISEASE (PREVENTION)

BILL.—(No. 117.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD LAMINGTON: My Lords, I beg to ask your Lordships to give your assent to the Second Reading of this Bill, which bears the distinction of having passed the other House of Parliament. It is practically a compilation of various clauses of other local Acts, such as the Newport, Grimsby, and Stockton Acts of 1889, and it has further been approved by the Select Committee on Police and Sanitary Regulations of the other House. Also there are certain provisions of this Bill which have been recommended by the Special Report of the Committee of 1887 to be compiled in one general measure. Following the precedent of the Infectious Diseases Notification Act of 1889, this Bill is proposed to be compulsory only for London, and in other parts of the country to be adopted at the will of the Urban or Rural Sanitary Authorities of districts. It may be considered a sequel or corollary of the Infectious Diseases Notification Act of last year, and it may be argued, from the way in which that Act has been received throughout the country, that there is every likelihood, if this measure be passed into law, that it will be equally well received. With regard to that Act, out of 25,000,000 people who could possibly be affected by it, it has already been put into operation in districts having a population of over 20,000,000 people. With reference to the particular clauses of the Bill, Clause 3 states that in London it will be compulsory, and in other places it will be adopted voluntarily by the Local Authorities. Clause 5 states that the Local Authority may disinfect houses at their own cost, and at the same time they are bound to give compensation for any damage they may do in disinfecting those houses. Clause 6 provides that anybody who fails to give notice to an incoming tenant of rooms where there has been a case of infectious disease within six weeks previously is liable to a fine, or else he must have a certificate from the medical authority that the room or rooms have been properly disinfected. Clauses 7 to 10 have to do with the removal and burial of the bodies of those who die of infectious diseases, and Clause 11 allows the Local Authority to make payments to any hospital where it is necessary to keep a person who is suffering from any infectious disease. Clause 13 is a provision of a somewhat similar nature, by which any Local Authority which has compelled any person or persons to quit a house owing to there having been infectious disease there, is to find them accommodation elsewhere. Clause 19 gives power to the Local Authorities when they have to put in force the provisions of this Bill if it becomes law to act upon any part or parts or the whole of the Act. I may say in support of the Bill that it has been with the Amendments approved in the other House, and it is generally approved of by the Central and Associated Chambers of Commerce, by those connected with the Board of Trade, and also that a great number of Petitions have been received both from individuals and from Corporate Bodies, and have been sent in to both Houses. I think I have said enough in support of the Bill, and I hope your Lordships will now give your favourable consideration to it, and allow it to be read a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(Lord Lamington.)

*THE PAYMASTER GENERAL (The Earl of Jersey): My Lords, after the clear statement of the object of this Bill which my noble Friend has just given it is not necessary for me to detain your Lordships. I need only say that the Bill has the concurrence of the Local Government Board, and though there are some small Amendments which will have to be inserted in it, they are not Amendments dealing with the principle of the Bill. This Bill enables all Local Authorities without special Acts to obtain the advantage of several clauses which are now generally inserted in local Acts of Parliament. As my noble Friend has mentioned, the Notification of Diseases Act is now in force among 20,000,000 of the people of this country.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Lord Balfour of Burleigh): My Lords, before the Second Reading of the Bill is assented to, I beg leave to give notice, on behalf of the Secretary for Scotland, to move in Committee an Amendment that this Bill should not apply to Scotland, there being already a law in operation there parallel with this measure, and having regard to its provisions, this Bill would cause confusion.

On Question agreed to; Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to the Standing Committee for General Bills.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING ACTS AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 122.)
COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to order).

Clause 3.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: My Lords, I have a very simple Amendment to move on Clause 3, the object of which is this: The Town Council of Glasgow are in another of their capacities Police Commissioners, and in a third capacity they are Gas Commissioners. Early in the year, under the belief that they were the Local Authority, in their capacity as Gas Commissioners, they made application for a Provisional Order, and proper notice was also given by them as the Local Authority in their capacity as Police Commissioners. The opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown has been given to the effect that they are the Local Authority, not as Police Commissioners, but as Town Council. If this Bill passed without amendment it would be necessary for a month's notice to be given before a Resolution can be passed giving sanction to themselves in another capacity to apply for a Provisional Order. As in their capacity as Police Commissioners they have already gone through the proper formalities and passed the Resolution, the object of this clause is to dispense with the necessity for the lapse of another month before the notice could be renewed. No undue advantage can be taken of it, because it only applies where all the formalities have been gone through.

Amendment moved,

In Clause 3, page 2, line 24, after the word "Act" to insert the words "And in the case of any application made before the passing of this Act by anybody constituted the Local Authority by or under this Act, the Board of Trade may entertain such application although the same has not been made in pursuance of a Resolution passed at a special meeting of the said Authority according to the provisions of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882.—(The Lord Balfour of Burleigh.)

LORD HERSCHELL: I should like to call the noble Lord's attention to one point, that is, where the Gas Commissioners are the Local Authority, this Bill would give them an absolute power to veto electric lighting in their district.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: The noble Lord will find a provision in the Schedule to this Bill in regard to that. I am not able to say off-hand to which particular burghs it will apply, but if there are any cases in which the Town Council as Police Commissioners or Gas Commissioners are made the Local Authority then as the Local Authority they would have, at any rate for a time, the power to veto electric lighting enterprise. But there is a power vested in the Board of Trade as regards Scottish burghs the same as that regarding England, that if upon due cause shown it is seen that acting as the Local Authority they are making opposition in order to place undue difficulties in the way of electric lighting enterprise, the Board of Trade may give an order to dispense with the consent of the Local Authority.

LORD HERSCHELL: But is it stated that that will apply to the cases which are covered by this Bill? Because I cannot help feeling that there is very great risk in leaving the determination of the question as to introducing electric lighting in the hands of the Gas Commissioners. One can well understand that where a Local Body are making very likely a considerable profit by the sale of gas they may be very much disposed to be slow themselves in taking up electric lighting, and not only that, but to stand very much in the way of those who are disposed to take it up, and so deprive those who have an interest in its being adopted, that is to say, the community, of the advantage of the electric lighting. I am afraid the progress of electric lighting in the past has been not a little impeded by the fact that the Local Authorities themselves have been purveyors of gas to the public. It seems to me a little strange to give the power of dealing in that way with electric lighting expressly to Gas Commissioners.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: No doubt there is some force in the criticism which has been made by the noble Lord, but there are two answers to it. In the first place I may state that I am informed, and I believe it to be the case, that the provision which I mentioned when I last spoke does apply, I think, in this case; but I will make absolutely certain of it before the Bill leaves the House. The second answer is that the criticism does not apply so much to Scotland as to England, because it is not so much the custom in Scotland for profit to be made out of either gas or water undertakings as I am informed it is in England. The price of gas is cut much more closely so to speak in Scotland, and if there is any surplus profit it is returned, I understand more promptly, in the shape of a reduction in price to the consumers than is the case in some municipalities South of the Tweed. There is, therefore, not the same temptations to the actions feared by the noble Lord.

On Question agreed to.

Report of Amendment to be received to-morrow.

CHOLERA IN SPAIN.

QUESTIONS—OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government whether it is the intention to impose quarantine on vessels arriving at ports in the United Kingdom from Valencia or other Spanish ports believed to be infected with cholera, said: My Lords, I presume the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the threat or presence, for I think I may almost use that term, of what appears to be cholera in some of the Southern ports of Spain, and I desire to ask whether they have taken the precaution to impose quarantine upon all vessels coming from any of those infected places, notably from Valencia. I should be very sorry to raise anything like a note of alarm upon the subject, but from the reports we have received, the matter seems to me to demand very serious consideration. The reports of this morning show that out of 190 cases 130 deaths have occurred, and, although the Spanish Authorities seem still to doubt whether the disease be cholera or not, I think that fact is sufficient to require that every precaution should be taken by those who are responsible against the introduction of any disease into this country. I find that for some time past quarantine has been imposed at Gibraltar upon vessels coming not only from Valencia, where the disease is so prevalent, but also from some other Spanish ports. There has recently been a report that similar cases have actually appeared in France, and I think in some of the Northern ports of Spain. Those being the facts as stated, I think I am justified in asking Her Majesty's Government whether they will take into their serious consideration the necessity of imposing quarantine upon all vessels coming from any of those infected ports, and whether any steps are about to be taken in the matter.

THE EARL OF JERSEY: I beg to inform my noble Friend, in reply to his question, that it is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to impose quarantine regulations upon vessels coming from Valencia and other Spanish ports or ports in the South of Europe. It is intended to pursue the system which was in force in 1885, when there was a serious outbreak of cholera in Southern Europe, and a large number of deaths, I think about 60,000, occurred in the course of two months, July and August. At that time regulations were passed by the Local Government Board by which, whenever a vessel arrived from any foreign countries, the Customs House Officer was enabled, before the vessel touched land, to make inquiries as to the state of health of the people on board, and if there was any suspicion of cholera or other infectious disease, to detain the vessel. Then the medical officer of the port would go on board and inspect the vessel and take all the necessary steps for the isolation or disinfection of the sick and other persons, as might be required. I need hardly assure the noble Lord that the Local Government Board will watch carefully the continuance of this outbreak, and I hope that it will not be so serious as is anticipated.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH: May I ask whether the Government have any information on the subject from those ports?

*THE EARL OF JERSEY: I cannot answer the question without notice, but I will inquire.

ARMY—PURCHASE AND REGISTRATION OF HORSES.

LORD WENLOCK: My Lords, in rising to call attention to the present system of buying and registering horses for the Army; and to move for a Return of the number of horses purchased for the Army during the last two years, showing the number obtained from the dealers and of those from the breeders direct, and the places where they were bought; and also the number of horses registered for the Army, I desire to say that I have placed this notice on the Paper, feeling that the subject is of great importance to the country, and one upon which information is much needed. It will be within your Lordships' recollection that three years ago my noble Friend, Lord Ribblesdale, whom I am glad to see in his place, brought forward the subject of horse-breeding in this country in a Debate in which he argued the question most thoroughly and with great ability, and the result of the discussion and of the stir which it created throughout the country generally, was that a Commission was appointed to encourage the breeding of horses in the country, a sum of money being placed at their disposal. That money was spent with the greatest benefit to the country, small though the sum was. When the Government took that step, in my humble judgment they should have gone further, and should have extended the system of buying horses for the Army, so as to place themselves in direct communication with the breeders, and thus give further encouragement to the breeding of horses. About the same time the Army Re-mount Committee was appointed, and I would ask my noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for War whether he has any information with regard to that Re-mount Committee. I should like to know how many Members there are on that Committee, what is its cost, what are their duties, and in what way they carry those duties out. As far as I can ascertain, this Committee sits in London, and is in no way in direct contact with the farmers of the country who are breeding horses. It is impossible for them to carry out such a system as I believe ought to be carried out in this country, a system by which they should be in close and immediate contact with those breeders who produce the supply. I venture to suggest that if my noble Friend could point out some way in which this Committee could be broken up from its centre in London, whence it conducts its operations, and could be scattered about through the country, such a system would be productive of a great deal of good. I believe this question has occupied the attention of those who have an interest in the subject for many years past. I find in the evidence given before the Royal Commission which sat upon this subject in 1873, Mr. East, whose intimate knowledge of it is well known to your Lordships, summarised his views in a manner which certainly commends itself to me, and I should like to call your Lordships' attention to them. The first of the three recommendations he put forward, was to the effect that we must obtain our troopers direct from the breeders, and he said that in that way we should acquire a knowledge of the resources of the country. Then he went on to say that the present prices are sufficient if only the breeders were dealt with directly, for the consequence of that would be that the prices would be raised to the breeder; that it is only owing to our present defective system of buying that we cannot properly find what is required, and that we should be still worse off in a time of emergency. This evidence, applicable as it was in 1873, is, I think, quite applicable to the present state of affairs. My Lords, I do not believe, as far as I can ascertain, that this Committee is in proper touch or communication, as it should be, with all breeders of horses in this country, and I should, therefore, like to see some such system established as this which was shadowed out by Mr. East as long ago as 1873. In the Debate which took place on the occasion I mentioned three years ago, the illustrious Duke who is Commander-in-Chief of the British Army made some remarks upon the subject; and I will call your Lordships' attention to one particular sentence which he then made use of—

"It is most essential, therefore, for all purposes that the breed of horses should be encouraged, for English horses are the best in the world, and more encouragement to the farmer would be beneficial, not only from a military point of view, but for the general public."

If I may venture to say so, I fully endorse all that the illustrious Duke said upon that occasion. I believe that if these gentlemen could be placed in direct communication with the breeders a great advantage would follow. I do not believe that the Committee is in proper communication with the breeders of horses, and I believe this more direct communication with the breeders would entail no increased expense on the country; on the contrary, I maintain that the extra sum which is now lost to the breeder, and which passes into the pocket of the middleman, would be saved, or better applied. I should like my noble Friend to tell me, if he can, what the advantage of the present system is over the old one. Under the old system the colonels of the regiments obtained re-mounts through dealers at prices varying from £40 for the light cavalry, and £42 for the heavy cavalry, to £45 for the artillery. In fact, the same system is carried out in this country of purchasing all horses through dealers. We have precisely the same system of purchase going on, plus the expense of this Re-mount Committee. That is a system which I believe to be very unsatisfactory. I desire to exclude from the scope of my observations upon that point the system which is carried out in Ireland. Colonel Drew, who is the only official connected with these matters in Ireland, I believe, does all he possibly can to place himself in direct communication with the breeders of horses there, but it is, of course, impossible for him to see them all, and, therefore, he has, to some extent, to trust to dealers. I should like to see the whole of the country parcelled out into districts, and official buyers appointed in those districts, who should be in every day communication with those persons who breed horses. The third point upon which I desire to ask my noble Friend for information is with regard to registration. Here I must confess I am in a difficulty, because I can get very little information upon the subject. The only things which I have been able to find out are the Returns which were published by my noble Friend Lord Harris, who has now gone to Bombay. In talking of the registration of horses, he mentioned the fact that 14,000 horses were registered at an expense to the country of 10s. for each animal; but, if my information is correct, by far the greater number of those horses so registered for the purpose of being taken up by the Government in case of a sudden emergency are in the hands of Tramway or Omnibus Companies. I am told that those companies simply receive the payment of 10s. a year, which would amount to say £50 in the case of a company owning 100 horses, but no price is specified to be paid by the Government for the animals, on taking them over, should occasion arise, and I can quite understand that if any sudden call had to be made upon those companies they would naturally say that, as giving up their horses would cause an entire suspension and disorganisation of their business, the Government must expect to have to pay a very large sum indeed for them. I do not know whether that is correct, but, perhaps, my noble Friend will enlighten me on the subject. Your Lordships, of course, can quite understand that big companies would not like to place themselves in that position, and I believe that if such a system as I have mentioned could be carried out it is quite possible for the various officials who would be acting in districts all over the country to register in their districts horses whose owners would be ready to give them up to the Government, at any time they might be required, for the sum of £40. In that case, at all events, we should not have to pay such very large sums as at present we possibly might have to pay to Tramway and Omnibus Companies, and the whole matter would be carried out much more economically, and upon a much more correct basis, because not only would the Government be able to place their hands upon those horses, at the price I have mentioned, £40, but they would be able, through their officials, to satisfy themselves of the condition of horse-breeding in this country, so that they would know upon what supply they could depend throughout the country. There is this great point to be considered: service-horses are not like wheat or potatoes that you can get them whenever you want them. It takes a long time to get a horse for service in this country, and, therefore, the country ought to look upon this matter in rather a different light to that in which ordinary subjects of commerce are regarded in reference to demand and supply. I hope, therefore, that my noble Friend will be able to satisfy your Lordships that some such system will be considered, and, if possible, set on foot, as I have ventured to point out. I am perfectly certain that if something of the kind is done it will impart greater energy to breeders throughout the country, and the subject of the purchase of service-horses will be placed in a much sounder position than I believe it to be at present.

THE EARL OF DUNDONALD: My Lords, I think the noble Lord who has introduced this subject has dealt with it rather from the breeders' and farmers' point of view. But there is also another point of view from which it may be regarded, that is the taxpayers', and I think the Government are perfectly justified in placing the hard-headed practical middleman between the purse of the nation and the pockets of the farmers. Many of your Lordships, no doubt, have tried to purchase horses on your own account, and I suppose are quite as capable of judging of the merits of a horse as the officials who would probably be appointed under the system which has been sketched out by the noble Lord; but I have no doubt you found that you were obliged to give up trying yourselves to purchase, and that you would do far better to employ a respectable dealer. If one can judge of the working of a scheme by its results, all I can say is that here the result has been most satisfactory. The horses now supplied to the cavalry are, at any rate, as good as they have ever been, and I believe if your Lordships could see some of the re-mounts which have been recently supplied to the cavalry regiments, you would say you had never seen a better looking lot of young horses. There is only one other point which I should like to touch upon in this connection, and that is, with regard to the purchase of foreign horses. I should like to ask the noble Earl to state, when he replies, whether the Government are purchasing re-mounts from abroad. If this is the case, I certainly think the Government are not acting properly in doing so, because that would not be carrying out the statement made by the Secretary of State for War, about a year ago in another place, that warlike material would be purchased as far as possible in this country, and I consider that the supply of re-mounts comes within the scope of that assurance. With regard to what has been said about the registration of horses, I hope we shall have a satisfactory reply from the noble Lord, but there is one circumstance which has come under my notice, and which, I think, your Lordships might like to hear. I have been told of cases in which masters of hounds have supported the system of registration in a most patriotic manner. One master of hounds, on being applied to, at once registered 20 horses, though there was not a single horse in his stable which had cost less than £150. Thus, in time of war, he would be obliged to give up to the Government, for £60 or £70, horses which had cost £150. I think, my Lords, this is true patriotism, and if the noble Lord grants this Return, I hope it may be found possible to state the names of those Masters of Hounds who have come forward so generously.

LORD BELPER : My Lords, before the noble Lord rises to answer the question he has been asked I should also like to ask him whether he can state the number of horses which are bought out of the Yeomanry. A year or two ago it was the custom to send down officers to look at the horses of the Yeomanry, and, of course, there should have been a good opportunity there for the Government to buy; but, I am sorry to say, that in the district with which I am principally concerned no horses were ever sold to the Government. Whether or not they offered a sufficient price, in some instances, I am not aware, but I know there are other conditions made which prevented horses otherwise perfectly fit being bought for Government purposes. I believe it was an invariable rule that no docked horse would be bought by the Government. Therefore, the question I should like to ask is, whether the Government now buy docked horses from dealers, though in former times their officials used always to refuse to buy such horses when shown them in Yeomanry Regiments. If any arrangement could be made for the purpose it would be a considerable assistance to Yeomen if they could find a sale for a horse at an ordinary price for Government purposes. As a matter of fact, that has not been the case, and they have been rather handicapped in that regard in comparison with the dealers, because I understand that horses which have been offered for sale in May or June in the Yeomanry Regiments would be refused. They would not be bought for the Government, because they were not old enough, and yet they would be bought from dealers three or four months later at whatever the price might be which was given for them. The Yeomanry have received no benefit from the system which has been initiated, and, as a matter of fact, the Yeomanry horses are not even now looked at. I should like to ask the noble Lord whether he can inform your Lordships how many horses have been bought out of the Yeomanry within the past few years.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (EARL BROWNLOW) : My Lords, I think it is necessary for me to say that it is of great value to the War Department to have free expressions of opinion from those who, like the noble Lord opposite who has asked for this Return, live in the horse-breeding counties of England, and who take a great interest in the breeding of horses, and the purpose for which horses are bred. Upon this important matter of re-mounts, the opinions which the noble Lords who have spoken have expressed, cannot but have considerable weight. The Return asked for by the noble Lord really, I may say, embraces two Returns, one on the subject of re-mounts, the other on the subject of the registration of horses. Those, of course, are very different subjects. With regard to the question of buying re-mounts for the cavalry, your Lordships will understand the horses required are young horses which can be trained for cavalry purposes. On the other hand, the horses required for registration are seasoned horses, already broken, which can be made available for cavalry purposes after a short training, or for purposes of draught immediately. Then as regards the machinery now at work, there is one purchaser who conducts the purchasing and registration in Ireland, and two purchasers who perform the same duties in Great Britain. All the horses purchased for remounts are seen by the Inspector-General, and are passed by him before they are sent out. I must remind the noble Lords who have spoken that it is impossible for the Department to give an unlimited power of purchasing horses; there are only a certain number required, and horses can only be bought as vacancies occur in the regiments. The total number allowed in the Estimates cannot be exceeded. To give the noble Lord the number of horses purchased in the last two financial years. I may state that in 1888 there were 1,427 horses purchased, and in 1889 the number was 1,734. The number purchased from breeders was small as compared with the number purchased from dealers; but in the latter year it considerably exceeded the number purchased from breeders in the former year, and also bore a larger proportion to the number purchased from dealers in former years. That gives us hope that the Committee of Remounts is not so entirely out of touch with the breeders, and that as the number of horses purchased from them in those two years has increased it may go on increasing, until the number so purchased is much greater than it is now. I will now pass to the question of the experiment that was tried for utilising the Yeomanry for the purpose of purchasing re-mounts. The numbers are these: in 1887 four regiments were visited and only four horses were bought; in 1888 the whole of the 39 regiments of Yeomanry were visited and only seven horses were taken; in 1889 there were 22 regiments which specially notified that horses were offered for sale, but of those only four were passed into the Service. My Lords, I am afraid when we take those figures and consider them they are not very encouraging. I am bound to tell the House that this experiment, though we have always tried to encourage the Yeomanry to come forward and sell their horses, has been an entire failure; and I am much afraid that it is no use to go on with it. I would further state that the price of this very small number of horses so bought was very large owing to the expenses of travelling in sending down officers to see them. Then my noble Friend said he would like to see permanent purchasers established in districts throughout different parts of England for the purpose of purchasing horses. That, no doubt, would be exceedingly expensive. But what has been done is this. I mention it, as I do not think it is generally known. The Adjutants and Permanent Staff of the Yeomanry have instructions to inform the Remount Department what horses there are in their districts which are fit for re-mounts. Then farmers having horses to sell have only to inform the Yeomanry Adjutant; that is reported; the owners are communicated with and purchasing officers are sent down to see them and to buy those found to be suitable for cavalry purposes. The process is very simple; a farmer having a horse to sell in any part of the country has only to go to the nearest Yeomanry Adjutant and fill up a form stating the size, age, colour and other matters with regard to the horse, and if the animal appears likely to be suitable for cavalry purposes an officer will be sent down. Then if the horse is found suitable he will be purchased. I do not think this arrangement is generally known among farmers; perhaps if it was they would take more advantage of it. Now, I will pass on to the other question of registration. As I said before, horses which are registered are required to be of a different stamp to those which are purchased for re-mounts. We want for registration horses fit for immediate use. A horse to be registered must be broken and ready to go to work at once. My noble Friend has asked whether those horses are not chiefly registered by Omnibus Companies and Tram Companies. A good many are registered by companies of that kind, and a good many are registered by Railway Companies, and people such as carriers and others who employ large numbers of horses register them. The result has been that there are 14,000 horses now registered. Of those 14,000, 3,241 are fit for riding, and 10,759 are fit for draught purposes. There is no reason to suppose that a great many more horses could not be put on the register if they were required. I may now state that my noble Friend is quite in error in supposing that no price is fixed for those horses if they are wanted. The price is carefully fixed from year to year, and the animals themselves are most carefully inspected by the Re-mount Department. My Lords, I cannot leave this subject without saying that I feel that the thanks of the War Department and of the country are due to those Masters of Hounds who have come forward in a most liberal and patriotic spirit and recognised the fact that the greatest, perhaps, of our national sports ought, in time of emergency, to give assistance in supplying the wants of the National Army, and have placed in the most patriotic manner their hunt horses at the disposal of the Government by registration. The noble Lord did not move for a Return, I think, when he was speaking, but I suppose he wishes for the return he has stated on the Notice Paper. I can only say that Her Majesty's Government will be happy to lay the Return he wishes for upon the Table of the House, and there I hope he will find all the information he requires.

THE EARL OF CORK: My Lords, I am very glad my noble Friend has called the attention of the House to this question, and I must say I hardly think the reply which has been given by the Under Secretary for War is satisfactory. The noble Lord has evidently tried to shift the blame from the shoulders of the Yeomanry to the shoulders of the Inspecting Officers sent down to examine by Her Majesty's Government. In the County of Somerset I know that when the Inspecting Officer came down to inspect horses a good many were shown him; but immediately one was brought out with a docked tail it was sent back into the ranks, and the owner was told that it was quite useless. Any noble Lord in the House who has had experience of the Yeomanry must be convinced of the vast improvement that has taken place in the quality of their mounts; and I must say that in the Counties of Somerset and Wilts a good mount, such as would be ridden by a farmer there, would certainly realise a far larger sum than £40, which is all, I believe, that Her Majesty's Government are prepared to give. There are some very good horses in the hands of the farmers. Therefore, I think the Government can hardly expect to get good re-mounts from Yeomanry regiments, unless they are prepared to give a better price. I will go further, and say also that the present method of buying horses for the Army is not a very great improvement on the old system. You still have to go to the dealers. The dealer is a man who knows what a horse is, and he can deal with a farmer in a way which no gentleman can possibly adopt. He understands the art of dealing with the farmers. We must also remember that in purchasing for the Army the dealer has this advantage. He has to buy not only one horse but two or three from the same owner, and therefore he very often gets a horse at a moderate price by taking three or four other horses at the same time. I know that is frequently the case, and in Ireland particularly, where dealers who have purchased several horses together often get a horse fit for the Army at a better price on that account. Therefore, I think the present system is merely a variation of the old method. Instead of the Colonel of a regiment dealing direct with a dealer, one officer in Ireland called a purchaser, and two in England, are really doing the very same thing as was done in former days. Then in regard to the registration of horses. I know a good many people who think it is a capital thing to get 10s. a year for registering a horse. It is a nice sum for a job-master or omnibus proprietor who is owner of, say, a 100 horses, to get—in that case there would be £50 a year for him. But no price is fixed for them, so that when the time comes when those horses will be required what a very awkward position the Government will find themselves in!

EARL BROWNLOW: I beg the noble Lord's pardon; the price is fixed most carefully.

THE EARL OF CORK: I apologise to my noble Friend as that is the case. I quite agree with what the noble Lord has said as to the gallant way in which Masters of Hounds have behaved in the matter; but I think at the same time it is a very expensive way of doing this, that is to say paying 10s. a year. Where there is a price given those very horses will be brought forward and placed at the Government service, though no such price may have been put upon them on former occasions. I am very glad this question has been brought forward, and I am sure the whole country takes great interest in it. The breeding of horses has vastly improved in this country, and a far better horse is now being produced than was the case some years ago. I only hope that even more encouragement will be given in future to the breeding of horses than has been given in recent years, and I think that the sum placed in the hands of the Commissioners for this purpose ought to be increased. I think more good could be done if a larger sum were given.

A noble LORD: My Lords, I can fully bear out that the horses in Yeomanry regiments were always sent back if the horses were docked. I think it would be beneficial if we could have some assurance from the noble Lord as to whether, in future, docked horses would be taken for Cavalry re-mounts. I think such an intimation would be satisfactory to all of us.

EARL BROWNLOW: I cannot give a reply to that off-hand; but I shall be happy to make inquiries and answer it, if possible, in due time.

LORD HARLECH: As an old Cavalry officer I must express my opinion that it is a very great mistake ever to buy a horse for the Cavalry with a docked tail. Our cavalry may be required to go at any time to a hot climate, and a horse with a docked tail is only half a horse. The want of a tail causes more suffering to the animals than can be conceived, from the inability to brush away flies, and it ought, I think, to be thoroughly well-known throughout the country that the cavalry do not admit docked tails. If that were known there would be no efforts made to pass horses of that kind into the cavalry. Owners of such horses would know what was before them, and if they aspired to breed horses for the cavalry they would not dock them.

LORD WENLOCK: My Lords, with the indulgence of the House I will now move formally for the Return mentioned in the notice. With regard to the remarks made by my noble Friend, it seems there is great difficulty placed in the way of farmers selling their horses to Government. I can quite understand that the expense of officers going down from London would be very great if the War Office are going to get the Yeomanry Adjutants, say in Northumberland, to inform the Department in London of the number of horses in their district. With regard to docked horses, I may state that Colonel Drew told me that in Ireland at the horse fairs he had found himself in competition with the Dutch Government, who had no hesitation in buying docked horses, while he lost a good many valuable horses simply because they were docked. And not only did the Dutch Government buy docked horses, but they at once docked all the undocked horses they bought. I do not know that my noble Friend, Lord Harlech, is right with regard to our cavalry horses being sent to hot climates. When the cavalry are sent to Egypt they have Egyptian horses, and in India they have Indian horses assigned to them. Therefore, I think it is possible to buy docked horses and show better results than we are getting now. I will not detain your Lordships with any further remarks in regard to our present system of buying and registering horses for the Army.

Moved,

"That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty for a Return of the number of horses purchased for the Army during the last two years, showing the number obtained from the dealers, and of those from the breeders direct, and the places where they were bought; and also the number of horses registered for the Army."—(The Lord Wenlock.)

On Question, agreed to.

POSTAL CARDS.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD LAMINGTON: I beg to ask Her Majesty's Government whether they can say whether the Departmental Committee of the Post Office have yet arrived at any decision as to the use of adhesive halfpenny stamps for the transmission of cards through the post?

THE EARL OF JERSEY: I am sorry I cannot give the noble Lord such a definite answer to his question as he would wish. There have been other questions besides that referred to in the Notice Paper which were laid before the Departmental Committee. The recommendations made by that Committee are before the Postmaster General, who has not yet come to a decision upon them. Therefore, I can only inform the noble Lord that the question is still under consideration.

ORCHARDS RATING EXEMPTION BILL.
(No. 149.)

Brought from the Commons; Read 1st, and to be printed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

LONDON OVERHEAD WIRES BILL—
(by Order.)

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill, as amended, be now considered."

(3.5.) SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE
(Kensington, N.): I rise to move, as an Amendment, that the Bill be considered upon this day six months. I admit, at once, the inconvenience of moving the rejection of a Bill at this stage, and, therefore, it is necessary that I should explain at once why many metropolitan

Members regard it as their bounden duty, notwithstanding that the measure has received the approval of a Select Committee, to offer to it an uncompromising resistance. It is one of the penalties which arise from the devolution of Private Bills to Select Committees, that on certain occasions it becomes necessary to raise a discussion in regard to them in the House itself.

(3.7.) SIR W. PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.), speaking from the Front Opposition Bench below the Gangway: I rise to a point of order. I wish to draw your attention, Sir, to the inconvenience of having the floor of the House occupied by a new contrivance connected with the presentation of Petitions, which renders it impossible for Members sitting here to see or hear what is taking place. [The hon. Gentleman alluded to the fact that the centre of the floor of the House from the Bar to the Table was occupied by a series of wooden boxes of a cylindrical form, containing a Petition awaiting presentation in favour of the Local Taxation Bill.]

*(3.8.) MR. SPEAKER: I had no idea that the Petition would have assumed such large proportions. I have already given directions that immediately after the Private Business shall have been disposed of, the Petition shall be removed. The House will see that the framework adds largely to the proportion of the Petition.

(3.9.) SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: Before I was interrupted I was placing before the House the conditions which render it the bounden duty of the metropolitan Members to offer strenuous resistance to this Bill, even at this late stage. We had hoped that the Select Committee would have safeguarded the rights of the residents of the Metropolis against the undue intrusion of officials upon what has always been regarded as private property. This Bill confers upon the officials of the London County Council powers of compulsorily interfering with the rights of private individuals such as, I venture to say, have never before been authorised by this House except under the gravest and most special circumstances. They are powers which may probably have been given by a warrant, but a warrant can only be issued in circumstances of a very special character. No doubt an interference with the rights of private property for private objects can be made by a special Act of Parliament, passed pro hac vice for a particular purpose. This Bill proposes to give for all time to come to the officials of the London County Council power compulsorily to enter upon private premises, in order to put up and to extend overhead wires, not only upon one occasion and for one purpose, but for all eternity. I believe that such extraordinary powers have never yet been asked for in a Bill of this kind, and I trust that the House of Commons will never consent to grant such powers to any bureaucracy or any official person whatsoever. I hope that no attempt will be made, on either side of the House, to make this a Party question, or in any way to regard the Motion which I now respectfully submit as in any way tending to an expression of distrust in the London County Council. I am one of those who have the fullest faith in the future of the County Councils of this Kingdom, and certainly in the future of the London County Council, and in the wisdom and discretion which will be shown by that important body which this House has clothed, and rightly clothed, I think, with full Local Authority in the Metropolis. At the same time, I am bound to admit that the existing London County Council may possibly have laid itself open in some measure to a charge of interfering with matters which hardly, at this time, or at this stage of its existence, come rightly within its purview. I regard it, however, as youthful arrogance on the part of the London County Council, and I entertain the hope that future Councils will learn wisdom by experience, and will avoid the errors which the present Council has committed, mainly by reason of its youthfulness and inexperience. I wish it to be thoroughly understood that the metropolitan Members, in resisting this Bill, are acting in no sense in opposition to, or from distrust of, the London County Council. We object to any officials, whether they are connected with the London County Council or any other authority, having conferred upon them for all time the inquisitorial powers which are proposed to be conferred by this Bill. It may be alleged by those who are promoting the Bill that some means must be found for enabling the necessary communications for telephonic wires to be made ; but I think it is wise for those who are promoting schemes of this nature to submit to the House some proposal against which the same objections will not apply, and which will not interfere, in the same way, with private rights. One of the reasons why the Bill was not opposed in its earlier stages was that it came before the House simply as a Subway Bill, which proposed to carry telephonic and other wires through the congested thoroughfares of the Metropolis by means of subways. I admit that this would have involved a larger outlay, but it would have been more consistent with the convenience of the residents of the Metropolis. I confess that, personally, I had no idea when I heard of a Subway Bill that there was any intention of empowering the officials of the London County Council to come into all our houses and put up these wires. That, I think, is the main reason why the progress of the Bill was not opposed in its earlier stages ; and if it were still proposed to deal with these wires by means of subways our objections to the measure might be overcome. The Bill has now assumed a very different form, and many important Local Bodies in the Metropolis have signified the strongest objection to its provisions in its present form. I speak here as the representative of my own Vestry—the Vestry of St. Mary Abbots, Kensington, and it will be within the knowledge of many Members of the House that a considerable number of the other Local Authorities in the Metropolis have pronounced a similar opinion—even such important bodies as the Benchers of the Inner and Middle Temple. Therefore, I venture to submit that although it is a somewhat late period at which to bring forward objections, yet, considering that the measure was introduced under another name, and under a guise in which its real purpose could not be suspected, I have no alternative but to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

*(3.20.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to second the proposal of my hon. Friend, that the Bill be read a second time on this day six months. It does seem to me a somewhat startling thing that, under the name of a Subway Bill, we should be asked to pass a measure which is to enable the Local Authorities in London to enter the house of every inhabitant.

(3.21.) SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin County, S.) speaking from the lower end of the Front Opposition Bench below the Gangway: May I ask, Sir, as a matter of order, that you would direct the removal of the obstruction which is now blocking up the floor of the House? All I can say is that we on this side do not know who the hon. Member is who is addressing the House.

*MR. SPEAKER: I have already answered the question in regard to this Petition. I am sorry that hon. Members are suffering inconvenience, but I hope that they will put up with the inconvenience for a few minutes longer. It shall be removed as soon as the Private Business is disposed of.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Will the hon. Member stand on one of these things (pointing to the wooden cylinders containing the Petition)?

*MR. BARTLEY (removing from his place on the floor of the House to a seat behind the Ministerial Bench) continued his speech: I am afraid—he said—that the houses of the Metropolis will be similarly inconvenienced and obstructed when they are covered with these telephone poles. I had the honour on one occasion of having one of them put upon my house, and, therefore, I know what they are. This Bill proposes to enable the authorities to erect a telephone pole whether the owner or occupier likes it or not. It is the beginning of a very singular state of legislation for the Metropolis, and what will be the result when electric lighting becomes general, is, I think, a matter for very serious consideration. Whether the owner or occupier is a consenting party or not it is proposed that the Local Authority shall have power compulsorily to put up these poles and wires. Clause 11 of the Bill contains a most extraordinary provision. It authorises the erection of poles and wires against the will of the occupier, but at the end of the lease the owner may require them to be taken down. There is even a worse provision in the Bill, empowering the County Council or the Local Authority to enter a man's house at any hour in order to superintend these overhead wires.

*MR. H. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): To inspect them.

*MR. BARTLEY: The hon. Member does not say what the inspection is to be. If he does not know, my own personal experience will enable me to tell him. At any hour, whether the occupier is ill or well, whether his wife is ill or well, or whether anything is happening in the House, the officers of the County Council are to have the right to send workmen into the House, cause them to go upstairs, make use of his private apartments, get upon the roof, and walk about the slates. I had, on one occasion, a very long pole placed on the top of my house, and I found that at all hours, and pretty nearly on every day of the week, work people were engaged in superintending it, or inspecting, or whatever the hon. Member opposite likes to call it. In fact, workmen were walking up and down my stairs every hour of the day. The only reason that can be urged for accepting the Bill, is that it has already been passed by a Select Committee. As a general rule, that is a valid reason for accepting a Private Bill, but on this occasion, I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for North Kensington (Sir Roper Lethbridge), that there are substantial grounds why that reason should not be allowed to apply. The measure was brought in as a Subway Bill, and, in my opinion, it is only by means of subways we can get rid of the nuisance that is created by the extension of these wires through the streets of the Metropolis. If it is necessary to take houses for the erection of telephone wires, they ought to be purchased in the ordinary way. It may be said that there already exists a means of providing compensation, but the compensation is most inadequate, and fails to meet the necessities of the case. The ordinary payment for a pole is a guinea a year, but a payment of 2 guineas, or 5 or 10, would be no consideration compared with the nuisance inflicted upon the occupier of a house by these private trading companies having the right of entering his premises. I venture to think that the House were to a certain extent deluded when they allowed the Bill to be read a second time. It would never have been read a second time if it had stood as it does at present. I sincerely trust that the House will throw out the measure.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Sir Roper Lethbridge.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*(3.25.) MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): I wish to raise a point of order. The business of the House is seriously impeded by the cylindrical wheels which are now blocking up the floor of the House. They are most inconvenient, and I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, whether they ought not to be removed.

*MR. SPEAKER: The Private Business is lasting a longer time than I anticipated it would. I have already stated that it is obviously inconvenient that the Petition should be allowed to remain on the floor of the House; and will ask the officers of the House to have it removed at once.

MR. MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): Has any one examined the contents, or will it be open to any hon. Member to do so?

*MR. SPEAKER: The contents will be examined by the Committee on Public Petitions. [The Petition was then rolled out in detachments, by the officers of the House.]

*(3.28.) SIR J. BAILEY (Hereford): It was my fortune to act as Chairman of the Committee, but although the Committee are in no way responsible for the title of the Bill when it was first brought into the House, I think it is fair to say that there was nothing in the title which was intended to deceive. Originally it was a Bill to enable the County Council of London to make subways through the Metropolis, and to possess certain powers over overhead wires. The power to make subways was met with strenuous opposition from every vestry in the Metropolis, and that power was consequently cut out of the Bill before it came to the Committee. The hon. Member who spoke for the Kensington Vestry, ought, I think, to know that the Committee did not accept the Bill in the shape in which it first came before them, giving the London County Council power over the streets of the entire Metropolis. It struck that provision out of the measure, making the County Council responsible only for the framing of by-laws, and giving to the Vestries and Local Boards the duty of looking after and controlling overhead wires. The Bill, in its present shape, proposes to carry out the Report of the Select Committee which sat in the year 1885, and, with the permission of the House, I will read a few words from that Report to show what the opinion of that Committee was. The Committee say that the risk of danger to the public from overhead wires had been greatly exaggerated, but they were of opinion that the probable development of the telephonic system made it desirable that there should be some change in the law relating to the control over wires, with a view to their better supervision. Dealing with telephonic wires, they say, at the end of their Report, that they were of opinion that, under proper regulations, permission should be given to pass wires over property without the owners having the right of prohibition; but that the facilities afforded should confer no vested interest. With regard to "attachment," that can only now be made with the consent of the occupier and owner; but powers are proposed to be conferred in certain cases where it is impossible to obtain access to premises for the purpose of connecting them with a general telephonic system, owing to the refusal of an individual to permit the attachment. The Committee say that they are of opinion that in special cases where it is proved to the satisfaction of the Local Authorities, on investigation, that particular individuals or districts are deprived of the public convenience of telephonic communication owing to such refusal, the Local Authority shall be authorised to give permission to attach wires to premises, under suitable regulations, and on the payment of such compensation as the Local Authority may deem just. This Bill simply carries out the recommendations of the Select Committee. The Committee upstairs have most carefully considered and safeguarded the interests of all the householders in London, and the fears which have been expressed by two of the metropolitan Representatives appear to me to be absolutely without foundation. It is said that the Bill will empower the Council's officers by day or night to enter into private houses. Now, one of the great dangers of the overhead wires is that there are in London a great number of derelict wires, which have been used in former times, but are now abandoned, and, therefore, it is most necessary that workmen should be appointed by the Local Authorities to deal with them, as it is obviously ridiculous to expect an Inspector to inspect them through a telescope. Clause 8 of the Bill provides that the Inspector of the Council may enter a private house provided he is in uniform, and is duly authorised in writing by the Local Authority, and provided that notice shall have been previously given. The Inspector may then enter at some reasonable time to be named by the occupier. The rights of householders being thus most stringently guarded, I hope the Bill will be now considered.

*(3.40.) MR. H. LAWSON: As one of the Members in charge of the Bill, perhaps I may be allowed to say a few words. The hon. Member who has moved the rejection has availed himself of the opportunity to attack the London County Council, and I think that fact affords an explanation of the motives by which those who are opposing the measure are actuated.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: I especially disclaimed any such intention.

*MR. H. LAWSON: The House will be able to judge for itself whether I am right or not. These attacks are becoming a little stale, and they show the jealous hostility of some Metropolitan Members to the body which has succeeded the Metropolitan Board of Works, for which they retain a lingering affection. The London County Council has had very little to do with the drafting of the Bill. The question is one of public safety and convenience. As the Chairman of the Committee has already told the House, it mainly carries out the recommendations of the Committee presided over by Mr. George Russell, who sat in 1885, and contained three metropolitan representatives, as well as Sir J. McGarel Hogg, the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works. I believe that now, as well as then, the House is agreed upon facilitating the development of the telephone system. The hon. Member for Kensington has painted an alarming picture of the officers of the Council entering houses at any hour of the day or night; putting sick persons to inconvenience, and annoying the inhabitants. But if there are to be telephone wires it is absolutely essential that they should be inspected.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: Place them in subways.

*MR. H. LAWSON: It is absolutely impossible to force the telephone wires into subways everywhere, first, because out of 1,200 miles of metropolitan streets and roads there are only $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles of subway; secondly, because of the difficulty of putting high and low tension wires together. Moreover, the by-laws of the County Council will have to be approved by the Board of Trade and enforced by the District Authorities. The title of the Bill has not been changed, as some hon. Members suggest. The original title was "London Subways and Overhead Wires Bill," and the word "subways" has been dropped because that subject no longer has a place in the Bill. There could be no better arrangement than that the overhead wires should be placed under the Central Authority for London, acting through the various District Authorities. The objection to Clause 11, which gives power to attach wires upon private property, is frivolous, as it will only be exercised where an unreasonable objection is taken by the owner or occupier subject to arbitration.

*(3.45.) MR. DIXON - HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge): The Member for Hereford stated that the Committee was entirely composed of householders, but he did not state that any one of them had ever given permission for a pole to be placed upon his house. I should like to mention my own experience in regard to telephone wires. Unfortunately, I gave a telephone company permission to put a wire over my house, and from that time the House was never my own. The Inspectors were always in and out, my stair carpets were worn out, and my silver had to be constantly locked up for fear it should be stolen. The pole, moreover, was fixed so badly that considerable damage was done to the roof of the house, by the action of the wind upon the pole. The company declined to repair the damage, and it cost me £50 to put the roof in order, when I applied for the removal of the pole. To that inconvenience every person will be subjected who has wires fixed to his house, and I protest against its being done, whether an owner or occupier objects to its being done or not. The question is not altogether one of erecting telephone wires, but of electric lighting wires, with the erection of which we are threatened all over London, and which is a very much more serious matter. We are now in the infancy of the system, and yet we have already realised that these wires greatly increase the risk of fire, a proof of which is that the insurance offices have raised the rates for property to which electric lighting wires have been fixed. In other countries, Sweden and America particularly, where such wires have been brought into requisition, the companies are compelled to have stations in various parts of the town or city from which the wires are run, and as this is a matter promoted by a company for private interests I think the promoters should be compelled to purchase fairly the rights they require, or demand, for carrying out their undertaking. It would be most arbitrary and unjust that they should have the power to interfere with the rights and convenience of the public without any consideration, and I hope the House will reject this ill-digested scheme. I think it would be altogether revolutionary to do away with the idea that an Englishman's house is his castle, and to authorise officers of the County Council to enter a man's premises, whether he likes it or not.

(4.50.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I wish to point out that if this Bill passes an entirely new departure in legislation will be made, for under whatever authority the Bill is applied it will give an arbitrary power of interference with property, whether the owner objects or not, and without compensation. Every occupier or owner ought to have the right to object to anything being done to his property, reasonable or unreasonable, subject only to this—that if the objection taken is against the general good he must give up his right on fair compensation. But the Bill provides no such condition as this, and by Clause 2 a man may have his property interfered with without his consent, and those interfering with him may even claim to judge whether his objection is reasonable or not. Is the House going, for the first time in the history of English legislation, to say that an occupier is not to be an occupier to the full extent which he believed he was when he entered into his property? The objections to the Bill are serious, and I trust it will be rejected.

(3.53.) SIR H. SELWIN-IBBETSON (Essex, Epping): There is yet another objection to be urged against the Bill. Since the introduction of the electric lighting system in recent times the number of attempts to enter private houses under false pretences by persons describing themselves as Inspectors has enormously increased, and I fear the Bill will enhance the danger. There will be constant applications from persons describing themselves as Inspectors, who will enter your houses, and do very much what they like with your property. In my own case applications of this kind have been made, but the Cerberus in charge of the premises was a little sharper than is usually the case, and the applicants were not admitted. One wanted to look at the gas, and another to inspect the electric lighting, which did not exist.

*(3.53.) MR. H. GLADSTONE (Leeds, W.): I think that the remarks made by the right hon. Gentleman as well as the speech of the hon. Member for the Uxbridge Division are in favour of the Bill, which proposes to set up a proper system of supervision in regard to overhead wires. The Committee very carefully considered all the clauses of the Bill, they were unanimous upon the matter, and they have safeguarded the interests of private householders. To those hon. Members who say that we are giving new powers to the County Council, if they will refer to the Bill they will see that the Board of Trade will have a controlling voice in the by-laws to be administered by the County Council. The hon. Member for Northampton spoke of a new departure. That may be so in one sense, but the system of putting up overhead wires has been increasing of late years by leaps and bounds.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I did not say that it was a new departure in reference to overhead wires, but that it was a new departure in legislation as to the mode of dealing with a person's property without compensation.

VOL. CCCXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. H. GLADSTONE: It is for the House to say whether this is not necessarily a new departure in order to meet a new condition of things. In cases where the public convenience is concerned the Legislature has already interfered with private rights, as, for example, in the painting and cleansing of houses, and in other respects, on behalf of general convenience. I hold that public interest and necessity justifies this Bill, and I sincerely hope that the House will reject the Amendment.

MR. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): It is too much the habit of certain hon. Members to say when we desire to look into a measure promoted by the London County Council fairly and equitably, that we are attacking that Council. The County Council must not imagine that its measures are to be exempt from the criticism which Parliament exercises in all other Bills promoted by other bodies. Now, no one can, I imagine, object to the clause which deals with derelict wires. This Bill is not a permissive but a compulsory measure. It gives powers to the authorities to say to the householder you shall have posts or polls placed on your house whether you like it or not; and, further, you shall have the wires that run through your premises inspected from time to time. No doubt this power is to be exercised under certain restrictions, but none the less it is a completely new departure, and one to be carefully watched. A Londoner does not wish his house to be considered his castle, but at any rate his home. But it is said that the men who are to inspect these wires are to produce duly signed credentials, and wear the uniform of the County Council (whatever that may be). Even that privilege does not seem an attractive one to the householder. This is no attack on the County Council. Did we wish to attack that body the heavy increase in the rating under its régime would offer a more vulnerable point of attack than its action in the various and varied measures it has introduced to the notice of this House. This Bill is one which confers extraordinary powers upon the Council, and I oppose it as a new and great departure.

*(4.3.) SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): I hope that the opposition to this Bill is not an attack on the London County Council, but an endeavour to regulate overhead wires. The opponents of the Bill, however, attack solely two of its clauses, and it would surely be unreasonable to throw out the whole Bill on account of two clauses. As regards Clause 11, the hon. Member for Northampton says that the authority seeking the right to put up a pole is itself to determine whether a refusal was unreasonable. That is not so; the London County Council are not owners of overhead wires, and have no interest except that of the public. Then, as regards Clause 8, it is objected that the officers of the London County Council ought not to have any right of entry; but if the duty of inspection is imposed on them they must have some right of entry. The Bill has been characterised by the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Dixon-Hartland) as an ill-digested measure, but it is a Bill which has been recommended by two Committees of this House, and I hope the House will support the Committee.

(4.6.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I am afraid that I shall be under the painful necessity of having to go into the opposite Lobby to my hon. Colleague. There is a good deal of force in what he has said, but I consider that all London matters should be handed over to the London Council. I want to wash my hands entirely of all London matters as far as this House is concerned. This is a question which concerns the ratepayers of this Metropolis, and it is for the County Council to settle it.

(4.7.) MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): I should be very sorry to see everything connected with the Metropolis left to the uncontrolled discretion of the County Council. This Bill has been considered by a Committee of this House, and no one could have listened to the speech of the hon. Baronet who presided over that Committee without feeling impressed with the care that has been given to the subject. I hope, therefore, that the House will not reject, in this summary manner, what has been agreed to by the Committee. Another reason why we should reject this Amendment is that the strongest objection against the Bill has been brought by the hon. Member for Northampton, who objects to one clause of it only. But even if that clause were struck out, there is much that is valuable left in the Bill, to which no substantial objection can be taken. The Bill deals with the natural state of facts, namely, that there are a great number of overhead wires in London which form a source of danger and inconvenience to the inhabitants of the Metropolis, and it is most desirable that some authority should look after the wires. I venture to submit that Clause 8, which has been objected to, is a very reasonable way of dealing with the question of wires already in existence, attached to houses by the permission of the owners and occupiers.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND: I have not the slightest objection to the provisions dealing with the case where the owner gives permission; what I object to is the provision that poles may be erected whether the owner likes it or not.

MR. COURTNEY: What the hon. Member objects to is the subsequent clause, which raises a separate issue, and should be disposed of by itself. I contend that the Bill is a very valuable provision for looking after a danger which everybody knows exists. I admit that the power to put up a pole against the will of the owner of the house is a considerable step in advance, but I hope the House will not reject the Bill on account of this one item.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: That power forms the essence of the Bill; or if it is not the essence it is quite as important as all the other provisions.

MR. COURTNEY: I submit that this is not so at all. With respect to that point, which forms the subject of a separate clause, I think it is essential that there should be some authority able to say whether these poles should be set up. The authority appointed by the Bill is the County Council, which has no private interest in the matter, and would only act as the guardian of the public interests. They can give notice to a person who, in their opinion, offers unreasonable objections, and if he continues to assert his objections the matter would be referred to an arbitrator appointed by the Board of Trade. Those who are so devoted to the rights of property as to want special leave for the erection of every pole, can, if they choose, move that this clause should be rejected; but it is an entirely different thing to oppose a Bill which is admittedly a useful measure.

(4.14.) GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith): The suggestion made by the Chairman of Ways and Means was conveyed to the promoters of the Bill, and personally I offered to withdraw my objections to the measure if it were accepted. The promoters, however, intimated that they were not in a position to accept it. We are not talking so much of keeping our houses as our castles as of preserving them as our homes.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Consideration, as amended, put off for three months.

P E T I T I O N .

THE LOCAL TAXATION (CUSTOMS AND EXCISE) DUTIES BILL.

MR. WHARTON (York, W.R., Ripon): I beg to present a Petition, signed by 600,000 inhabitants of Great Britain and Ireland, praying this House to pass the provisions of the Local Taxation Bill. I beg to apologise to you, Sir, and the House, for any inconvenience that may have been caused to Members by the presence of a Petition of this magnitude.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): Should I be in order, Sir, in moving that the Petition be now read by the clerk at the Table?

*MR. SPEAKER: I do not think it would be in order for the hon. Baronet to make such a Motion. It can be done if the hon. Member who presented the Petition desires it.

Q U E S T I O N S .

IRELAND—ASSAULT ON A CATHOLIC AT COOTEHILL.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the case of three men, supposed to belong to the Orange Society, who were, on the 14th instant, at Petty Sessions at Cootehill, convicted of a serious assault upon a Catholic, whom they met alone, and which it was proved was committed for no reason whatever except his religion, and without his having given any provocation; whether he is aware that the prisoners were let off with a fine; and under what head this occurrence will be mentioned in the Returns of outrages in Ireland?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The facts appear to be substantially as stated in the first paragraph. The case was one of common assault dealt with summarily by Magistrates, and will not, therefore, appear in the Return of outrages.

*MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, W.): Has the right hon. Gentleman any reason for believing these men belonged to the Orange Society?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not made inquiries on that point.

*MR. JOHNSTON: It is another slander.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

BOYCOTTING BY ORANGEMEN.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received any information regarding a meeting held by the Orangemen of Killeshandra on the 12th instant, which was called to consider the conduct of one of the "brethren," who had hired a car from Mr. Brady, a Nationalist; whether any of the Orangemen of the district have been "shadowed," on the ground that they are conspiring to prevent one of their body from doing that which he has a legal right to do; and whether Mr. Brady's name will appear in the Return of persons boycotted in Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no certain information, but I understand that the meeting referred to was called to make preparations for the approaching July anniversary. It has not come to the knowledge of the police that any of the transactions at that meeting were illegal. None of the Orangemen in the district have been "shadowed," as the necessity for the adoption of such a course does not at present exist. So far as the police can ascertain, there is no ground for including Mr. Brady's name in the Return of persons boycotted.

THE COMMISSION OF THE PEACE IN DUBLIN.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state the Petty Sessions district in which Mr. Thomas W. Russell, who was some since appointed to the Commission of the Peace for the County of Dublin, has elected to serve; whether Mr. Russell has any connection by property or otherwise with the Petty Sessions district in which he has elected to serve, or with any other part of the County of Dublin; and if Mr. Russell is not connected by property or otherwise with the County of Dublin, why he was appointed to the Commission of the Peace for that particular part of Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that the hon. Member to whom this question refers was appointed to the Commission of the Peace for the County of Dublin in the ordinary course on the recommendation of Lord Monck, the Lieutenant of the county, as a fit and proper person to be a Magistrate, and be elected to sit at the Rathfarnham Petty Sessions. His property and residence are situated in the City of Dublin, and Rathfarnham is a suburb of Dublin, and adjoins the metropolitan district.

MR. CLANCY: Are we to understand that this gentleman has no connection with the County of Dublin?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is the connection that I have stated.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): Do the Government intend to follow in future the precedent made in this case, and to bring Scotchmen over to Ireland to act as Magistrates?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know that a better precedent could be followed; but it does not rest with the Government to follow it, appointments of the kind being made on the recommendation of the Lieutenants of counties.

MR. CLANCY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that although the population of Dublin County is overwhelmingly Catholic, the great majority of the Magistrates are Protestant? There being plenty of Roman Catholic gentlemen in the County of Dublin who could be appointed, will the right hon. Gentleman tell the House why a gentleman who is not a Catholic and not a native has been appointed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No. This matter does not form part of my business.

MR. CLANCY: Will the right hon. Gentleman bring under the notice of the Lord Lieutenant the fact that in Dublin County there are plenty of Catholics competent to act?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I repeat that that is no part of my business.

A PORTUMNA APPEAL.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the report in the Freeman's Journal of 23rd June of the appeal heard at Portumna on Saturday last, of Mr. Lyons, a merchant of Portumna, and three other men, against a decision of Mr. Hickson, R.M., and Mr. Mayne, R.M., sentencing them to two months' imprisonment, and a rule of bail for alleged conspiracy to compel or induce a man named James Mitchel not to buy hay from a man named Dillon; whether he is aware that Mitchel, who was produced by the Crown as a witness, denied that the defendants had committed the offence, and that why he did not take the hay was "because he was disappointed about a horse to carry it away"; that the only other witness produced by the Crown was Dillon, who swore that he (Dillon) had previously been imprisoned for "breaking a neighbour's head with a shovel"; that the witnesses for the defence swore that the defendants were engaged on their legitimate business in the market on the day in question; whether he is aware that the same evidence was given at the trial before the Resident Magistrates, and that the County Court Judge of Galway (Mr. Henn, Q.C.), said—

"He could not overrule the decision of the Magistrates, as he must assume they based their Judgment on a full and fair consideration of the evidence;"

and whether, under the circumstances, and considering that the accused did not get the benefit of a Judgment based on the re-hearing, he will have inquiry made into the matter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The facts stated in the first paragraph are accurate. As regards the second paragraph, the statement appears to me to be incorrect or misleading, but I do not propose to attempt to give a summing up of the evidence, or an analysis of the testimony of each witness. The County Court Judge did re-hear the case and did confirm the sentences, and I see no ground for further action.

MR. CLANCY: Does the right hon. Gentleman deny that Mitchel swore in Court what is stated in the question?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No. I said it was not a convenient practice to sum up evidence given by various witnesses in a case twice tried.

MR. ROCHE: Has the right hon. Gentleman before him the information of the officials in Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have been supplied with some statements as to the evidence given in this case.

SHADOWING BY POLICE.

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can explain why Mr. Nash, the Secretary of the Norwich Liberal Association, on his visit last week to the Clongorey Estate, in the County Kildare, was shadowed by the police all the way between Newbridge and Clongorey; also, whether he is aware that the constable who followed the Rev. Mr. Macrae, and who was alleged to have been engaged on other business than shadowing, pursued the Rev. Mr. Macrae the whole length of his journey, stopping whenever he stopped, and immediately resuming his journey when the rev. gentleman moved on; and, if so, whether he still adheres to his statement that he was not shadowed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that a stranger having been observed driving with the President of the local branch of the National League in the direction of the Clongorey Estate, two policemen subsequently proceeded to the estate to ascertain if an illegal meeting was being held. The police, as a matter of fact, did not overtake them on the road, and appear to have travelled by a different route. It does not appear that Mr. Macrae was shadowed, or even observed, during the whole of his journey. How far he was followed on a bicycle during any part of his journey I do not know, but am inquiring. It must be recollected that the Plan of Campaign and intimidation in their worst form are frequently promoted by strangers to the district in which they occur. If these crimes are prevalent in any particular locality the police are obviously quite right to take sufficient note of the movement of strangers to enable them to interfere should it be necessary in the interest of the victims of these outrages. This is not shadowing, nor does it inflict the slightest annoyance on anyone.

MR. CLANCY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Mr. Macrae has publicly stated that the policeman did follow him as stated in the question? What was the crime of which the Rev. Mr. Macrae was suspected?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already stated that he was not suspected of any crime.

MR. CLANCY: If he was not suspected, why was he shadowed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I read with great slowness and distinctness that part of my answer which dealt with the hon. Member's question.

MR. W. REDMOND: Is the fact that a gentleman was a stranger in a district sufficient to warrant the police in dogging his footsteps?

*MR. JOHNSTON: Do not the police follow persons for the purpose of protection?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Certainly the police often have to follow for protection purposes. As to the other question, in the first place, there is not a case, as far as I know, in any part of Ireland of a stranger having his footsteps dogged. It is, and must remain, the case in Ireland in those parts where the Plan of Campaign and intimidation exist, that any person who it is thought possible may encourage those forms of crime should be watched.

MR. W. REDMOND: What grounds have the authorities in Ireland for supposing that Mr. Nash would be capable of encouraging such forms of intimidation and crime? Was there anything in the world against him except that he was a stranger?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no doubt that the gentleman is a model of every Christian virtue, but I have explained to the House the reasons that compel the authorities in some parts of Ireland to take notice of strangers.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): The other day the right hon. Gentleman stated that no persons were shadowed unless there was sufficient reason to suspect that they were guilty of crime or were intending to commit some crime. Does the right hon. Gentleman adhere to that statement in view of the answer he has given with reference to the Rev. Mr. Macrae?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, Sir; but I also said that Mr. Macrae was not shadowed.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): Would it not be desirable to lay down some rule or establish some office in Dublin where respectable persons could find out whether they would be shadowed or not?

MR. W. REDMOND: Will the Government consider the advisability of issuing passports?

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether his attention has been called to the following letter appearing in the Pall Mall Gazette of 24th June:—

"Mrs. Edith G. Overend, sister-in-law of the rector of Enniskillen, writes, 'I find some of the customs of this country very strange. I am here on a visit from New Zealand, and I am not two days in town till the police have been making inquiries about me, even in such a public place as a bank, as if I were an escaped convict, or suspected of a felony.' . . . 'I am a Protestant; and while my politics should not deprive me of the liberties of a citizen, they are not Nationalist, for being a colonist, I know little of Irish controversy; . . .'" whether there is any reason to believe that Mrs. Overend is engaged in criminal proceedings; and whether the Government will issue orders to the police to ensure that this lady shall not be subjected to the shadowing of which she complains?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is no foundation for the supposition that this lady has been placed under any sort of surveillance. She appealed to the police, as a stranger in the town, to direct her to respectable lodgings, where she could be visited by her brother-in-law, the rector of the parish. On the following day the rector told the police that he had heard of the lady's arrival, and he asked them if they knew where she was staying. This they endeavoured to ascertain, as she had not gone to the lodging recommended. The inquiry was made solely to oblige the rector, and had no public significance of any kind.

MR. W. REDMOND: The right hon. Gentleman has stated there is no ground for asserting that the lady was under police surveillance. I have here a telegram from the lady in which she describes the conduct of the police as abominable, and asking me to ascertain who instructed them to watch her. I have also received a letter from Enniskillen, stating on the best authority that the police did follow this lady, and were instructed to do so. Will the right hon. Gentleman now make further inquiries?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I gather that the police did not follow her; but if the lady will communicate with me directly, or indirectly through the hon. Member, I will inquire as to any specific allegations.

MR. W. REDMOND: After this answer I give notice that I shall advise the lady to hold no communication with the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state what number of persons are now being shadowed by policemen in the County of Cork, or if he can give the number so shadowed for the first fortnight of this month?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask the hon. Member to defer this question till Monday.

TIPPERARY.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether complaints have reached him that on Saturday, the 17th of May, the police of Tipperary attempted twice to drive off the streets the Street Inspector of Tipperary while engaged in the performance of his duty, taking down his name and threatening to summon him; that, on the 7th instant, he was also threatened with removal by the police; that on several occasions, including the 12th May, Constable Guinane and other constables impounded horses and cars, whilst their owners were in shops making purchases; and that, on the 2nd instant, the Street Inspector, accompanied by the Sub-Sanitary Officer of the Poor Law Board, visited a house in St. Michael Street, occupied by emergency men, who had strewn over the floor of one room in the front of the house a layer of bones several inches thick which emitted a bad odour; and whether the Chief Secretary will instruct the police to allow the Street Inspector to do his duty unmolested by the police, and will take steps to have the nuisance complained of removed by the police while they are in charge of the emergency men?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that about the 17th of May the police ordered two night watchmen, who were on the street at 5 p.m., obstructing the footway, to move on. That on 19th inst., a day watchman, who styles himself town sergeant, was on the footway with a number of other men causing an obstruction. They were told to move on by the police, which they all did except the man referred to. His name was taken. On 12th May Constable Guinane did impound a restive horse, which he found on the street without any one in charge. No other horse or car impounded on that date. Emergency men did not strew bones over the floor of a room, but a quantity of perfectly dry bones are under the flooring, which has lately been ripped up, where they have apparently lain for years. No odour whatever arises from them.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Have the police power to order this man to move on when he was performing his duty?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am told he was not engaged in his duties.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Are the police to be the judges as to whether he is doing his duty?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Their action must depend entirely on whether he is obstructing the streets or not.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Why should the police have authority over an official appointed under the Towns Act? Can they have such authority?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. and learned Member will put his question down, I will inquire.

THE OLPHERT ESTATE.

MR. DALTON (Donegal, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, in the course of the hearing of the charge against Conaghan, the bailiff of the Olphert Estate, for presenting his revolver in a drunken fit at one Peter M'Ginley, the defence made by Conaghan was that he had been assaulted by M'Ginley, and that he swore that the blow he received "felled him to the ground, rendering him unconscious," thereby proving that the presenting of the revolver by him must have been before the alleged assault; whether the following report in the Derry Journal of 18th June instant, of the Judgment of the Court consisting of two Resident Magistrates, is correct—

"The Court commented strongly upon Conaghan's conduct in going about the country carrying a revolver in a threatening attitude, protected as he usually is by a strong body guard of police, and, to mark their sense of the outrage, they ordered Conaghan to be bound to keep the peace for 12 months;"

and whether the licence to carry arms granted to Conaghan will be revoked?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that the defence made by Conaghan was that, being threatened by M'Ginley, he attempted to draw his revolver, but that before he could do so he was knocked senseless by M'Ginley. I am further informed that the newspaper report is not correct, except as to the fact that Conaghan was bound to keep the peace for 12 months for giving M'Ginley provocation. The revolver was unloaded, and Conaghan had no ammunition on his person that day. The Resident Magistrate sees no reason why his licence should be revoked for producing an empty revolver.

MR. DALTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to a paragraph in the Derry Journal of the 23rd June, which describes an attack made by Mr. Hewson, agent to the Olphert Estate, Donegal, upon a number of men and women who were engaged in collecting seaweed upon the strand at Maheroarty on the 21st June, in which it is stated that "The agent Hewson, who was accompanied by military and police (on their way back from attending evictions on the Olphert Estate) made a descent upon the people. The women and boys, who were engaged to their waists in the water catching the drift from the receding waves, fled when they saw the agent approaching. The wheel of one of the carts came off, and while Hewson was grappling in the water with the driver the other carts were galloped rapidly to the shore hotly pursued by the agent."

whether the police, returning from eviction duty, had any authority to assist the agent in harrassing these men and women engaged in saving seaweed on the sea-shore; and what steps he proposes to take in the matter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that the report in the newspaper mentioned is altogether inaccurate. Mr. Hewson made no attack upon the people. The constabulary and military were not with him. There were three constables protecting a bailiff, but they did not interfere.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Is it lawful for the agent or the landlord to prevent the people by force collecting seaweed floating in the sea.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware that any force was used. I gather there was not.

CONDUCT OF POLICE AT EVICTIONS.

MR. DALTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the police engaged upon eviction duty on the Olphert Estate, Donegal, on the 19th and 20th of June instant, sang in chorus on their march back each evening to their barracks, "Glory, Glory, Hallelujah"; and whether he will give orders to stop such proceedings in future?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The song in question, which relates to John Brown, is, I am informed, a perfectly respectable one, and I see no reason to interfere.

MR. DILLON: Do you see no reason to interfere with the police coming home from evicting poor people singing in chorus as if they were rejoicing over their work?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is no case of rejoicing in the matter. It is the practice in the Army after a long and heavy day to allow men to sing.

MR. DILLON: I must press the question whether the right hon. Gentleman considers that it is calculated to preserve the peace, or calculated to lead to a breach of the peace, that the police should be allowed to sing this joyous chorus after performing a most provocative duty, and whether he considers that there is any analogy between soldiers singing a chorus on the march and the Irish Police singing a chorus when they come away from an eviction?

Mr. Dalton

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is this analogy—that in both cases men who have been on duty have a long and laborious march. These men were not singing in the neighbourhood of the evictions, as far as I understand. If they were, of course the practice would be objectionable; but why men who have long marches to perform after a day's work should not be allowed a little relaxation on the way I really cannot understand.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): May I ask whether they were not singing a chorus composed by one of the hon. Members for Dublin?

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): That statement is false. But I would really appeal to the right hon. Gentleman whether, seeing that evictions involve the keenest suffering, pain, and excitement, he does not think that the singing of joyous songs by the police returning from them is not calculated to provoke the temper of the people of Ireland, and whether, therefore, he will not discourage the practice?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Whether it is provocative or not entirely depends on the circumstances of each case. I do not see anything particularly triumphal or cheerful in this song; but if the police were to sing cheerful songs in the immediate locality of an eviction, I think that might be a provocative proceeding, and one which should not be allowed; but when they have placed a distance between themselves and the scene of evictions, why they should not be allowed to sing on the march I cannot understand.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: At the Ponsonby evictions were not the Caledonians ordered by Colonel Turner to play the bagpipes on the march every day for a fortnight?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That question refers not to the police, but to the soldiers, and might perhaps be addressed to the Secretary of State for War.

THE CASE OF SERGEANT LORD.

MR. P. J. O'BRIEN (Tipperary, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can now afford the information as to the result of the inquiries made by the Inspector General of Constabulary into the charges of forgery and fraud against Sergeant Lord, of Lorrha; whether he has inquired if the facts are, as alleged by the complainant, Mr. Maher, that the money denied to be due to him by Lord was subsequently offered to him by Mr. Doolan, J.P., and on another occasion by Constable Edwards, of Carrigahorig; and whether, in view of such presumptive evidence that the amount claimed was due, and that the sergeant was guilty of fraud on the Police Authorities by returning as a voucher a forged receipt for the money, the Government will direct the Attorney General to consider the case?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that it has now been ascertained from Mr. Doolan, J.P., that as he personally knew both the sergeant and Mr. Maher he at his own suggestion intervened in a friendly way in order to save trouble and legal proceedings. The constable named did not on any occasion offer the money as alleged. The County Inspector is still inquiring into the matter, but there is nothing as yet in what has been reported to the Inspector General to render it necessary to seek advice from the Attorney General.

MR. SEXTON: If evidence is forthcoming that the allegation is true, what will be done with the Magistrate who has thus disgraced the Bench?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that the statement is without foundation.

MR. SEXTON: Evidence will be forthcoming that the man committed this forgery.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If there has been forgery committed, I presume the evidence will be heard before the authorities.

MR. SEXTON: That was done three months ago.

THE LEASEHOLDERS (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware of the universal feeling of leaseholders of agricultural holdings in Ireland in favour of the Leaseholders (Ireland) Bill, introduced by the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool, and on the Orders of the Day for Second Reading to-morrow; and whether, considering the resolutions in support of the object of the Bill which have been passed in almost every district in Ulster, he will now consent to afford facilities for passing this Bill into law during the present Session?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have nothing to add to that I said in answer to the Member for the Scotland Division, namely, that, apart from other objections, I think a conclusive objection to the suggestion is to be found in the present state of public business.

BONFIRES AT CASHEL.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland is he aware that on St. John's Eve the police, armed with batons and blackthorns, prevented a number of children from lighting the usual bonfires at Cashel; and, if so, upon what grounds and by what right did they thus interfere with this ancient custom, and by what authority?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Member has in mind certain occurrences at Cashel on Monday night last, I have to say that what the police interfered to prevent was the lighting of bonfires in the centre of the three principal streets of Cashel. The people were told to move them into a more suitable position—which they did.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that at that time of night the streets of Cashel would be perfectly destitute of traffic, and that, therefore, there would be no obstruction?

ARREST AT YOUGHAL FAIR.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in reference to the arrest of Mr. James O'Brien, of Killeagh, at last Youghal (County Cork) Fair, if he can now state what charge was preferred against this gentleman; is it a fact that he was charged with jostling a policeman who was shadowing him through the fair; and why was Mr. O'Brien arrested in a summary manner, and not summoned in the ordinary way.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that the man was arrested on the charge of obstructing Constable Quinn in the execution of his duty, and for conduct calculated to lead to a breach of the peace. It is not a fact that he was charged as alleged in the second paragraph. He was arrested because, owing to the persistency of his conduct, the constable was unable to discharge his duty.

MR. FLYNN: Will the right hon. Gentleman state definitely what was the charge against Mr. O'Brien?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have done so; he was charged with obstructing the police, and his conduct was calculated to lead to a breach of the peace.

MR. FLYNN: Why was he not summoned in the ordinary way, instead of being arrested?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already said that because of the persistency of his conduct the constable was unable to discharge his duties.

MR. DILLON: What duty was the constable discharging?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must have notice of that question.

MR. FLYNN: Is there any doubt in the right hon. Gentleman's mind that he was shadowing Mr. O'Brien?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot say that. I have no doubt he was watching boycotting at the fair, but I cannot say if he was following this particular man.

THE NEW LICENCES BILL.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if the Government propose to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Tyrone to omit Clause 3 from the "New Licences Bill," or will they consider the necessity which arises for some temporary licensing power by reason of such cases as that of James Blayney, of Lurgan, where, after premises being licensed for 70 years, a transfer was refused by the local bench because the applicant was a Catholic; and do the Government intend to shut out such applicants from all possibility of obtaining renewals?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman will defer his question until the Bill is considered. The refusal of the transfer had nothing to do with religion.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I give notice that I will not proceed with the Bill, which would simply be made an instrument of oppression against my co-religionists, unless some such clause as Clause 3 were adopted.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to give notice that when the Bill is considered I shall move the omission of Clause 3.

MR. T. M. HEALY: No one is afraid of the opposition of the hon. Member.

CHARGES AGAINST THE POLICE.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any report has been made by the police officer of Gorey district to the Police Authorities in Dublin Castle against Police Sergeant Jervis, of Gorey, for drunkenness in the public streets in January last; if so, what action has been taken by the authorities in reference to the charge; and also, if he is aware that a police constable from Courtown, County Wexford, recently left with Mr. William Bolyer, tailor, of Gorey, material for a suit of plain clothes, for which he was measured; whether, subsequently, this constable was ordered by Head Constable M'Cormack, his superior officer, to cancel the order and take away the stuff; and, if so, what was the reason for the head constable giving such an order; and whether the sub-constable has cancelled the contract?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am sorry I must ask the hon. Baronet to defer his questions, as I have not been able to get the information.

OUTRAGES IN TIPPERARY.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the report in the Daily Express of Monday, the 23rd instant, to the effect that a young man, named James Sadleir, was fired at on Friday night, on returning to his home from Tipperary, is accurate; whether the report that Sadleir has been "frequently threatened" is true, and whether there is any evidence to prove that his unpopularity in the district is in any way due to the fact that his family has refused to join in the no-rent policy adopted against Mr. Smith-Barry; and if the police have made any report on the matter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The facts as to this outrage appear to be as described in the question. Mr. Sadleir and two friends complained to the police on the night of the 20th inst. that they had been attacked with stones and fired at.

The police fully reported the matter. There can be no reasonable doubt that the cause of Mr. Sadleir's unpopularity is that he and his family have refused to join in the combination against Mr. Smith-Barry.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Has the right right hon. Gentleman received information that last night an explosive machine was thrown into the shop of a boycotted man in Tipperary?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is the fact such an outrage has been committed.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.): Is there any other shopkeeper in Tipperary of the name of the man into whose shop this explosive is said to have been thrown?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, Sir; there is a shopkeeper of the name of Duggan.

MR. SHEEHY: No, there is not.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Is there any ground for the statement of the hon. Member for South Tyrone except the assertion of Sadleir? Have the police been able to trace the shots said to have been fired?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No doubt the police have investigated the matter.

LADY BURNETT'S SCHOOL, BANCHORY.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether, with reference to Lady Burnett's School, Banchory, it is the case that the school is being managed by one Governor, who, under the recently sanctioned scheme, is the only one who is in the meantime capable of acting; whether, by Article 17 (h) of the Scotch Code, 1890, it is necessary before the Government grant can be paid that there should be at least three Governors to every school not a Board school; and whether, in the above circumstances, it is the intention of the Scotch Education Department to refuse any further grant to the school until steps are taken to make such an alteration on the scheme as will satisfy the requirements of the Code?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I understand that, owing to circumstances, only one Governor is now acting under the scheme recently sanctioned for the Lady Burnett's School. Article 17 (h) of the Scotch Code requires that three persons should designate one of their number to sign the receipt for the grant to the school. One Trustee and two other Managers have hitherto acted under this provision of the Code, and we have not been informed that there has been any change in this respect. The question of a grant to the school must be decided after careful examination of the usual Returns at the time when the grant falls conditionally due. The Department cannot commit themselves to any decision beforehand, nor are they prepared at present to say that any alteration in the scheme is necessary to satisfy the requirements of the Code.

SCOTCH SCHOOL BOARD ELECTIONS.

MR. SHIRESS WILL (Montrose): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that the triennial election of School Boards throughout Scotland will take place next year; and whether, in view of that fact, the answer of the Secretary for Scotland to the deputation of about 30 Scottish Members on the subject of the School Board Election (Scotland) Bill, promised by himself on the 28th March to be given on an early day, and again promised by the Lord Advocate in this House on the 22nd May to be given "shortly after Whitsuntide," and again promised by the Lord Advocate in this House on the 16th instant to be given on Friday the 20th instant, will now be given; and, if not, what is the explanation of the delay?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The Government are not prepared to give time for the discussion of the hon. and learned Member's Bill, nor can they add to the number of controversial Bills now before the House. They are, however, prepared to bring in a Bill of one clause assimilating the franchise for elections of School Boards to the franchise for elections of County Councils and Town Councils, and to pass it after 12 o'clock, should it meet with general approval.

THE CONVICT WRIGHT.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will state the number and character of the punishments inflicted on the convict Wright during his confinement in Portsea Prison; and whether he will order an inquiry into the mental condition and responsibility of this convict by a medical man independent of the Prisons Board?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the Prison Commissioners that this convict has been reported 52 times and punished 50 times. The punishments include dietary punishment, close confinement, loss of class privileges and remission, and corporal punishments which has been inflicted once. He is reported to be of sound mind. There is no reason to question the competence of the medical officers attached to the Prison Department to give a correct opinion on the question of a prisoner's condition of mind. I do not propose to order a special inquiry in this case; but I have given instructions that the mental condition of the prisoner shall be closely watched.

THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he could state the number of Metropolitan Police usually employed in the County of Middlesex outside the County of London?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Commissioner that the number of men so employed is 1,324.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what orders or instructions have been given by the new Commissioner of Police as regards the prohibition of meetings of constables to discuss the questions of their pay or pensions?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Commissioner of Police that no new general orders have been given as regards the prohibition of meetings of constables to discuss questions of pay and pension. The superintendents have been instructed to remind their men of the Standing Orders, prescribing the manner in which representations on these subjects should be made. An order was issued last night, in which, in reply to several Petitions, the Commissioner declined to allow a meeting of Representatives of divisions to be held in Bow Street, as being contrary to the best interests of the men, and the efficiency of the force. At the same time he declared his willingness to receive any representations from members of the force through the authorised channels, and to give them his best attention.

*MR. PICKERSGILL: Is it not a fact that the Superintendents were permitted to meet for the objects indicated in the question, and is not the same privilege to be accorded to the rank and file?

MR. MATTHEWS: I should like to have notice of the question if the hon. Member wants a full answer, but my recollection is that the Superintendents were directed to ascertain the wishes of the men in their respective divisions, that course not being deemed contrary to the Standing Orders.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): Why are the men thus to be suddenly deprived of the power of discussing their grievances?

MR. MATTHEWS: No new Regulation has been issued; their attention has only been called to existing Rules.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Is it a fact that another meeting which has been called has been prohibited?

MR. MATTHEWS: I must ask for notice of that question.

MR. WARRY, Q.C.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has seen the report in the Daily News, of the 24th inst., of the case of a man named Jones, who was tried before Mr. Warry, Q.C., at the London County Sessions sitting at Clerkenwell, charged with stealing a purse containing 2s. 4d., and, on conviction, was sentenced by Mr. Warry to 10 years' penal servitude, and from which it appears that the prosecution failed to prove that Jones was seen to take the purse or ever had it in his possession; and if he will consider the advisability of remitting some portion of this sentence; and I may also ask him if he is aware that this Magistrate has to-day sentenced another man to 10 years' penal servitude for stealing an overcoat?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am not in possession of any particulars with regard to these cases, but I will make inquiry at once.

MR. CRILLY: I will repeat the questions.

RAILWAY TELEGRAMS.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Notts, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Postmaster General what number of messages were sent by the Telegraphic Department during 1889 on account of the railway companies, free of charge to them; and, having regard to the evidence of the Superintendent of Telegraphs before the Revenue Estimates Committee, in 1888, that this transmission of free messages had increased from 97,000 in 1871 to 961,000 in 1887, entirely at the public expense, whether he has been able in any way to check or diminish this growing charge on the National Exchequer?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The number of telegrams transmitted free of charge for the railway companies in the year 1889 was 1,244,000. The subject of the hon. Member's question is engaging my careful attention, and the legal proceedings to which I referred in answer to a question on the 31st March last are still pending.

POSTAL CHARGES IN SCOTLAND.

COLONEL MALCOLM (Argyllshire): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that great dissatisfaction is caused by the postal charges made on the official forms rendered necessary by the Local Government (Scotland) Act, and that the difficulty of carrying out that Act in scattered counties is enormously increased by the action of the Postal Authorities therein, 900 Schedules having been returned in one county alone; and whether he will issue such instructions as may put an end to this grievance?

MR. RAIKES: A difference of opinion has for some time existed as to how far these forms can be held to comply with the existing Regulations regarding book-rate postage, but alterations in the Regulations have been suggested, and I am at the present time in correspondence with the Treasury on the subject. I am decidedly of opinion that if the present doubts cannot be satisfactorily cleared up no time should be lost in so amending the Regulations as to make it no longer a matter of question how far these forms are entitled to pass at the book-rate.

THE ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT.

MR. FRANCIS STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that of recent years German newspapers, partly non-official and partly semi-official, in discussing the possibility of the cession of Heligoland, have repeatedly given expression to the desire, which is widely entertained in military circles in Germany, that the island should be converted into a high-class fortress similar to Kronstadt; whether, in view of the limited area of the island, a scheme of that description would of necessity involve the dispossession of the inhabitants, and consequently be injurious to the interests of the fishermen from the East Coast of England, who are now able to make use of Heligoland for various purposes connected with their industry; and whether the Government will consider the desirability of arriving at an understanding with Germany that in the event of the cession taking place no such scheme shall be carried out?

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government will consider the advisability of stipulating, in the event of Heligoland being ceded to Germany, that the island shall not be converted into a naval fortress, and that the islanders shall be permanently exempted from military service?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): No conditions with respect to the fortifications of the Island of Heligoland can be made, as the German Government must obviously be left to decide on the measures necessary for the defence of its own coasts. Her Majesty's Government are in communication with the German Government with a view to the adoption of measures for the protection of British fishing interests and the immunity of the present inhabitants from conscription.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, if fortifications and naval works are constructed by the Germans on so small an area, it will practically amount to an order to the inhabitants to leave the island?

MR. W. H. SMITH: No, Sir; I am not aware of that fact.

*MR. CHANNING: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Prime Minister is correctly reported, at the Merchant Taylors' Company's Dinner on 27th May, to have laid down as the canon of his policy as regards the surrender or the acquisition of territory that these are questions on which the public opinion of England and the full assent of Parliament should be previously obtained; whether, the opinion of Parliament will be taken on the Cession of Heligoland Bill before the Treaty is signed by the Representative of Great Britain; and whether having regard to the declarations of the Prime Minister, an opportunity will be given to this House to discuss the whole of the arrangements come to between Great Britain and Germany before the Treaty is signed?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Treaty will be drawn in such terms as to be conditional on the passing of the Bill. I understand that the Question does not convey an accurate representation of the remarks of my noble Friend; but as to any remarks he may have made, it would be more convenient that the question should be addressed to him in the House where he sits. I may add that any engagement of the nature indicated will be fulfilled by the submission of the Bill to Parliament, on which the whole Agreement depends.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether any Reports from the Naval or Military Authorities, as to the proposed cession of Heligoland, will be laid upon the Table in time for the discussion on the Bill which is necessary to carry the cession into effect?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Confidential Reports of naval and military men upon strategic questions could not conveniently be published.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will inform the House what steps have been taken by the Government to ascertain the views of the inhabitants of Heligoland on the proposed cession of the island to Germany?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The arrangement cannot be made dependent upon a popular vote. The possession of the island was acquired without the consent of the people, and Her Majesty's Government fulfil their duty towards them by securing to all now living exceptional privileges. We have every reason to believe that their interests will in no way suffer by the change of Sovereignty.

MR. SEXTON: Has the attention of the right hon. Gentleman been drawn to a series of letters in the Pall Mall Gazette to the effect that they can find no one in the island who is in favour of the transfer?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If the hon. Gentleman will be good enough to draw my attention to the Pall Mall Gazette, I shall be glad to give him an answer, but he will not be surprised to hear that I am not able just now to read many newspapers.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): The right hon. Gentleman says that communications are passing with the German Government with regard to the immunity of the present inhabitants of Heligoland from military service. We understood that that was one of the points stipulated in the original Agreement that no one now living should be compelled to serve. Is that point still open to discussion?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Gentleman is quite right in drawing my attention to the language. There is an undertaking on the part of the German Government that all the present inhabitants of Heligoland shall be exempt from military service.

MR. BRYCE: Then on what point, may I ask, are further communications with regard to military service passing?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that it is necessary to put these undertakings into diplomatic language.

NATIONAL GALLERY FOR BRITISH ARTISTS — MR. TATE'S PROPOSALS.

MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Government are willing to entertain the proposals and assist the scheme, suggested by Mr. Henry Tate in his letter to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, dated 17th June instant, for the establishment of a National Gallery of British Art?

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): On the same subject I will ask the First Lord whether Her Majesty's Government have come to any decision as to the acceptance of Mr. Tate's offer of pictures?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The views of the Government with reference to Mr. Tate's offer had been communicated to that gentleman in a letter sent yesterday from the Treasury, and this letter would probably be published. If Mr. Tate's most generous offer was not accepted at once, it was not owing so much to want of space in the National Gallery as to the fact that Mr. Tate rather insisted on the condition that his pictures should be kept together as a separate collection, and such a condition was rather at variance with the regulations that were generally observed at the National Gallery. The Government were extremely grateful to Mr. Tate for his munificent offer, and sincerely hoped that they might be able to accept it. Discussions were being held now as to the allocation of the eastern and western galleries at South Kensington to the purposes of a gallery for British Art. These galleries were well lighted and were fireproof. On this subject he had himself been in communication with the Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851, the Trustees of the National Gallery, and Sir Frederick Leighton. Mr. Tate attached at present certain conditions of management to his offer of his pictures which it might be difficult, if not impossible, to accept; but he trusted that when Mr. Tate should see that arrangements had been made for the establishment of a gallery for British artists at South Kensington, he would think fit to present this valuable collection of pictures, as originally proposed, to the nation.

TRUST FUNDS INVESTMENTS.

MR. P. McDONALD (Sligo, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has yet considered the Report of the Departmental Committee on the question of permitting Trustees to invest Trust Funds in colonial securities; and, if so, what conclusion has been come to?

MR. GOSCHEN: It will be obvious to the hon. Member that whatever conclusion I may come as to the Report of the Committee, legislation on the subject of Trust Funds investments in colonial securities is impossible this Session.

THE KILLYBEGS LIGHT RAILWAY.

MR. CLANCY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the West Donegal Railway Company, which is promoting and proposes to work the Killybegs Light Railway Line, possesses any rolling stock, and whether its own line is worked by the Finn Valley Railway Company at a loss to the latter body; whether, before deciding to make a grant in favour of the Killybegs line, he will take into account the inadvisability of allowing that line to be worked by a company which will be constantly under the temptation in its traffic arrangements to benefit its own shareholders at the expense of the ratepayers, who will have to guarantee any loss that may occur in respect of the working expenses of the proposed new line; whether the Killybegs and Baltimore Light Railway lines have got any precedence over the other schemes projected under the Act of last year; and, if so, on what grounds; and whether it is intended to put up to competition the engineering as well as the construction of the light railway lines which may be finally sanctioned by the Treasury?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am informed that the rolling stock belongs to the West Donegal Company, although the line is worked under an agreement by the Finn Valley Company. The Finn Valley Company works the line for a percentage of the gross receipts, guaranteeing a minimum payment to the West Donegal Company, and up to the present the balance over the working expenses has not reached the minimum. The prospects have, I believe, improved since the line was completed into Donegal. I will certainly carefully consider how to secure that the Killybegs line is credited with its full share of the receipts and debited only with its proper share of expenditure in order to safeguard the interests of the county. The Killybegs line has got no precedence over other lines beyond the fact that they have made more progress with the proposals which they submitted to the Treasury. It is not intended to put up to competition the preparation of the plans and working drawings, but care will be taken that the scale of payments for the plans shall be a reasonable one.

MR. CLANCY: Is it not a common practice to put up the engineering as well as the construction of these lines to competition, and is Mr. Barton, the promoter and engineer of this line, to be the only person with whom there shall be no competition?

MR. JACKSON: I should think it is not customary to put up the engineering to competition, because, until a plan has been prepared, no presentment can be made by the Grand Jury.

THE LONDON COMPANIES.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Government will consent to grant the Return as to the income and expenditure of the Corporation of the City of London, the Irish Society, the twelve great companies, &c., mentioned in the notice on the Paper for this day?

MR. JACKSON: It is not in my power to provide the information.

THE BUTTER TRADE.

MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the following statement in the Grocer of this week:—

“Nurdin and Peacock v. Hornet.

“The Faïaise Tribunal sentenced Vitard to one month's imprisonment and a fine of £40, and Hornet, his accomplice, to a fine of £8, the Judgment to be inserted at their expense in several newspapers, and to be posted at the Town Hall, and also on the doors of Vitard's and Hornet's residences;”

whether he is aware that this sentence was inflicted (at the prosecution of the French Authorities acting upon evidence given at Bow Street Police Court) for having sold adulterated French butters as pure butters to an English firm; is he aware that a merchant was fined £10 and costs, at the Westminster Police Court last Thursday, for selling butter adulterated with 25 per cent. of foreign fat, though the Magistrate admitted that he proved to the complete satisfaction of the Court that he had bought and paid for it as pure butter, and that every package was imported direct from Belgium, branded, and guaranteed pure butter; is he aware that the value of British and Irish dairy produce has been reduced this year by about 30 per cent. under its normal value, owing to this unfair competition with adulterated foreign butter; and whether, under these circumstances, he will co-operate with the French Government in suppressing this traffic, by instructing the Custom House officials at the various ports where foreign butters are landed, to enforce the powers conferred on them by section 8 of the Margarine Act of 1887?

Mr. Jackson

MR. JACKSON: The attention of the Board of Customs has been called to the statement made in the Grocer in regard to certain persons having been convicted in France for adulterating butter and to the proceedings at Westminster Police Court, but they have no official knowledge of the circumstances. Large quantities of margarine are imported into this country from the Continent, and the Board are not aware that it is described as butter. I am unable to say whether there has been such a reduction as the hon. Member describes in the value of British and Irish dairy produce or that it is due to competition with adulterated foreign butter. The powers conferred upon the Customs Officers by Section 8 of the Margarine Act, 1887, is limited to the taking of samples, and the officers would have no authority under that Act to detain the goods. The examination by analysis of all imported butter by the Customs Officers would not only involve a large increase in the present staff, but it would also cause much delay in the delivery of a perishable article and lead to much friction and inconvenience to the trade. I am, however, sending a copy of the hon. Member's question with a copy of this reply to my right hon. Friend the Chairman of the Select Committee on Merchandise Marks. It may be that his Committee has taken evidence on the subject.

DAMARALAND.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that the last accounts rendered by the German Company in Damaraland showed that on the 1st of August of last year the whole of the assets of the company amounted to 110,000 marks, or a little over £5,000; and whether he is able to give the House any later information with regard to the financial position of this company?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): We have no information on this subject.

THE EAST AFRICAN AGREEMENT.

MR. BRYCE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what part, if any, of the mainland of East Africa south of the point on the coast where the British and German "spheres of influence" meet is included in the "Sultanate of Zanzibar," over which according to Lord Salisbury's Despatch, it has been agreed that Her Majesty shall assume a Protectorate, or is it to be understood that all such part of the Sultanate as lies on the coast of the mainland from the above-mentioned point southward to as far as Cape Delgado is to be transferred to the Protectorate of Germany?

SIR J. FERGUSON: I stated on the 20th inst. that the dominions of the Sultan of Zanzibar, with the exception of the strip of coast farmed out to the German East Africa Company, were included in the proposed British Protectorate. The coast is south of the point where the British and German spheres of influence meet, and is not included. I should add that the Island of Mafia, lying off this coast, will probably not be included in our Protectorate in case of Germany arranging with the Sultan for its inclusion in the territory to be ceded to her.

MR. BRYCE: Then the point put in my question is correct?

SIR J. FERGUSON: That is so.

RUMOURED MASSACRE OF CHRISTIANS AT KOSOVA.

SIR J. FERGUSON: The hon. Member for South Aberdeen lately asked me regarding an alleged massacre of Christians by Arnauts in the vilayet of Kossova, in Albania. The Consul General at Salonica has spontaneously reported, upon seeing the statement in question in certain Continental newspapers, that he had made inquiry of railway officials arriving from places in that district, who declared that they had heard of no such event. Her Majesty's Minister at Belgrade, while mentioning that complaints had been made of oppression by turbulent Albanians on their Christian neighbours, does not refer to any allegations of murders.

MR. BRYCE: Cannot further steps be taken to ascertain the truth, seeing that Salonica is 200 miles away from the place where the massacres are alleged to have occurred?

SIR J. FERGUSON: The Consul General cannot travel that distance; he can only make such inquiries as he has made.

CRETE.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to a telegram in the Daily News of the 24th instant, which states that—

"A Memorandum has been presented by the Christian population to the Consuls of Foreign Powers at Canea, containing a number of complaints. The Consuls of Austria, Hungary, and Italy declared to the deputation which presented the Memorandum that they would use contents as material for private information. The British Consul, Mr. Billiotti, refused to receive the Memorandum altogether, saying his own information was sufficient for him to know all the Cretans were in need;"

whether his attention has been called to a telegram in the Manchester Guardian of 21st June, in which it was stated that the Governor of Crete had determined to re-introduce Courts Martial into the island; and whether he has received information of the existence of such a state of affairs as would warrant the adoption of these measures?

SIR J. FERGUSON: The Memorandum referred to was left at the house of Her Majesty's Consul when he was out, and was sent back to the petitioners by him the next day as not being a document which, in his position of Consul, he could properly receive, seeing that it called for his official intervention in matters on which the petitioners had addressed the Vali, and that his acceptance of it would probably have led the petitioners to believe that Her Majesty's Government would interfere when there was no reason to suppose that the Vali would not give due consideration to their representations. Her Majesty's Government are not aware of any intention on the part of the Vali to re-establish Courts Martial.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.

MR. W. REDMOND: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is in a position to give the House any information regarding the alleged conflict between French and Newfoundland fishermen?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Inquiry has been made by telegraph, and the Governor of Newfoundland has replied that nothing is known of the rumour of a conflict between French and Newfoundland fishermen.

THE EGYPTIAN EXILES AT CEYLON.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether a Memorial has been received from the Egyptian exiles at Ceylon, enclosing medical certificates showing that their health is seriously affected by the dampness of the climate, and expressing a hope that, under the circumstances and in view of their exile having lasted seven years, Her Majesty's Government will urge the Egyptian Government to allow them to return to Egypt; and stating that, if this permission be accorded to them, they will pledge their honour to abstain from taking any part in public affairs, to do which, they add, they can have no object, as the grievances which they formerly complained of have been fully redressed; and, what action Her Majesty's Government proposes to take in respect to this Memorial?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Memorial referred to reached the Foreign Office to-day and has not yet been considered.

STAMPS FOR INDIA.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India what sum is annually paid by the India Office to the Inland Revenue Department in connection with the control of stamps and stamped paper for India, and on what terms; whether the India Office receives any detailed statement of the manner in which that sum is expended, and whether any portion of it remains unexpended upon the special purpose for which it is paid?

Sir J. Fergusson

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The sum is £3,480, appropriated as follows (1):—Personal allowances to certain Revenue Officers, £590; (2) Contributions towards superannuations, £100; (3) payments to Imperial Exchequer for miscellaneous services of Inland Revenue Officers during official hours, and not covered by the personal allowances above, £300; (4) salaries and expenses of Supervising Staff, £2,490. Detailed statements are received as to items (1) and (4), but not as regards the others. No portion remains unexpended.

INDIAN TELEGRAPHISTS.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether it was with the sanction of the Secretary of State that the rule of the Telegraph Department of the Government of India, which laid down that where quarters could not be provided in the respective telegraph buildings for signallers, such signallers, both European and Indian, should have house rent allowance on a given scale, was changed; whether it was with his approval that while the allowance was continued to Europeans it was stopped for Indians, and whether there is any difference in the duties performed by European and Indian signallers which would justify the withdrawal of these allowances; and, if there be no difference, whether he will give instructions to the Government of India to restore to the Indian signallers the house allowance hitherto granted to them?

SIR J. GORST: No change has been made in the rules of the Telegraph Service in the matter referred to in the question. Native Indian signallers have never been required to reside in the telegraph buildings as their social and religious customs would forbid them doing so. They have, therefore, never been entitled to house allowance.

KASHMIR.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India when the repeatedly promised Papers relating to Kashmir will be presented to this House, and whether, in view of the present painful position of His Highness the Maharajah, the Secretary of State will at once authorise a judicial inquiry into the grave charges made by the Government and solemnly denied by His Highness?

SIR J. GORST: I have to-day laid the Papers on the Table. The action of the Government in Kashmir has been based, not upon grave personal charges made against the Maharajah, but upon the long-continued misgovernment of Kashmir, which rendered it necessary, in the interest of the people, to put an end to chronic oppression and misrule. Neither the Secretary of State nor the Government of India, as I have several times stated in Parliament, have ever attached any importance to certain treasonable and criminal correspondence attributed to the Maharajah. It is obvious that the conduct of the Government in making such arrangements as involve the withdrawal of the Maharajah for a time on political grounds from active participation in the Government of the State cannot be made the subject of investigation by a judicial officer.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I will ask when the Papers are likely to be circulated to Members, and whether, if they disclose a different state of things from that which has just been stated, the Government will afford any opportunity for this unfortunate gentleman to repel accusations which he declares to be absolutely without foundation.

SIR J. GORST: The distribution of Papers does not rest with me. It depends on the printing authorities of the House, over whom I have no control. With regard to the second part of the question, I think the hon. Member had better wait until he sees the Papers.

MR. BRADLAUGH: In view of the excessive gravity of the matter, as I understand the Papers, I shall avail myself of such opportunities as the Forms of the House permit unless the Government afford some opportunity to this unfortunate gentleman to answer the charges made against him.

THE CHESHIRE SALT CORPORATION.

MR. J. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the Mr. John Brydone, whose name has recently been largely advertised as that of the Chairman of the Cheshire Salt Corporation, with a capital of £250,000, is at present the Inspector under the Canal Boats Acts, and in the receipt of a salary of £600 a year; whether he is aware that the Directors of that company published in the advertisement of their prospectus a letter bearing the signature of Mr. Thomas Ward, of Brookfield House, Northwich, dated 4th June, 1887, and purporting to recommend the Church Hill Estate which, in the prospectus, was described as "one of the most important salt properties in the United Kingdom," and as having been secured by the company, and that such letter of Mr. Ward has been stated by him in a letter dated the 18th instant "not to have referred to that estate, but to an entirely different property;" whether, in consequence of such second letter of Mr. Ward, the Directors of the company have been unable to proceed to allotment; and whether he will state if there is any rule as to the holding of Directorships by Civil servants?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): Prior to notice of this question, my attention was drawn to the fact that Mr. Brydone, who is an Inspector under the Canal Boats Acts, was named in the prospectus of the proposed Cheshire Salt Corporation as the Chairman of the company, and I at once called upon him for an explanation. He informed me that his acceptance of the position would not interfere with the performance of his duties as an officer of the Department, as the meetings of the Directors would be held in the afternoon or evening, and would not occupy more than one or two hours monthly. I regret that Mr. Brydone should have accepted the position referred to, and I have so informed him and intimated to him that his holding the office of Director in any public company is inconsistent with the terms on which he was appointed as an Inspector. I have no information as to the estate referred to in the prospectus, but Mr. Brydone informs me that the Directors of the company are not proceeding to allotment.

VACCINATION—ROYAL COMMISSION.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board when the second Report of the Royal Commission on Vaccination will be circulated to Members of this House?

*MR. RITCHIE: The second Report of the Royal Commission on Vaccination is now in the hands of the Stationery Office, who state that, in consequence of the number of coloured lithographed diagrams it contains, the copies cannot be issued in less than three weeks' time.

DESTITUTE IMMIGRANTS.

SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been drawn to the evidence of Inspector Holland, at the Wandsworth Police Court on the 18th instant, as to a destitute Italian family, recently arrived in this country, consisting of a father, mother, and six children, who were living in a miserable apartment, which smelt horribly, with a cat, a monkey, and several white mice, and to the further statement of Inspector Holland that within a short period 200 Italians in the same destitute condition had arrived in this country; and what steps are being taken to give effect to the recommendations of the Select Committee on the Immigration of Foreigners?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I am informed that Inspector Holland did not state that, within a short period, 200 destitute Italians had immigrated into this country. In this particular case, the family had been brought to England by one of its members who was living here, and had sent £16 to Italy to pay their passage. This person was bound over in the sum of £25 as a guarantee for the good conduct of the father of the family, who was proved to have sent a child to beg. The father stated that eight other Italian families came over with him. As regards the recommendations of the Select Committee on the Immigration of Foreigners, I can only repeat what I have already stated in reply to other hon. Members, namely, that steps are being taken to put in force the recommendations of the Committee so far as it is possible to do so without fresh legislative powers. We are obtaining a statistical record of the immigration of foreigners as regards vessels arriving at the principal ports of the United Kingdom from European ports, and we are also getting Reports from British Consuls at the chief European ports as to the emigration of destitute aliens to the United Kingdom.

*SIR J. COLOMB: Are arrangements now in operation for keeping the record?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Yes.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING ORDERS.

MR. BEAUFOY (Lambeth, Kennington): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, as it is contrary to practice to allow Local Authorities by one and the same Act or Provisional Order to establish gas undertakings with power to transfer them, whether he will state the reasons which have led him to depart from this practice in the case of Electric Lighting Orders which the Board have recently granted to Local Authorities?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have nothing to add to the replies I have already given in the House with reference to this matter. I have confidence in the discretion of the Local Authorities, and, with the safeguards contained in the clause referred to, I do not think the interests of the public can suffer.

MR. BEAUFOY: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade why the Model Electric Lighting Order, which has recently been prepared by the Department over which he presides, since it contains most unusual powers of transfer to Local Authorities, was not placed upon the Table of the House for consideration, as is necessary in the case of rules made by the Board?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Section 5 of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, requires that rules made by the Board of Trade under that Act shall be laid before Parliament, but there is no similar provision in respect to the model form of Provisional Order. The Orders, as granted by the Board of Trade, are submitted to Parliament for confirmation, and have no force until so confirmed.

THE NEW EDUCATION CODE.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, in reference to the Return he has issued giving the estimate of the probable additional expenditure caused by the changes in the New Code, 1890, how he arrives at the estimate of £30,000 only as the additional expenditure likely to be incurred under Articles 101 (a) and (b); and whether the total estimated additional expenditure of £95,000 is for a whole year, or for that portion of the existing financial year only during which the New Code will be in force?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COMMITTEE (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): £95,000 is the total estimated expenditure for a whole year. With regard to the item of £30,000, I can only say that it is an estimate framed upon what is, undoubtedly, a somewhat conjectural basis, by the best expert assistance at the disposal of the Department.

ADULTERATION OF BUTTER.

MR. LANE: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he will undertake to bring under the notice of the Departments of Agriculture in France, Belgium, Holland, and Denmark the grave injury which is being done to the dairy farmers of those countries, and of Great Britain, by the growing practice of adulterating butter, with a view to holding a Conference to consider how this matter might be dealt with, in order to protect the dairy interests of the various countries concerned?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The question of the hon. Member refers to a matter which is undoubtedly of great importance to a large and, I believe, a steadily increasing branch of agricultural industry in the United Kingdom—namely, the manufacture of butter and dairy farming generally, and I listen, I can assure him, with a very sympathising ear to any representations affecting the prosperity of that branch of agricultural industry which the Board of Agriculture is doing its best to promote and encourage throughout the country at the present time. The question, however, of the hon. Member only appeared on the Paper this morning, and I have neither the knowledge nor information as to the facts of the case to warrant my undertaking to adopt the course he proposes. I will, however, examine into the facts without loss of time, with the view of ascertaining if it is possible or desirable to take any action in the direction which he suggests; but I am under the impression that it is a matter which is within the jurisdiction of the Customs rather than the Board of Agriculture.

OUTLAYS ON FORTIFICATIONS.

ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will grant a Return showing the amount of money spent on fortifications, and on guns for them, since the recommendations of the Royal Commission in 1859?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): If my hon. and gallant Friend will move for such a Return, I shall be happy to give it exactly as regards fortifications, and approximately as regards the guns for them.

QUARTERMASTERS AND ARMY CONTRACTORS.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to evidence, recently given before the Chester Bankruptcy Court, by John Rowlands, for several years contractor for bread to the Chester garrison, who stated that he supplied Quartermaster Yates (now in India) and Quartermaster Binthall (who has since left the Army) regularly with bread for themselves and families, for which they never paid, that both of them had to do with the rations, and it would have been an awkward thing to press them for payment; whether he will make inquiry into the truth of this allegation; what is the actual duty of Quartermasters as to inspecting and reporting on rations; and if their duties extend only to reporting on quantity, what steps he has taken to insure that the officers whose duty it is to inspect rations for quality do not devolve that duty upon their Quartermasters?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The particular case referred to in the question is under investigation. The duties of a Quartermaster in inspecting rations are limited by Queen's Regulations to points of quantity. He has nothing to do with quality; and it is the duty of his commanding officer to see that the regulations are complied with.

THE ARMY MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has received memorials and communications from the Royal Colleges of Physicians of London and Edinburgh, the Royal Colleges of Surgeons of England and Ireland, and other Public Bodies, urging the Government, on behalf of the medical profession, to carry out the recommendations of the Departmental Committee on the Army Medical Department, which recently sat under the presidency of Lord Camperdown; and whether, in consideration of the representative character of these important licensing Corporations, he will lay their Memorials upon the Table of the House for the information of hon. Members?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Such Memorials as have been received by the War Office can be presented to the House if the hon. Member moved for them.

DR. FARQUHARSON: Will the right hon. Gentleman include the answers given by the War Office?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The hon. Member can see the answers if he desires to do so, but I do not think it necessary to lay them on the Table of the House.

SOLDIERS' PENSIONS.

MR. CRILLY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War with reference to the case of Patrick McDonnell, a private in the 1st Battalion of the East Lancashire Foot Regiment, who was discharged from the Service on the 6th March, 1888, having been found medically unfit for further service, and who had spent a considerable time in India, where he contracted the disease of the heart which necessitated his retirement, whether his conduct while in the Army was, as his certificate of discharge shows, "very good"; whether a number of medical certificates have been submitted to the War Office, showing that McDonnell after his service in the Army is physically unable to earn a livelihood; and whether, under the circumstances, some provision in the shape of a pension can be made for him?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The grant of pensions rests with the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital; and I have sent the case of Patrick M'Donnell for their consideration.

THE MUNSTER FUSILIERS.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if his attention has been called to a disturbance which occurred on Thursday last among the men of the 5th Battalion Munster Fusiliers at Limerick; whether these men (militia) are, contrary to usage, compelled to lie under canvass, and that, owing to rain and defective arrangements, their bedclothes, &c., have been wet, and there is danger of sickness ensuing; and whether a sum of 2s. 5d. per week has been taken off the men's pay, and, as universal dissatisfaction has been excited, whether steps will be taken to improve their condition, and revert to the original position of the Force?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The General Officer at Cork has reported that this Militia battalion was encamped for training; but as after two days incessant rain the bedding and camp furniture became saturated, the men were, under medical advice, transferred to billets. After a day in billets, the equipment being quite dry the battalion returned, with the medical officer's concurrence, to camp. No stoppage was made from the men's pay; but, being under canvas, they get no lodging or ration allowance. Nothing is known of any general dissatisfaction or defective arrangements or anticipated illness.

H.M.S. EGERIA.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether any petty officer or seaman has already been sentenced to punishment in connection with the alleged disturbance on board the Egeria, on Good Friday; if so, will he state in each case the offence charged, the constitution of the Court, and the sentence imposed?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): If the hon. Member will refer to my answer to a similar question on June 24, I think he will find all the information he asks for.

MR. PICKERSGILL: Has it been stated how many persons have been punished, or have we been informed what was the constitution of the Court?

LORD G. HAMILTON: Yes, Sir.

MR. PICKERSGILL: Have we had the names of the officers who composed the Court?

LORD G. HAMILTON: No, Sir.

MR. PICKERSGILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman supply them?

LORD G. HAMILTON: That was not asked in the question.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I will put the question down on Monday.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when the Government will give the House an opportunity of considering Supply?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government propose to ask the House to go into Committee of Supply on a day in next week, when it will be necessary to ask for some Votes. On the following Monday I hope to proceed with the Irish Estimates, taking the Constabulary Vote first.

MR. SEXTON: Does the right hon. Gentleman mean that the Irish Estimates will be separated from the rest?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: An appeal was made to me more than once by right hon. Gentlemen opposite to place the Constabulary Vote before the House as early as possible. I am responding to that appeal by fixing it, I hope, for Monday week.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in the event of the withdrawal of the extinction of licences clauses of the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill, the Government will consider the advisability of employing a portion of the extra Spirit Duty for the purpose of establishing a penny postage within the limits of the British Empire?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: With reference to the very important communication which you, Mr. Speaker, made to the House on Tuesday last in reply to the question of the hon. and learned Member for Longford, the Government have given their most respectful and careful consideration to the dicta which fell from you, and which they do not presume to question; and in submitting themselves to the highest Constitutional Authority on matters of Parliamentary practice, they have no alternative but to withdraw the provisions relating to the fund for the purchase of licences from the Local Taxation Bill. Under those circumstances when we proceed with the Bill, we shall move to omit on the Report

Sub-section 2 of the first clause, and in Committee Sub-section 2 of the second clause. On Clause 3 we shall move to omit Sub-section 1. Clauses 5, 6, and 7 will also go out of the Bill. With regard to Clause 8, I can only leave that clause in the hands of the House. With regard to the restriction on the issue of new licences, the Government are not prepared to enter into anything approaching a contest with the House on that clause, and if, therefore, it is proposed to raise Amendments, which are on the Paper to the extent of two pages, the only course open to the Government would be to withdraw that clause also. The Government, at a later date, will take into consideration all the various proposals which have been made with regard to the funds which will be released from the original appropriation under the Bill as it stands, and they will offer their recommendations to the House in the form of Amendments or a new clause to the Bill on a future day. But the Government reserve to themselves time for the consideration of the suggestions made in various parts of the House, in order that they may, as they hope, submit proposals which will meet with the general acceptance of the House.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): May I ask if it is intended to reinstate Clause 8 in the Western Australia Bill?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I wish to widen the hon. Member's inquiry. The House is anxious for, and I may say is entitled to, some further information as to the course of public business. I, therefore, ask the right hon. Gentleman what additions he is prepared to make to the information he has already given us with regard to the immediate and the approaching course of business? The right hon. Gentleman has said that some nights next week are to be devoted to Supply, and that on Monday week the Irish Constabulary Vote will be taken. That is practically all the information we possess with regard to our prospects, and I think the right hon. Gentleman will feel we are entitled to ask, either to-day or on the earliest day that suits his convenience, for what I will call a revised edition of the statement he made a short time ago. For example, there is a Bill of very great importance in a state of very great uncertainty, and as to which there ought not to be uncertainty much longer—that is the Bill relating to the collection of tithe. We have no idea whether there is any serious intention of going forward with that Bill, or, if so, when it will be taken. I think the inference must be that it will be definitely postponed. I ask for information on that subject and on the general intentions of the Government as to proceeding with Bills or dropping them.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Can the right hon. Gentleman state now whether the Indian Council Bill, which stands for Monday, only stands formally for that day; if so, can he fix a day when the Bill will be taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I admit the reasonableness of the right hon. Gentleman's question, but I must ask for a few days in order to make a statement which may be regarded as definitive. I trust, however, the right hon. Gentleman will not assume that the Tithe Bill is not to be proceeded with, if, in the arrangements we make, we are unable to proceed with it next week. We are under the necessity of asking Votes in Supply on Thursday; and on being pressed by hon. Members as to the Irish Votes, I thought it best for the convenience of the House to state that Irish Supply would be taken on Monday week. The business for to-day and to-morrow will be found on the Paper. I hope it will be possible to complete the Debate on the Second Reading of the two Police Bills to-morrow. I think hon. Gentlemen opposite will agree that those Bills should be referred to either Standing or Select Committees. If it is not possible to read those Bills a second time to-morrow, then I shall have to ask that they be read a second time on Monday. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has prepared a Memorandum explanatory of the character of those Bills, which should, I think, be of considerable assistance in discussing them. I will state to-morrow what the business will be on Monday. It will be obvious that the business on the Paper to-night offers very few opportunities for difference of opinion. The Government do not propose to re-introduce Clause 8 into the Western Australia Bill. I am not able to state when the Indian Council Bill will be taken, but it will not be taken on Monday. It must stand over until the more pressing Bills are disposed of.

MR. BRADLAUGH: It will not be taken on Monday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH was understood to reply in the negative.

*MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): I wish to ask when the Scotch Police Superannuation Bill is proposed to be taken, and what Supply is to be taken on Thursday?

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): Has the right hon. Gentleman's attention been drawn to the pledge given by the Home Secretary that the Scotch Police Superannuation Bill should be sent to a Select Committee?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Scotch Bill will be referred to a separate Select Committee. With regard to Supply, on Thursday it is intended to take the Army Estimates, and we shall put down the War Office Vote.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he did not give an undertaking to the House the other evening that when the Police Vote was disposed of he would put down the Colonial Vote. Will the right hon. Gentleman depart from that undertaking?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I do not think I undertook to finish any Vote. I said it would be desirable we should proceed with the consideration of the Vote; but I think it must be admitted that the Army Estimates must have precedence.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): Do I understand my right hon. Friend to pledge the Government to proceed this Session with the Tithe Rent-charge Bill, or does he decline to give such a pledge?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I did not decline to pledge the Government to proceed with the Tithe Rent-charge Bill. On the contrary, my language was in the opposite direction.

SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): Does the right hon. Gentleman propose to take the Scotch and English Police Bills to-morrow; and, if so, will it be in order for the Scotch Members to speak on the general question of police as relating to Scotland on the Debate on the Second Reading of the English Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: As the right hon. Gentleman knows, I am not an authority on points of order. But I have no doubt, Sir, that, with you in the Chair, due licence will be given to hon. Members during the discussion on the principle of superannuation, even if it should extend beyond the scope of the Bill on which the speech is made. I hope hon. Gentlemen will understand that we only ask them to accept the principle of superannuation on the Second Reading, and that, by assenting to the Second Reading, they will not bind themselves upon any question of detail.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I wish to ask whether the Government will not send the English as well as the Scotch Police Bill to a Select Committee? There is considerable opposition to referring it to a Grand Committee.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government are prepared to take either course as the House desires.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury a question of which I have given him private notice, namely, whether the Government will give facilities for the Small Holdings Bill introduced by myself and the hon. Member for East Norfolk?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: My hon. and gallant Friend will see that the opportunities which the Government have of affording facilities are very limited.

MR. CHANNING: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the postponement of the Colonial Vote will deprive hon. Members of opportunities of discussing the Agreement between this country and Germany, and will he have the Colonial Vote set down for an early day?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will endeavour to get the Vote forward as early as possible; but I think that colonial subjects have already been discussed during two evenings. [Cries of "No!"] The hon. Member will have the opportunity he desires.

MR. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): Can the right hon. Gentleman say when it is his intention to take the Navy Estimates?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am unable to say.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Will the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to say whether he intends to take the fourth notice of Motion on the Paper to-night, the appointment of the Committee on the Procedure of the House? The names have only been put down to-day, and if it is desired by any hon. Member to substitute another name, it is not possible to do so without notice.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I was under the impression that it was desirable to take the Motion to-night. It is not usual to oppose these nominations, settled as they have been in the manner with which the hon. Member is familiar.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Whether it is usual or not, is it not absolutely necessary to give notice for the substitution of a name, and the rights of Members are lost if they do not give notice before the Motion comes on? I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not persist in taking the Motion this evening, because it will be opposed.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): In regard to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that the Police Superannuation Bill is to be referred to a Select Committee, is he aware that the question of police superannuation was examined in 1877, and is not this further reference to a Committee calculated very much to delay the matter?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I should be extremely sorry, as I am sure would be the House generally, if the Bill should be delayed by the reference to a Committee. While it is true the question of police superannuation was carefully examined by a Committee some years ago, the mode of settlement proposed in the Bill has had no such examination, and I could not resist the desire of hon. Members that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee for examination of the important details in the Bill. I trust the Committee will rapidly come to their Report.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: Then I would ask that the Committee should be struck at once, and nominated as soon as possible.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Certainly; every effort will be made to secure despatch.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): With regard to Orders No. 13 and 14, the Reformatory Schools Bill and the Industrial Schools Bill, may we not have something more than a negative answer that they will not be taken to-night? There is a strong feeling among members of School Boards, especially in reference to the Industrial Schools Bill. Can the right hon. Gentleman tell us when the Bills will be taken; can he give definite notice?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Notice will be given. I am not able to say just now.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeen, W.): Is it the intention to take any other of the Army Estimates on Thursday but the War Office Vote? The Medical Vote is next, and as the right hon. Gentleman is aware, probably, there is the keenest interest taken in that Vote.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We shall only take the War Office Vote.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): Will the right hon. Gentleman give us a distinct promise that the Motion for the appointment of the Committee on the Business of the House will not be taken to-night?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No; I cannot do that.

THE LOCAL TAXATION PROPOSALS.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is proposed to allocate the proportional amounts of the Spirit Duty annually to England and Ireland, or is it to be a perpetual allocation? The Whisky Tax, of course, is passed, and will remain as a permanent tax; but I should like to know whether, in their new legislation, the Government will deal with this £40,000 for Ireland, and the larger sum for England for the year only, or will it be a general Bill to exist as long as the tax is in existence?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. and learned Member must be content to wait until he has our proposals before him on the Paper in the form of Amendments. The matter is receiving very careful examination, but when the hon. and learned Gentleman speaks of any particular tax as permanent, he must remember that it is open to every Chancellor of the Exchequer to review the taxation of the country every year. It is quite possible, not to say probable, that this tax having been imposed for a particular object, might be dealt with next year.

MR. T. M. HEALY: That is what I want to get at. We want to know, brewers and distillers naturally are anxious to know, as this tax was only put on for the purpose of compensation to publicans, which object is now abandoned, whether there will be this tax on the trade next year or not?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. and learned Gentleman must be content with my answer; I am not able to say what may happen next year.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.ALLOTMENTS ACT (1887) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 318.)

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Bill re-committed in respect of a new clause (Use of schoolroom free of charges).

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(6.10.) THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, Devizes): I move this new clause in redemption of a promise made when the Bill was in Committee that facilities should be given for the holding of meetings for allotment purposes. It is not so extensive as an Amendment for a similar purpose in the name of the hon. Member for North Bucks, but I think if the Committee will look at it the clause does make the necessary provision for a meeting place.

New Clause—

“Any room in a school receiving a grant out of moneys provided by Parliament may, except during ordinary school hours, be used free of charge for the purpose of an inquiry under this Act, by the County Council or any Committee appointed under this Act; but any damage done to the room and any expense incurred by the person or persons having control over the room on account of its being so used shall be paid by the County Council.”

—brought up, and read the first and second time.

(6.12.) MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): I move an Amendment in no hostile spirit to the present proposal, nor do I, by raising a dilatory Debate, wish to hinder the progress of the Bill through the House. It is needless for me to say that I share the opinion of many Members on this side that the Act of 1887, with this amending Act, is unsatisfactory and incomplete, and will rather tend to delay the settlement of the Allotments question in a broad and statesmanlike manner. But I have never sought to hinder this or similar measures on behalf of the bulk of my constituents, nearly all of whom are of the agricultural class. I have welcomed any measure, however incomplete, that would tend to improve the meagre income of the agricultural labourer, or alleviate his sometimes very hard lot.

Hon. Members will not be surprised that I have put down an Amendment for the purpose of somewhat widening the effect of the clause, and, as I think, of improving it in the direction I have before advocated. For five years past, in this and the preceding Parliament, I have sought by Bill, Resolution, and conversations in Supply to try to persuade the Government and the House to adopt the principle that the village schoolroom should be open to the use of the rate-payers for local or national purposes, because I have felt it right that the rate-payers, who contribute towards the maintenance of the building, should have the use of it as occasion arises. There can be no doubt that a great necessity arises in villages for the use of such a large room on certain occasions. I am sure those who have contested rural constituencies since the Act of 1883 first called the rural population to the councils of the nation, must have been impressed with the necessity of a room of the kind for public meetings. As a rule there is no other building but the schoolroom available. In my own constituency, in some 80 villages, there are not more than four or five places where a room can be found for public meetings and we were plunged into dire necessity to find places to speak in. But the gesture of the Chairman warns me that I must not pursue these remarks. The object of my Amendment is not, of course, to hold political meetings, but in order that inhabitants of a village may have a place to hold their meetings, and discuss questions having reference to allotments. The necessity exists for such a place of meeting, for discussing matters affecting the public interest of the locality, rate-payers have a claim for the use of these buildings, and I go further, and say that in various Acts Parliament has conceded the right. The Parliamentary Elections Act of 1872 authorises the use of such schools for polling places, and there is in the words of the 6th Section an indication of why Parliament made this provision by reference to “any school receiving grants out of moneys provided by Act of Parliament,” and in the opinion of Mr. Forster, expressed at the time, “it is no more than fair that the school room should be so used.” In my opinion this amounts to a recognition of the claim that ratepayers have upon the use of the schoolroom. This right was further confirmed by the Allotments Act of 1887.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): It may, perhaps, save the hon. Member a long speech if I presume to interrupt him, and say that we are prepared to agree to his Amendment in this form, "or for the purpose of holding any public meeting necessary under this Act."

MR. H. GARDNER: I am afraid I could not accept that Amendment. It is obvious that any meeting necessary under the Act is restrictive, and goes little beyond the clause as it is. I have in view meetings not necessary under the Act, but meetings of those interested in having the Act in operation, or desirous of representing their views as to the desirability of taking certain land for allotments. I was referring to the Allotments Act of 1887 in support of my contention that Parliament has recognised the right of the ratepayers to the use of the village schoolroom for meetings for local or national purposes. I mention this because it has been contended that in the Parliamentary Elections Act the State exercised a supreme right, and appropriated the schools for a national or Imperial purpose, but by the Allotments Act Parliament admitted that schools should be used for local purposes also. In the same sense is the clause now before us, and which I want to widen. It is obvious that for the actual purposes of the Act the school must be availed of, the inhabitants having no other place for public meeting. I am perfectly willing to accept any Amendment which will not defeat the object I have, that the ratepayers should have the right to use the schoolroom for the purpose of discussing any proposition in relation to the Act. I am ready to provide that such meetings shall be convened by not less than two ratepayers of the parish in which the school is situated, and that these shall be responsible for any damage to the room. I think I have made my meaning clear, and need not detain the Committee further. I only wish to impress upon the Government the importance of this matter in rural districts, and I shall certainly, if it is resisted, carry my Amendment to a Division. Let me point out to hon. Gentlemen opposite, who represent agricultural constituencies, and make suave speeches to their constituents, that by voting against this Amendment they will be practically closing the mouths of rural communities, and preventing the carrying out of the Act.

Amendment proposed,

In line 5, after the word "Act," to insert the words "or for the purpose of holding public meetings to discuss propositions as to allotments under this Act."—(Mr. H. Gardner.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(6.27.) MR. LONG: The suggestion made by my right hon. Friend was not with any intention of limiting meetings to be held for the purpose of arriving at conclusions with reference to allotments, and the clause is brought forward in no niggardly spirit. We have no desire to prevent the fullest inquiry and discussion locally into allotment questions. I accept the spirit of the Amendment, although I think that its words are too vague, and require modification. I trust that it may be possible for the hon. Member, or the Committee, to frame an Amendment which shall express more clearly the meaning we are all agreed upon.

(6.30.) MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I congratulate the Government on the reasonable manner in which they meet this proposal. I think it very important that some such arrangement as is here suggested should be arrived at, and that my hon. Friend would do well if he would accept the offer made by the Government.

MR. H. GARDNER: I accept the proposition made by the Government, and will, therefore, withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(6.31.) Amendment proposed,

In line 5, after the word "Act" to insert the words, "or for the purpose of holding public meetings to discuss any question relating to allotments under this Act or the principal Act."—(Mr. H. Gardner.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR W. PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.): I do not think that the proposed addition to the clause will exactly meet what is wanted, as it would only give power to the County Council, or to any Committees appointed under the Act, to make use of the rooms.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): Do these words include the principal Act? I do not think they do, and I think the principal Act ought to be inserted.

MR. BARING (London): I must protest against the way in which this question has been raised. The claim now made is based on the ground of the interest of the ratepayers in the school buildings; but a large majority of the schools are voluntary schools, to which the ratepayers contribute nothing whatever. The Government, however, seem to be so enamoured of surrender that I am not surprised at their giving way. It is not conducive to the peace of a parish that its schools should be liable to the incursion of any agitator who might choose to stir up perfectly contented villagers to demand allotments.

MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.): A certain number of meetings will be absolutely necessary under the Bill—meetings at which the labourers may have the opportunity of fairly considering the proposals they wish to submit to the Local Authorities.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I do not believe that the managers of any of the voluntary schools would be narrow minded enough to object to the clause, as amended.

*MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I may state in illustration of the advantage of this proposal that in my own village meetings have been held for the formation of an association to carry out this object, and they have met with the co-operation of the Conservative Governors of the school.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, added to the Bill, and reported.

Bill, as amended, considered.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 3, page 2, line 22, to leave out the word "may" and insert the word "shall."—(Mr. Long.)

MR. STEPHENS (Hornsey): I think it a very ungracious and unnecessary thing to over-ride the discretion of the County Councils in this matter. It is impossible for us to judge of all circumstances in different parts of the country where the County Councils have to act, and surely we may trust them to do their duty without fettering their discretion in this way.

MR. LONG: This is not a question of the discretion of the County Councils. It is simply a provision that the Inquiry must be held by the County Council.

MR. STEPHENS: I accept the statement of the hon. Gentleman.

Amendment agreed to.

Other Amendments made.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a third time."

*MR. CHANNING: I do not wish to raise any objection to the Third Reading of the Bill. Hon. Members on this side have taken no objection to the Bill itself. The object of the Instructions we put on the Paper has been simply to prove that this question will never be satisfactorily settled until other matters which the Government have not seen fit to introduce into the Bill have been embodied in an Act of Parliament.

MR. J. COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): I must congratulate the Government on having passed this Bill. I am certain it will prove a great relief from existing difficulties and be the means of facilitating the operation of the existing law so as to prove an immense boon to a large number of people.

CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): And I, Sir, have to express my absolute uncertainty on the same subject.

*MR. COBB: I am exceedingly grateful to the Government for the manner in which they have met us as to the use of the schoolrooms, and I shall not make the remarks which I intended to make on the Third Reading.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

BARRACKS BILL.—(No. 234.)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 5.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: On this clause I beg to move, in page 4, line 3, after the word "money," to insert the words—

"and such estimate shall be laid before Parliament as soon as possible: Provided, that in framing such estimates regard shall be had to the provision of local centres for the combined training of the Regular and Auxiliary Forces, and the renewal and improvement of existing barracks and camps, and not to the provision of permanent accommodation for additional forces at great central camps."

I understand that the Secretary of State proposes under this Bill to establish a great central camp at Aldershot, but in doing this the right hon. Gentleman will be defeating the plan of localisation which has been sanctioned by successive Governments and the House. We know that this Bill was smuggled through the House unexpectedly at a late hour in the evening when there was not time properly to discuss it. For my part, I admit the necessity of providing new barracks; and on this subject I think we have hitherto greatly neglected our duty, the existing barracks being for the most part in anything but a wholesome or sanitary condition, and unfit for the purposes of localisation. In my belief we shall have to spend not only the £4,100,000 provided by this Bill, but a considerable sum beyond that. When in India my attention was called to discussions which took place with regard to the provision of barracks, and the enormous sums expended and the blunders made in regard to those buildings. My impression is that before we have done with the barracks of the United Kingdom and our colonies, if we really put them into an efficient state, we shall have to spend a much larger sum than is provided for by this measure. I have long been of opinion that it is not desirable to concentrate the Army, and that it is much more desirable to carry out a good localisation scheme. We want a National Army for defence not defiance, and for this purpose we must have efficient barracks at Aldershot and other places. I deplore the fact that up to the present moment a system of localisation has not been carried out. If a large body of troops is to be concentrated at Aldershot or in any other locality, the result will be to cause the divorce between the Regular and Auxiliary Forces, which I regard as one of the greatest evils of the day, to be greatly exaggerated. I am confident that I have justification for what I say, because, on the very day when the Report of the Second Reading of this Bill appeared, there was a letter published in the Times from a very distinguished General—General Adye, than whom there could not be a higher authority—giving expression to the very views I have ventured to submit to the Committee. Sir John Adye, writing to the Times on May 24, said—

"The Minister for War, in his statement of February last, did not by any means limit his proposal to the removal of defects. On the contrary, he specially said that our troops were dribbled away throughout the country, and that the main object was concentration. It will be observed, for instance, that no less a sum than £1,475,000 is put down for Aldershot alone, and that in addition to the considerable force of infantry already there, it is contemplated to build barracks for the permanent location of six more battalions; and the same scheme, on a smaller scale, is to be carried out at other places. According to my judgment, the principle of permanently massing our regular troops at a few stations is a faulty one, and is in entire opposition to the policy pursued of late years. The localisation of the depôts in the various counties, which was commenced by the late Lord Cardwell, was with a view not only of bringing our soldiers more into touch with the civil population, but of more closely associating them with the Militia and Volunteers. So far as it has gone, that measure has been very successful in popularising the Service, in facilitating recruiting, and in improving the Auxiliary Forces. I do not wish to imply that the massing of our troops of all arms, and of Regulars, Militia, and Volunteers, for purposes of instruction at the military camps, is not in every way advantageous. Such a system should be carried out annually. But these should be temporary and not permanent arrangements; and the regiments coming from a distance should be encamped. Camp life of itself is instructive to young soldiers, and healthy at the same time. The permanent concentration of the Regular Troops at comparatively few stations at home, thus isolating them, as it were, from the civil population of the various counties, I hold to be a bad principle. It is also to be observed that the proposal, costly as it is, does not add a man or a gun to the strength of our Army, and looking at the numerous and constant requirements of the Empire—in various parts of the world for garrisons, armaments, and other preparations, it appears to me that careful inquiry should be made before the country is committed to a vast expenditure for arrangements, founded chiefly on a principle of a doubtful character."

I think it will be admitted, after reading that extract, that I do not act without authority in bringing this subject before the House. I will only quote from another letter which appeared in the Times, dated May 26th, and signed

"Major General." This Major General does not altogether agree with General Adye, but he agrees with him as to the localisation of the Forces. The Major General says—

"Sir John Adye, in his anxiety to throw stones at our Administration, with which he has never been connected, has contrived to draw attention to the scheme originating from Lord Cardwell in 1872, which one may fairly say has cost the country some millions of money, with the result now of entailing in patchwork a few millions more. This was the establishment of county depôts, an excellent plan in theory, but one which has been, is, and will be always, most costly in its practical uses. These barracks were built of a stiff uniform pattern, without reference to either the population or the military requirements of the district, to hold a staff of about 240 soldiers of each regimental depôt, and without apparently any notice of the proper requirements of the Auxiliary Forces of the district. The consequence is that, with two or three exceptions, like Lichfield, Warley, and Fleetwood, there is no accommodation for the Militia battalions of the county when out for training, and the Militia and Volunteer Permanent Staff have to be provided with extra quarters at a very large addition to the lodging list, and a corresponding swelling of the annual Army Estimates. As they now stand, they cost nearly £1,000,000 a year, with the result of an unsufficient training to the Line recruit, and the dissatisfaction of the officers commanding Militia battalions as to the training of their own recruits. Sir John Adye blames the concentration of troops at military stations, but he forgets that at isolated stations there are few facilities for training troops or for rifle ranges at the long distances now required by the new arm; and though he proposes that they should be massed temporarily for these purposes, he should know that in these days the training of both horse and foot must go on uninterruptedly, summer and winter, in the same manner as the Royal Artillery. Even in General Sir John Adye's muzzle-loading days, they were compelled to keep up the instruction which deservedly now places that arm of Her Majesty's Service in the van of all other military nations. No doubt the sum asked for by Mr. Stanhope is large, but it is the result of the parsimonious cutting down of barrack estimates that has characterised every Administration up to the present time."

I do not think that there could be a stronger opinion than that. I think these are very strong authorities to justify me in saying that I think Her Majesty's Government ought to devote more of this money to increased localisation, and I think £1,000,000 a year might be saved if you only had proper barracks. I was very much struck by some words which fell from an eminent authority at the time of the Debate on the Channel

Tunnel Bill. He said that we need not trouble ourselves about Channel tunnels, but should rely on our land defences. I have long urged that we are living in a fool's paradise. Our Army is dispersed all over the world, and we very much need a good and efficient land defence. An Army might be hurled upon us from the Continent, and the only efficient means of resistance is an effective combination of the Auxiliary and Regular Forces—in fact, a National Army. We have the Return obtained on the Motion of the hon. Member for Bradford showing that at this moment we are spending £38,000,000 on our defences, though I believe with what is to be spent on barracks the sum is nearly £40,000,000. Instead of listening to old women about the Channel Tunnel, I say it would be much better that we should look to our land defences. A first step to the real and efficient localisation of the forces is to provide barracks which the authorities I have quoted tell you are necessary. Take Switzerland, where every man is trained for the national defence, and where may be seen an example which we might very well imitate. But if you want to exercise men in large masses, you must bring them into camp and under canvas. That will teach the men to help themselves and fit them for real campaigning. Therefore, Sir, I very much protest against this huge centralisation, and against this distrust which Sir John Adye and others seem to have of localisation. The best way of securing ourselves is to have a great National popular Army, and which, being popular, will not be aggressive. Now that there is a popular Army in France that country is the least inclined to aggression, and Ministers immediately become unpopular who invite danger to the nation. I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 3, after the word "money" to insert the words "and such estimate shall be laid before Parliament as soon as possible, provided that in framing such estimates regard shall be had to the provision of local centres for the combined training of the Regular and Auxiliary Forces, and the renewal and improvement of existing barracks and camps, and not the provision of permanent accommodation for additional forces at great central camps."—(Sir G. Campbell.)

(7.20.) MR. HANBURY (Preston): Mr. Courtney, there is a good deal, I confess, in the Amendment brought forward by the hon. Member, but I think we are entitled to a little more information from the Secretary for War as to the methods by which the barracks are to be kept up and the purposes for which they are going to be built. We have heard so much about the unsanitary dwellings of the troops and the danger to the life and health of many of them that we want to be sure that, in connection with the barracks that are going to be built, the money will not be wasted in the same way. On what system are they going to be built—by contract or competition, and with the supervision of engineers? We have seen the rascally kind of buildings run up for the London School Board. I want to see that our troops, at any rate, are not housed in buildings of that kind. I want to know exactly what precautions my right hon. Friend has taken against dangers of that kind so far as our barracks are concerned. Not only have we had experience of the Board School buildings, but we have had experience of the barracks at Bedford, as to which a local Surveyor reported the other day. I should like to know who is going to be the person positively responsible for these buildings. We have had the responsibility shuffled, first on the doctors by the engineers, and then on the engineers by the doctors, in respect of the barracks to which I refer; and I think we ought to have some positive information, before we spend all this money, as to who is going to be responsible for the sanitary arrangements of the buildings. I do hope my right hon. Friend will trust a little more to the men who are actually sent, and a little less to Surveyors and officials of that kind. Take the barracks at Dublin, for instance. Commissioner after Commissioner, and Surveyor after Surveyor reported that the houses were theoretically right. Then, at last, they sent a man who took up the floors, and found that everything was as bad as it possibly could be. I should like to know, also, over what period of time this work is to be extended. We know very well that, so far as many of the existing barracks are concerned, the matter is very pressing indeed. I think we ought to know something as to the scheme for the concentration of the troops. First one Minister, and then another, brings forward some proposal. Is this a new-fangled scheme of my right hon. Friend, and does he intend to upset the localisation scheme? The localisation is beginning to work effectively for the first time, and, though the present system is not by any means perfect, it is working a great deal better than it did. If my right hon. Friend interferes with that system, I believe he will have very great difficulty with regard to recruiting, whether trade revives or not. If he draws men away from their localities, I am sure he will not get either so many or so good a class of recruits as in the past.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I do not interfere in any way with the scheme of localisation.

MR. HANBURY: I am very glad my questions have brought out that fact. I wish to know whether my right hon. Friend is going to concentrate the First Army Corps at Aldershot or not. It is very important to know that. And what is he going to do with the Second Army Corps, which is not in existence yet? There is a feeling in the North that its home ought to be in the North. I think the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy is entirely met by the statement of my right hon. Friend, and I congratulate him upon having given so clear an enunciation of his views; at the same time, I must warn him against the danger that this scheme of his will be a mixture of two schemes—a scheme of compensation on the one hand, and of localisation on the other; and that he will not get the advantage of either scheme. That is a danger which certainly occurs to me. Although I agree, to a certain extent, with the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, I must say that my objections are largely removed by the statement of my right hon. Friend.

*(7.25.) SIR W. BARTTELOT (Sussex, N.W.): I was very glad to hear my right hon. Friend say that it was absolutely necessary that the various arms should be concentrated. I have always urged that the First Army Corps should be seen so that the country might know that it was effective and efficient. It is said that it is so on paper; but what we want is that we shall be able to see it in reality. We shall have an opportunity, no doubt, when these new barracks are built, of seeing the First Army Corps in all its abundance at Aldershot. There can be nothing more important than these proposals to improve the sanitary conditions of the dwellings of our troops. It may save discussion if my right hon. Friend tells us whether he is going to distribute troops in certain strategic positions where they can be available for the large towns at a moment's notice. I should like to know how that scheme is being carried out. As to the cavalry regiments, I understood him to say that all small detachments should be done away with and the regiments concentrated in one place; this would, indeed, be a great improvement. In Manchester, for instance, the cavalry regiment now quartered there are to have new barracks at some convenient station not far from Manchester, where they can have plenty of space to drill. These are questions which deserve careful consideration. We have got £4,000,000, a certain portion of which is to be spent every year. We should like to know that the money will be expended, notwithstanding changes of Ministers, on lines that will be approved by the House of Commons. These new arrangements, as described by my right hon. Friend, are, I am satisfied, in the best interests of the troops, and it is a pity they were not made long ago. I am quite sure that whatever sum of money is spent, if it is only applied in the interests of the Army and to the improvement of the health of our soldiers, the public will not grudge it.

*(7.29.) MR. E. STANHOPE: The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy based a large part of his speech on certain correspondence in the Times, especially that of Sir John Adye. I am not going to depreciate the authority of Sir John Adye, but I must say I prefer his practice to his theory. Sir John Adye's recommendation to the Secretary for War was that he should spend money, not on increasing accommodation at local centres, but on re-building the permanent camps. But if you look at the figures of Sir John Adye, you will find that the work he recommended to be carried out would, at the rate of progress then made, take, at least, 150 years to accomplish. With regard to the localisation of the Forces, I will say at once that the scheme before the House in no way interferes with that scheme. I believe the scheme is working well, and I have not the smallest desire to interfere with it in any way; but I will do all in my power to make it more effective. The present scheme is necessitated, in the first instance, by the lamentable condition of many of our camps and barracks. It is necessitated also by our desire, if we do build barracks, to concentrate our troops more than we have done before. We hope to concentrate to a very considerable extent batteries of Artillery, so that there shall be, wherever possible, at least two batteries together, and, when possible, three. With regard to cavalry, we hope to be able, in certain circumstances, to enlarge the barracks, so that each may hold one complete regiment. In the case of Manchester, we propose to build a completely new cavalry barrack at some distance from the town, and to get rid of the present barrack, which is in a very inconvenient position, and certainly is not suited for the purpose to which it is now devoted. A large sum would have to be spent in putting the present building into a good condition; and we think it better, on all grounds, to remove the troops to a point some little distance from Manchester, where they will be available on short notice for any service for which they may be required. We have not yet decided what that place shall be, but we hope before long we may be able to arrive at a decision.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.): What does the right hon. Gentleman propose in relation to the cavalry in Birmingham?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: We shall certainly not keep those cavalry barracks. We think there is every ground to justify us for removing the cavalry from Birmingham. I have also been asked questions with reference to concentrated camps. Our policy has been to try and concentrate infantry in great camps. This has been done at Aldershot and the Curragh, and in one or two smaller camps. This we believe to be an enormous advantage. We think our small army will be made much more efficient if our infantry can be concentrated with a small amount of cavalry and artillery, in order that they may practice manœuvres, as is done in other countries. It is very difficult in this country to find a space in which manœuvres can be carried out, but Aldershot seems to supply the best means for the purpose. We do not think we shall be able to get all the troops of the First Army Corps together at Aldershot, but we hope a large proportion of them will be concentrated there, and we are keeping the regiments first for service up to their full strength, in order that we may be able to meet any sudden demand for sending abroad a force of 8,000 or 10,000 men. I have been asked whether we intend to try the experiment of concentrating the First Army Corps. I assure my hon. Friend who put the question that I believe we could carry out that experiment with the greatest success, but we do not do it because of the enormous expense it would involve. The cost of a similar concentration in the South of France last year was enormous, and the same would be the case in this country. The hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) asks how the new barracks are to be built. They are going to be built by contract. Plans are being prepared, and tenders will be called for.

MR. HANBURY: Under what system of competition—a pretty general competition?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Yes; there will be very general competition. The hon. Member also asks who is responsible for the sanitary state of the new barracks. I have explained to the House that I think, on the whole, the safest and the best way of assuring that our new barracks are built on sound and sanitary principles is to re-constitute Lord Herbert's Sanitary Committee.

MR. HANBURY: Who will pass the barracks?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: There will be power in the Sanitary Committee to make an inspection of any barracks at any time, so as to see whether the plans they pass are carried out. I am perfectly satisfied that with this supervision we shall be able to provide new barracks on a thoroughly sound principle. My hon. Friend asks how long it will take to carry out the scheme. It must take some years; I do not myself entertain any hope that we can complete the whole of the scheme in less than seven years. We intend to deal first with those cases in which the sanitary requirements need the greatest attention. On the whole, we think that it is the best course. I hope we shall be able to complete the work in a shorter period than I have mentioned, but I should be deceiving the House if I held out confident expectations that we could complete the whole of the work not only in England but in the Colonies within a less time than I have mentioned. As to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), I have only to say that I am wholly unable to accept it, and I hope the hon. Member will not press it.

*(7.39.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): The right hon. Gentleman very properly and clearly pointed out to the House the distinction between what we term the localisation of the Army and the distribution of the troops quartered at home. The localisation of the Army is a term which has come to be well known, and implies a scheme by which recruits are obtained and perform the first part of their drill in this country. It has, however, nothing to do with the stationing or quartering of regiments. Without having any strong opinion on the subject myself, I think I may say, with some confidence, that the Military Authorities have the greatest objection to the idea of any regiment being necessarily quartered in any particular part of the country. All that was attempted to be done by the localisation scheme was to secure connection in recruiting between a certain district and a certain regiment, and to bring the Auxiliary and the Regular Forces as much as possible in harmony. I agree with the hon. and gallant Member for Horsham (Sir W. Barttelot) that there are too many Brigade Depôts or dépôt centres, as they are sometimes called. They are too small, and in many respects are not as efficient as they might have been. This was brought about by the necessities of the time when the scheme came into existence, and was largely occasioned by the necessity of consulting the prejudices and jealousies of the different counties. But to attempt now to do away with some of these depôt centres, where the buildings have been erected, and to replace them with others would involve an enormous expense. The scheme of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War is a scheme for shifting to a certain extent the quarters where the troops serving at home are distributed, and generally putting the barracks throughout the kingdom in a more habitable condition. I am bound to say that the right hon. Gentleman appears to me to have approached a very difficult question with much courage as well as discretion. I think those who know most about it will probably be strongest in their opinion that it is most undesirable to keep small detachments of troops isolated in towns, and frequently in most unfavourable circumstances, both for health and discipline. Of course, the original object in scattering the forces in that way was that they might be more ready to assist in the preservation of the peace, but the whole railway system has been brought into being since that distribution was made. I know there has been a good deal said by distinguished officers, whose opinion I value very highly, against the concentration of troops in large camps. One distinguished officer has published the opinion that the troops should not be kept in barracks, but ought to live in their own homes. I cannot say I share the opinion that this is either desirable or possible at the present time, and I think there is great advantage in establishing at Aldershot and one or two other places in the country an aggregation of corps of the different arms, so as to enable them to receive thorough training. By this means I hope there will be avoided those frequent movements of troops, which are so costly to the country, and which occasion so much inconvenience to all concerned. As I have already remarked, a point on which the House of Commons has not received sufficient information is the most material one of whether the number of troops for which we are now providing improved accommodation is really required in this country at all. It may be so, but we have no reason to believe that this matter has been carefully gone into in view of the recent changes made in the military and naval defences of the country. Allusion has been made to the First Corps d'Armée, and a hope has been expressed that it may be brought together at Aldershot. I am in a very incredulous and sceptical frame of mind about the First and the Second Corps d'Armée. I know the right hon. Gentleman believes in them firmly. For my own part, although there may be some utility in having an organisation of this kind, as it may serve as a limit up to which to build, as it were, I never have been able to see why we should endeavour to form our troops at home, being, as they are, a reservoir for various foreign services, into an organisation which is more fit for Continental warfare than for any purpose to which they are ever likely to be devoted in this country. As to the sanitary question, I think it is rather too hard that we should always have the Royal Barracks in Dublin, and other barracks which are in an insanitary condition, brought forward as instances of what the new barracks are to be. The old barracks are insanitary because they are built on the old sites, and many of them on cess-pools.

MR. HANBURY: I distinctly alluded to the Bedford Barracks, which were built recently.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: At all events I think the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. E. Stanhope) has taken what will be an effective course in re-appointing the Sanitary Commission. I hope my hon. Friend behind me will not press his Amendment, because the object at which it aims is really the same object as the right hon. Gentleman has in view as far as it is compatible with the conditions of our Service.

(7.50.) MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): Allusion has been made to the popularity of the Army, and I am certain we shall never keep up the popularity of our Army until we keep our troops in good barracks. I wish to ask my right hon. Friend whether in the new barracks accommodation has been provided for married officers. At the present time a great many field officers are married men, and they either have barrack accommodation in the shape of a hut at Aldershot or a lodging allowance of £60 a year. I believe that under this scheme these officers are only to have two rooms, which, of course, is insufficient accommodation for a married man.

I hope my right hon. Friend will give this question his attention.

*(7.52.) MR. ROUND (Essex, N.E., Harwich): I am glad to hear what the Secretary of State for War has said, as to the further concentration of our Military Forces under the provisions of this Bill; and I believe the Committee will approve of the re-appointment of the old Sanitary Committee. I wish to ask my right hon. Friend for some information respecting the proposed alterations in the barracks at Colchester. A Parliamentary Return has been sent to Members showing the amounts proposed to be spent upon the different barracks, and I was surprised to find that there was a smaller sum allotted to Colchester out of the Vote for £4,000,000 than to any other camp. My right hon. Friend went down there the other day and inspected them, and no doubt he observed the unsatisfactory condition of the huts occupied by the Infantry. Those huts were built for the accommodation of the German legion nearly 40 years ago. And I think that if huts elsewhere are to be replaced by brick structures these should be included. I would press on the right hon. Gentleman the urgency and the necessity of thoroughly re-constructing the huts in the interests of our young soldiers.

(7.54.) MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): I wish to add one word to what was said by the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Jeffreys) in regard to the officers' quarters. There are some barracks which not only have no provision for married officers, but have none for single officers, and I would submit to the Secretary for War the expediency of providing accommodation for officers in the barracks of the brigade of Guards in London.

*(7.55.) SIR F. FITZWYGRAM (South Hants): In the remarks I wish to make I am afraid I shall place myself somewhat in opposition to the views of many officers. I agree that the concentration of troops is absolutely necessary, but I think it should not take place in barracks. My idea is that we should have for the use of our troops two central canvas camps, and that the troops should be sent there for about six weeks' practice a year. The adoption of such a system would, I believe, be equally valuable to the officers in command and to the men. There are, I think, only two uses in the concentration of troops. The first is to give practice to general officers, and the second to accustom troops to camp life. Six weeks' practice in tactics and manœuvres, so far as general officers and colonels of regiments are concerned, would be quite sufficient. If a man who has attained to the rank of a field officer cannot pick up the aptitude of handling bodies of troops in six weeks I do not think he is likely to do it at all. I have seen colonels come to Aldershot unable to handle troops, stay there for two years, and be unable to handle troops when they leave. I attach the greatest possible value to the training of senior officers. But I think the officer who gains most from the system of concentration ought to be the commander-in-chief. He is, or ought to be, constantly over at Aldershot watching the manœuvres of the troops and ascertaining the capacity of the senior officers. Having gained a knowledge of their capacity he would be able on the outbreak of war to employ those officers whom he found best able to handle troops. The gain in concentration of troops is to the senior officers. Company officers learn absolutely nothing. It does not make the slightest difference to a company officer whether there are 10,000 or 100,000 men in the field, because he simply has to take the word of command from his senior officer, and the same as regards the rank and file. The gain to the soldiers is, or at least ought to be, knowledge of camp life. I want to see the soldiers trained to camp life. At present, as far as all practical knowledge of camp life is concerned, men leave Aldershot just as ignorant as they go there. The men are on the Barrack Establishment. I should like to see them under canvas. I should like to see live oxen and sheep driven to Aldershot and killed and cooked there. I should like to see the bread ration abolished, and flour served up and bread baked in camp kitchens. Everyone who is acquainted with life in the field knows the privations from which men suffer, who are untrained to life under canvas. How, on the other hand, when they have got used to it, they make themselves perfectly comfortable and happy. Camp life, like other life, requires practice—it cannot all be learned in a day.

Instead of building great barracks at Aldershot, York, and Curragh, I think the barracks should be built for the men in their county towns where their friends live. I am sure they would feel happier and better, and I believe more good would be done than by anything else to promote the recruiting of the Army. It may be said that commanding officers require to be under a general and brigadier to brush them up. I do not deny that a good many commanding officers are a great deal better for being under a general for a short time, but I deny that it is good training for a commanding officer to be constantly under the eye of a general, inasmuch as he ought to be ready to take responsibility upon himself. I look upon out-quarters as most valuable. If officers learn to act for themselves when they are young they become more fitted for taking higher commands. This is especially the case in regard to cavalry regiments, the officers of which, in time of war, have constantly to perform duties which require a good head and plenty of self-reliance. If they are always kept together at headquarters they will never have the opportunity of acting for themselves. I have seen a good many regiments at Aldershot which had been long quartered together, which were on arrival perfect in parade movements, but which were found to be very deficient, when they came to be knocked about in manoeuvres. I utterly deny that there is any advantage to be gained by building large permanent barracks at York or Aldershot. To my mind it is merely the perpetuation of an evil system.

*(8.5.) Mr. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I wish to draw attention to the question of the material to be used in the construction of the Irish barracks. I am willing to admit that a very considerable amount of this money is to be appropriated to works in Ireland. I would point out, however, that the designs for the new buildings are made in the War Office in London, and are based on the assumption that English building materials will be used. I would submit to the right hon. Gentleman that it is only reasonable the Department should make some effort to utilise as far as possible the materials to be found in Ireland. It would not involve any additional expense, but, on the contrary, would be attended by considerable economy. It is hardly reasonable or proper to carry stone from England to Ireland, where plenty of stone for building purposes is to be found, and still such things have been done, and I called the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the fact about a year ago. I would also draw attention to the question of the designs for the barracks. Those designs do not appear to have improved with the improved ideas respecting buildings of other characters in this country in recent years. They seem to have in the War Office a stereotyped form, which they always stick to.

(8.9.) MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I would point out, with reference to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir G. Campbell) that, if carried, it would have the effect of reducing the Aldershot Division to about 3,000 or 4,000 men. The hon. Member suggested that canvas should be substituted for barracks. I do not think, if the hon. Gentleman were under canvas himself from now to Christmas, it would conduce to his morale or efficiency.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I did not suggest that they should live permanently under canvas, but that they should be under canvas for six weeks in the summer.

MAJOR RASCH: I am sorry if I misunderstood the hon. Member. With regard to the Aldershot huts, they are in an absolutely ruinous condition, and those at Colchester and Shorncliffe are very much the same. At Shorncliffe, when I was there, the men had to shift their cots round the huts whenever there was a change of wind, because the rain absolutely drifted through the walls. I would suggest that you are not likely to encourage recruiting to house a man in a sort of inferior cowshed. Allusion has been made to the opinion of Sir John Adye. He is, no doubt, a general of great experience, but I do not think his name carries great weight among some Members of this House. He is principally known to Members as being the Director General of Ordnance at the time when the 35,000 swords which bent and broke and gave such unsatisfactory results in the Soudan Campaign were obtained, and he is also known as being a distinguished advocate of the Channel Tunnel. The hon.

Gentleman suggested that the depôt centres should be improved. I think he is quite right, but we must remember that the present Secretary for War has done a great deal for the depôt centres, and that it is owing to his energy and courage in the matter that nearly 90 per cent. of the Militia regiments that used to be in camps are now in barracks. The hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) is quite right in asking that due supervision shall be exercised with reference to the building of these new quarters. I think he is perfectly right. We do not want to see repeated the fiasco that occurred in Belfast some time ago when the plans got mixed, and a building, with verandahs and so on, intended for Hong Kong, was put up in Belfast, while the Belfast plans were sent to Hong Kong. I think the War Office officials are entitled to commendation for the way in which they have elaborated the present schemes.

*(8.13.) MR. E. STANHOPE: I have been asked to consider the question of officers' quarters. The plans for officers' quarters in our camps have been considered thoroughly satisfactory by the architects whose opinion has been taken upon them. With regard to Colchester, I admit a good deal remains to be done there, but the camp there is incomparably better than those at Aldershot and Shorncliffe.

*MR. ROUND: Does the right hon. Gentleman think the huts are better?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Certainly I do. A good deal of money must be spent at Colchester, and I do not want to be tied down to the precise sums given in our Estimate. I saw there were palpable and gross evils that ought to be remedied at Colchester. The hon. and gallant Member for Hampshire (Sir F. FitzWygram) has practically admitted that his views were not shared by the majority of officers in the Army, and in that he is quite right. Certainly, the officers I have consulted are absolutely unanimous in favour of the concentration of troops at Aldershot and elsewhere as best calculated to advance the interests of the Army. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) has asked me whether the present number of troops is required. That matter has been very carefully considered by the Government. I do not believe at all that we have too many troops, looking to the fact of the increasing demands made upon us to supply increasing garrisons at our coaling stations. May I hope that now we may be allowed to proceed with the remaining portions of the Bill?

(8.17.) MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): I should like to know whether it is proposed that anything should be done with the barracks at Dover? I have seen those barracks, the floors of which are absolutely reeking with moisture. Surely men ought not to be required to reside in such a place, at any rate when there is no actual war proceeding.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The barracks at Dover will be dealt with in the course of the present year.

(8.19.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I thought I was going to be sat upon all round; but I think the speech of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Hampshire (Sir F. FitzWygram) fully justifies me in taking the course I have adopted. That speech was the speech of a practical man. It seems to me that Secretaries of State for War are morally coerced by the opinions of the military men by whom they are surrounded. These men wish to have a large Regular Army, and dislike to be muddled up with what they call second rate Auxiliaries. I am not entirely without knowledge of this matter. I have seen a great many troops, and I was particularly struck by what the hon. and gallant Gentleman said with regard to the accommodation of troops. It so happened that I was with the first column at Delhi in 1857. I was surprised at the extraordinary difference between the men who had been in camp and those who came from England. Those who had been in camp were healthful and good in every way, but the new troops were utterly helpless. They could do nothing for themselves. Now, so far from objecting to improve defective barracks, I have expressed the opinion that before you have done you will spend a great deal more than £4,000,000 on the work. It seems to me that the Secretary of State disposed of the question of localisation in a very light and airy way. He says the War Office do not intend to interfere with localisation in the least degree; but I do not find from the Schedule of the way in which this money is to be spent a single farthing is to be spent on localisation or local centres. I maintain that you are starving out the system of localisation. If localisation is not to be interfered with why are you bringing six more regiments to Aldershot? I confess the Secretary of State has thrown a new light on this matter. I have always supposed, and I think others have, that localisation meant localisation of the troops, but the right hon. Gentleman tells us, under the advice of the military gentlemen surrounding him, it means nothing of the kind, that localisation never contemplated the localisation of troops, but the localisation of recruiting districts. I do not think the country has understood that that is what is meant by localisation. But as both sides are against me I do not think it is well I should go to a Division. I will only ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has any objection to the first part of my Amendment, namely, "that such Estimates shall be laid before Parliament as soon as possible."

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am afraid I cannot undertake to adopt that.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Then I submit myself to the opinion of the Committee.

LORD H. BRUCE (Wilts, Chippenham) was understood to say that it was proposed to do now what ought to have been done previously year by year.

(8.27.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I am anxious to receive some information as to the alterations at the Royal Barracks, Dublin. I understand that a very large sum of money is to be spent on the Dublin Barracks; but I have heard from Royal Engineers and others competent to form an opinion, that instead of pulling down the barracks and building them again what ought to be done would be to do away with the old wood flooring which is promoting the disease in the barracks. The War Office find they can get this money very easily, and I suppose they mean to spend it easily. I would suggest that an independent inquiry should be instituted into the condition of the Royal Barracks, because I am convinced that what is needed could be done at a much less cost than is contemplated. Also, I should like to know what is going to be done at the Curragh, whether any portion of the money is going to be spent there? Not long ago we received very unsatisfactory replies from the right hon. Gentleman as to the sanitary condition of the permanent barracks there.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: There will be at least £420,000 at the Curragh.

DR. TANNER: And at the Royal Barracks?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I cannot give the exact figure, but a considerable sum of money will be required to be expended there.

DR. TANNER: Then, is a great portion of the existing structure to be pulled down?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Only a portion, because the walls are not strong enough to support the stores we propose to place there. The main portion will not be pulled down.

(8.30.) Question put, and negatived.

Clause agreed to.

(9.7.) SIR G. CAMPBELL rose.

DR. TANNER: I beg, Mr. Courtney, to call your attention to the fact that there are not 40 Members present.

(9.7.) THE CHAIRMAN: In the face of the fact of so large a number of Members having been recently in attendance it would be trifling with the House to count. Sir George Campbell.

(9.8.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

(9.8.) DR. TANNER: Am I to understand, Sir, that I am not within my right—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

(9.8.) DR. TANNER: Am I not within my right—seeing that half-an-hour has elapsed since there was the large attendance to which you have referred, and that there may not be the number of Members in the premises—in calling your attention to the state of the House?

(9.9.) THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! There is authority for my action, and I am acting upon that authority. Sir George Campbell.

(9.9.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg to move the omission of Clause 6, which gives power to the Treasury to borrow or raise money for the purposes of the Act. I say, as I have said before, that I do not object to spending money upon barracks, provided that the money is raised in the right way; but I object to this un-Constitutional and unjustifiable method of borrowing money in a time of peace and of great prosperity, when there ought to be plenty of money in the Treasury. No doubt we are indebted to the head of the Foreign Office and the Ministry for the fact that at the present moment we have complete peace; but it is because we have that complete peace that I object to the extraordinary and preposterous proposal to borrow money for a necessary public purpose. Barracks are a necessary purpose. If we keep up an Army we must have barracks to house the men. The barracks we have are insufficient, and it seems to me that if we have spent too little on them in previous years we ought to take advantage of a good and prosperous year when we have a surplus, and make up for the insufficiency out of that surplus. I find that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton raised the question on the measure for Naval Defence last year, and showed that the plan proposed by the Government was without precedent, and that, when spending money on a similar object, Lord Palmerston had only borrowed from year to year, taking Parliamentary sanction for what he did each year. I hold that this year there is no necessity for borrowing, seeing that there is plenty of money in the Exchequer, and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made provision for paying away large sums for purposes which are absolutely unnecessary, and which are distasteful to the majority of the people of this country. According to the figures obtained by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) it seems that the cost of the defences of the country has reached an enormous amount, namely, £38,321,433. But that is not all, because we now have this expenditure on barracks. We are this year finding £300,000 out of the Budget surplus for barracks. I should like to know if that is all we are going to spend this year?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Yes.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Then I think it ought not to be. To my mind a great deal more should be spent, if all we hear is true with regard to the Dublin Barracks and the Aldershot huts. The proposal of the Bill will give the Government power to borrow without coming to Parliament, and that I hold to be a very objectionable power, which should not be allowed. The Government proposal, moreover, seems to me very like the old evil practice which has been so strongly condemned in times past of granting enormous subventions in aid of local rates. No doubt the people who get the subventions—

Sir G. Campbell

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

SIR G. CAMPBELL: My argument is that this money is given in a way that it ought not to be given, and that the barracks ought to be built out of the surplus, and not out of money borrowed for the purpose. The Government, it seems, are going to put off the construction of the barracks.

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member, I presume, does not wish to misrepresent my statement. I asked the Secretary of State for War what was the maximum amount he wished to spend this year, as I was prepared to find out of the Revenue of the year the sum required. I was assured that the amount stated in the Bill was the maximum which would be required for the present year. We take no power to borrow in future years.

(9.18.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg, Sir, to call your attention to the fact that there are not 40 Members present.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

DR. CLARK: There are not 40 Members present, Sir.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member cannot be aware of the circumstances under which I have just declined to take notice of a similar observation.

DR. CLARK: Are there 40 Members present?

THE CHAIRMAN: Sir George Campbell.

(9.20.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: The Government, I suppose, can borrow money in future years without coming to Parliament for sanction, and that is what I object to. It puts us in a very difficult position. We have heard from the Secretary for War that the condition of the Dublin barracks is extremely bad—that some of the officers have been dying—and it seems to me that the necessities are so great that there will be a remissness on our part if obtaining power to raise £4,100,000 we do not spend more than £300,000 in the present year. We are told on the highest authority that Lord Palmerston did not ask for authority to borrow money in future years, and that for the permanent defences of the country he only borrowed the money he required for the then current year. What are the Government doing by this clause? They say, "We do not want to borrow money during the present year, but we want to take this matter out of the hands of future Parliaments." That is to say, they want now, in a thin House, when almost everybody is away at dinner, and 40 Members are not present, to take power which will enable them to spend money in future years without coming to Parliament for power to do so. They want to escape from the control of Parliament, and to be able to snap their fingers at this House. The proposal is distinctly un-Constitutional, and on that and every other ground I am entitled, I think, to move that this clause be deleted.

Amendment moved, pages 4 and 5, to leave out Clause 6.—(Sir G. Campbell.)

(9.25.) DR. TANNER: I trust the Committee will have an opportunity of dividing on this clause. I would ask to be allowed to say that when I moved a count just now it was quite as much for the purpose of letting the Members know that you, Sir, had taken the Chair as for any other purpose. I wished to give hon. Members an opportunity of being present in their places, and of assisting in the discussion of this question. I trust, Sir, that you will pardon my making this remark. When the messenger from the House goes down into the Lobby and says, "The Chairman is in the Chair," nine hon. Members out of ten do not hear him, and do not come and take their places. It was for the purpose of bringing them in that I called attention to the fact that there were not 40 Members present. I have called attention to the fact that a large number of these barracks are in a bad state. I will not refer to the matter any further now, but will leave it to the responsibility of the Government. I will only say that it appears to me extraordinary that at a time when they have a surplus of £3,500,000 the Government should come and ask us to pledge the country to the extent proposed in the Bill. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had all the facts before him at the commencement of the Session. He knew this large amount of money was to be spent in fixing up the barracks in England, Ireland, and Scotland, and I think it would have been far wiser on his part to have devoted the money of his surplus to this purpose rather than to an attempt to enrich the publicans of the country. If he had done this it would have been far more in the interests of economy and he would have found himself in a far happier position than that which he now unfortunately occupies. However, it is never too late to mend, and I sincerely trust the right hon. Gentleman will accept the advice which has been tendered to him by the hon. Member who moved the Amendment, and omit this portion of the Bill. If he does not do that, at any rate let him agree to pay this money out of the surplus that may accrue next year. I did not rise for the purpose of prolonging the Debate, as I think it would be unwise to do so, but unless we receive some reply from a responsible Minister of the Crown we shall have to divide the Committee.

(9.29.) MR. GOSCHEN: I cannot complain of hon. Members like the Member for Kirkcaldy keeping an eye on the proposals of the Government, but I must say I think he has not quite appreciated those proposals. We have followed the precedent of 1872, save that during the present Session I have thought it right to pay the amount necessary this year out of the surplus. And in regard to the execution of great works, we have followed the course of not allowing the cost to fall on one particular year, and have taken power to borrow in future years. If we had borrowed no money during this year, the charge would fall on following years. In what we are doing we are really bearing our share.

(9.31.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I quite admit my mistake with regard to the present year, but I think the observations of the right hon. Gentleman enormously strengthen my position. The Government are going to borrow in future years, though they do not know whether the money will be wanted or not. We have the precedent set by Lord Palmerston in regard to very large defence works in borrowing money for the current year and not for future years. It does seem to me a very grave and serious consideration. How do we know what will be the state of finance next year? It is extremely probable that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not require to borrow next year. Why should he take away from a future Parliament the decision whether or not the money should be borrowed? I am convinced that this is a great Constitutional question, and I must go to a Division.

(9.35.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 134; Noes 79.—(Div. List, No. 160.)

Amendments made.

MR. E. STANHOPE: The object of the clause I am about to move is solely that when a question of compensation arises it shall be settled by an arbitrator instead of by a Jury.

New Clause—

"Where land is acquired under 'The Defence Act, 1842,' and the Acts amending the same, the compensation to be paid for the land may, if both parties agree, be settled by arbitration, instead of by reference to a Jury, and thereupon the provisions of the Lands Clauses Acts shall apply as in the case of an arbitration under those Acts,"

—brought up, and read first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the clause be now read a second time."—(Mr. E. Stanhope.)

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON: I hope, Mr. Courtney, we may regard this clause as likely to be thoroughly effective in practice. I say that because I believe the question of the defences of the Forth has been retarded by the impossibility or difficulty of acquiring lands for the purpose.

MR. E. STANHOPE: I can only hope that the principle of the clause will be effective.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause read a second time, and added to the Bill.

Bill reported as amended, to be considered to-morrow.

Sir G. Campbell

WESTERN AUSTRALIA CONSTITUTION (RE-COMMITTED) BILL.—(No. 256.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 1.

(9.50.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I have to move that this clause be postponed until the other clauses have been dealt with. I think I shall be able to show that the other clauses all hang together on this clause. It is unfortunate that we cannot discuss the Bill as a whole, because it is a measure which appears to me to involve large political considerations.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member can hardly enter into a general discussion on a Motion to postpone a clause.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: This is the clause which gives responsible Government to Western Australia. As long ago as about the year 1850 an Act was passed which enabled the colony to reform its own Constitution, subject to the condition that such reform would require Her Majesty's assent, after a Bill on the subject had been laid before Parliament. This clause removes that disability, and enables Western Australia to reform its Constitution without coming to Parliament at all. It seems to me that the clause involves an enormous Constitutional question, namely, whether we are to hand over a large part of this enormous continent to a mere handful of people—something less than the population of a third rate English town. I have, of course, great sympathy with the principle of self-government, and if it were the sole object of the Bill to confer a popular form of Government upon the people I should not oppose the clause, but if it turns out, as I think it will, that this proposal is not to establish a popular Government, but an oligarchical Government, which the people of Western Australia do not want, I think the House would do well to pause before passing this part of the Bill. What this Bill proposes to do is to hand over to the colonists complete, absolute, and uncontrolled power over this enormous territory, the main part of which is unoccupied and unexplored.

(10.0.) THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that his Amendment is merely to postpone the clause, and he must confine himself to that Amendment.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg pardon; I was just about to approach that subject. When this Bill was in Committee my hon. Friend the Member for Carmarthen-shire moved the postponement of this clause, for the same reasons as actuate myself. We have been told distinctly and positively that the colonists will not have a responsible Government unless they get complete control over the whole of Western Australia, a demand which, I think, ought not to be satisfied. The form of the Constitution to be given to Western Australia was not thrashed out before the Committee. We were told that the question was practically settled by the Second Reading, and that that was not a matter for the Committee. I agree with my hon. Friend below me, who has taken great interest in this question, that if we are to give up this territory and to confer on the colonists the enormous powers they ask for, they ought to be given to a popular Government, and not to a narrow oligarchy. The Select Committee which considered this subject sat for 10 days, during nine of which they took the evidence of official witnesses in support of the Bill, and on the 10th they heard the evidence of another witness on one specific objection. As other witnesses were not then forthcoming, the Committee did not think it desirable to take any more witnesses, and they refused to hear the evidence of one competent individual whom I tendered as a witness.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not see how this line of argument can be made relevant to an Amendment to postpone Clause 1.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Very well, Sir, I will pass from that. My reason for moving the postponement of the clause is that the Committee did not hear both sides of the question. I protested against the matter being hurried over because there were delegates in this country whose object was to get this Bill passed as soon as possible. Only one day was given to the consideration of the Report, which was gone through as though the House was dealing with a Provisional Order Bill. I think the House will probably give very careful consideration to the matter before it passes this Clause. The origin of this demand for responsible Government was this—Western Australia is a somewhat old colony—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member has given notice of a Motion to postpone Clause 1. I do not see how his present line of argument bears on that Motion.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Then I will postpone my observations on that point until we come to the Clause to which they will be more relevant. Why I ask the House to postpone the Clause is, because delegates have come from Australia who say they do not want the provision unless they get control over this land, and the question of that control is dealt with in Clause 3.

Amendment proposed, "That Clause 1 be postponed."—(Sir G. Campbell.)

(10.9.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): It is very disagreeable to me to differ from my hon. Friend, but as we were both Members of the same Committee, I may be allowed to say a word for two on the observations that have fallen from him. So far as I know, the Members of the Committee entered upon their inquiry without any unfair prepossession or bias, although they might have had their leanings. But the hon. Member brought to the work a tremendous bias.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Certainly.

MR. J. MORLEY: The hon. Member has just made a Second Reading speech, but what the Committee had to do was to accept the Bill as having been read a second time. The hon. Member says we were too rapid. Well, we listened with the greatest patience to the evidence that was tendered, and to many questions which did not seem to all of us to be very relevant; and so far from being very rapid we were exceedingly deliberate. He says that certain evidence was refused. He refers, I believe, to the case of a certain Mr. Simpson.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: And Chief Justice Onslow.

MR. J. MORLEY: The only evidence the hon. Gentleman offered to produce was that of Mr. Simpson, who could not be found when wanted; but Mr. Simpson called upon me, and the result of a long conversation was to show that the evidence of Mr. Simpson would have gone against the contentions of my hon. Friend. I asked Mr. Simpson, "Are you in favour of reserving these lands to the Home Government?" And his answer was, "Certainly not; you must leave the control of all the lands to the Western Australians." If my hon. Friend doubts my recollection I can show him the memorandum I made of the conversation. On the point that we only took one day to consider the Report, I would remind the Committee that we listened to all the arguments that were adduced for the clauses, and gave all the weight we reasonably could to the arguments my hon. Friend produced and reiterated, and I do not believe that if we had spent a week over the Report we should have been in the least likely to come to the conclusion offered by the hon. Member. If this House is to be relieved from the immense burden of work that presses upon it, it must confide matters of this kind to well chosen Committees. I believe that all sides of the House are agreed as to the Report of the Committee in the case of this Bill, and I ask, what will it avail to refer a measure of this kind to a well chosen and assiduous Committee if, after the House has assented to the principle of the Bill by reading it a second time, all the details are to be threshed out again on the floor of the House? Unless there are some more cogent reasons than have been adduced, the Committee will be embarking on a most mischievous course if they now lend themselves to a re-discussion of all that has been settled by the Second Reading, and authorised by the Committee.

*(10.16.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): I think I can add very little to the observations of the right hon. Gentleman. I should be contravening your ruling, Sir, if I were to answer all the arguments of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy. It will be remembered that when the principle of the Bill was affirmed on the Second Reading, it was determined by the House to refer it to a Select Committee for the purpose of disposing of the very details now raised. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy has repeated an argument that the Committee to whom the Bill was referred had not an opportunity of hearing evidence on the other side.

Mr. J. Morley

The fact, however, is, that no such evidence was tendered, the only witness who came forward being a witness adverse to the hon. Member himself. He mentions Chief Justice Onslow, but that name was never mentioned.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I mentioned it to the Chairman.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: He may have mentioned his name, but he did not produce him as a witness, or say that he intended to do so. All the evidence he produced was in the form of a letter from a gentleman in Albany, who desired some fanciful division of South Western Australia, and the formation of a district which he would call "Albania." As to the argument that in the Committee itself the question was raised of postponing Clause 1, the hon. Member omitted to state that on a Division three Members, including himself, voted for that proposal, and 11 against it. Therefore, this Committee may reasonably assume that the question has been thoroughly threshed out in the Select Committee. The Government cannot agree to the proposal of the hon. Gentleman. The Committee devoted a great deal of time and careful attention to the consideration of the Bill, and to postpone Clause 1 now would be to re-open the whole question, which was decided by the House on the Second Reading.

(10.20.) MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): I sincerely trust that the hon. Member will withdraw the Motion. If he has any suspicion of Members who sat on the Committee having been biased, at any rate I cannot be accused of any bias against the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy on this question. If I had been on the Committee I should have endeavoured to get what evidence I could in support of the view I held, and still hold, against the principle of the Bill; and if that evidence was not forthcoming on the Committee, it was the fault of those holding the opinion of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy. We have had a most careful inquiry, and I think that besides the Report presented to the House, there are other considerations, which I cannot enter into, which make it enormously important that a settlement should be arrived at on the question without further delay. I have never altered my opinion that the principle on which the Government are acting is a wrong principle. I cannot give my reasons for that. If I had an alternative proposal to offer I should oppose the Bill, but I have no alternative proposal to that which is contained in the provisions of the Bill; and seeing that that is so, and that if we can do nothing else we have at least an opportunity of cementing the alliance between Australia and the Mother Country, I trust that, the Bill passing rapidly through, we shall at last finish this much-agitated matter.

(10.23.)* MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): It is difficult for independent Members to exercise any influence upon the Bill at this stage on account of the understanding that seems to have been arrived at by the two Front Benches that the Bill shall pass. There has been no opportunity for a full Second Reading Debate, especially as regards the larger and more Imperial aspects of the subject. I think the Committee should not have confined itself merely to reviewing the evidence of witnesses tendered on the part of Western Australian Colonists, but should have taken means to get full evidence bearing upon the whole question of the policy on which the Bill is based. It was in that sense that the Bill was referred to the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is wandering from the Question before us, which is the postponement of Clause 1.

MR. BOLTON:* It is proposed to postpone this clause, with the view of considering a later Amendment of the hon. Member which will raise the question of the reservation of a large portion of the lands of this colony to be controlled by the Imperial Government, or by the Associated Colonies of Australia. It is difficult to discuss the question raised by the hon. Member without reference to the circumstances under which the Second Reading of the Bill was passed. It would appear, however, that the two Front Benches are adopting a Parliamentary manoeuvre for the purpose of forcing the Bill through, and I warn them that in so doing they are not acting in accordance with the desires of the people of this country. I gladly support the proposal of my hon. Friend.

(10.26.) MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I must say that when an hon. Member who has not distinguished himself in connection with Australian affairs comes forward and accuses Members who have been assiduous in their devotion to the interests of the colony of being party to a Parliamentary manoeuvre, he cannot have a great regard for true Imperial interests. As to witnesses being brought against the Bill, none came, and for a very good reason—because in Western Australia there is no opposition to the Bill. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy said that the delegates in favour of the Bill were sent over here at the public expense; but we can rest assured that if there had been any genuine feeling against the measure its opponents in the Colony would have found the money somewhere to bring them over to give expression to their opposition. Although I did not have an opportunity of attending the meetings of the Committee I obtained evidence from delegates from Western Australia, and I am in a position to say that there is a unanimous feeling in favour of the Bill in the Colony.

(10.29.) MR. W. A. M'ARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid., St. Austell): I think the House will hesitate before it accepts the views of a Metropolitan Member and a Scotch Representative in preference to the unanimous opinions of the people of the Colony interested. Every Australian Government, without exception, not only supports the Bill, but has instructed its Agents here to press it forward in order that its passing into law may not be delayed. In face of facts like these it is simply trifling with the time of Parliament and wasting opportunities which might usefully be utilised otherwise to thresh out for the twentieth time matters which have been definitely settled by the House, and about which the people of Australia are in absolute unanimity. I trust the hon. Member will not think it necessary to obstruct the Bill any further.

(10.30.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I may be allowed to say a word of explanation. I cannot enter into the question which has been raised by the last speaker. I maintain that it is not a question as to whether the Australian people are united on this subject, but whether the people of this country wish to part with that territory. I think that my right hon. Friend (Mr. J. Morley) is mistaken in regard to the evidence of Mr. Simpson, who is the friend and associate of the Member for the Albany Division of Western Australia. Mr. Simpson is strongly in favour of retaining a large part of the temperate southern territory, and of not giving in a hasty way responsible Government to Western Australia. I will not, however, press the matter further now; it is, perhaps, better that we should reserve what we have to say until we reach Clause 2.

DE. CLARK (Caithness): I am opposed to the policy advocated by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, but I could not conscientiously support a Bill which contains a number of pernicious principles. I cannot support a Bill which lays down a land qualification which, I believe, will play into the hands of the squatting minority.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy has withdrawn his Amendment. The hon. Gentleman is anticipating a Debate which may arise later on.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*(10.33.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I would not intrude myself upon the attention of the Committee if I had not been requested to bring the point dealing with my Amendment before the Committee by certain persons in Western Australia with whom I am connected. I say at once I am heartily in sympathy with the general principle of the Bill, but I do not think there is that unanimous support in favour of the Bill in the form in which it is laid before the House, either in Western Australia or in Australia generally, which is claimed for it. Everyone in Western Australia wants responsible government, and the land to be in the hands of the people; but the delegates who have brought forward this question and those who have framed this Bill, are, in my opinion, wishing to obtain the control of the land for a section of the community, whereas those for whom I speak wish to get the control of the land for the whole of the community. What I have to propose is to add at the end of the clause—

“Provided that such Order in Council shall not be made until the said Scheduled Bill has been amended in the following particulars (that is to say) by the abolition of the property qualification for a Member to be elected to the Legislative Assembly, and by omitting ‘and’ in line 24 of Sub-section (3) of Section 39, and inserting ‘or’ instead thereof.”

The practical effect of the latter part of the Amendment would be to substitute for the £10 householder and lodger franchise proposed by the Bill manhood suffrage. What the Bill proposes is that there should be a property qualification both for the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly, and until six years have expired, and until the population has increased to 60,000, the Upper House has to be a nominee House. Hon. Members who know anything about Australia know that in the other Australian colonies the qualification for the Lower House is that a man should be on the electoral roll; that manhood suffrage is the basis of the franchise; and that in most colonies a six months’ residence only is required. We may be told we have no right to deal with this question. It is perfectly within our power to withhold our assent to the Scheduled Bill, and I think we would be amply justified in doing so if we can show that the people of Western Australia are not in favour of the details of the Bill. My point is that we ought to postpone this matter till a Bill is framed which really represents the wishes of the great majority of the Western Australian people, and I can call no better evidence of the substantial ground on which I am asking the Committee to come to this decision than that of the late Governor, Sir F. N. Broome, who, before the Select Committee, said—

“If the question of the property qualification were to be put to the whole people of Western Australia, they would reject the property qualification by five or six to one.”

I think that we ought to do everything we can to get a loyal support in Australia, and this we can do by following the instincts and wishes of the people. I must complain of the action of the Colonial Office in not taking the opportunity which was open to them two years ago, when the first draft Bill was sent over to them to deal with this question. Instead of adopting the advice of Sir F. N. Broome, that the Legislative Council should be made an Elective Council, the Colonial Office insisted that the Upper House should be a nominee House. The Colonial Office lost a favourable opportunity of winning the approval and consolidating the good will of the masses of Australia. I shall be told that we ought to go by local opinion [Mr. J. MORLEY: "Hear, hear."] My right hon. Friend cheers that. I will give some local opinion. I will give the opinion of Mr. Hensman, the leader of the popular Party in Western Australia, a man whose integrity and sound judgment, I am sure the Colonial Secretary will be ready to admit. His point is that the property qualification is not fair in Western Australia, for the simple reason that there are many suitable men who have not the means to serve with this qualification. He says:—

"There has been great difficulty in this poor community, where every one almost works for his living, in getting 17 men who have the property, and are willing to give up two or three months a year to the work."

That is as to the existing Council. Turning to the provisions of this Bill, he says:—

"The Bill proposes two Chambers—the Council with 15 members, and the Assembly with 30 members. They cannot get 45 men with the qualification who will be content to give up one third of the year to do this duty. The property qualification is absurd here.

The great objection is that it will prevent a number of honest men, who may be in all other respects suitable, from giving their services to the public. . . . The intention of this clause is to keep the management of affairs in the hands of the clique who now rule the roost. In no other colony is there any property qualification for the Lower House. It will be a different Constitution from the other self-governing colonies of Australia, and this at a time when federation is being insisted on."

The opinion of Australians has been referred to. Well, Sir Samuel Griffiths has said that the property qualification of this Bill is not only an anomaly but an absurdity, and in one of his despatches Sir F. N. Broome drew attention to the fact of the great difficulty of obtaining a sufficient number of qualified men to serve on these Legislative Bodies. He drew attention to it in words which have special bearing on the character of this Bill. He said, for instance, in 1884 that there were not enough men in the colony with sufficient leisure and means to serve in the way required. Mr. Parker, one of the delegates who gave evidence before the Select Committee, drew attention to the fact that when the question of the property qualification for the Lower House was before the Legislative Assembly, a great majority of the elected representatives of Western Australia voted for the abolition of the property qualification in this Bill, and that the property qualification in the Scheduled Bill was only retained by means of the votes of the nominee members. Allusion was made, in the evidence, to an election which took place two years ago when this Bill was under discussion in the town of Perth, which contains one-fourth of the whole population of the colony, in which election the candidate who stood on the platform of manhood suffrage and the abolition of the property qualification was returned by an enormous majority. Therefore, I think I am justified in saying that public opinion, as expressed by the evidence of Sir F. N. Broome, by the votes of the elected representatives of Western Australia, and by a test election that has taken place on this question, is clearly in favour of the contention I have laid before the Committee. What adequate reason, then, does there exist for our giving the Australians this narrow and stunted Constitution against the will of the people? We have two reasons given in the evidence laid before the Committee. One reason is given, and given freely enough, by Sir F. N. Broome, in a despatch dated April 14th, 1888, and covering a Petition against responsible Government sent to Her Majesty's Government, and signed by 80 or 90 of the leading capitalists and monied men in Western Australia. He said—

"This Petition is signed by a body of most respectable and sterling settlers, every one of whom has a substantial stake in the colony. I do not think this Petition can over-ride the expressed wish of the Colonial Legislature, but it may be taken in evidence of the wisdom of not casting the new Constitution in too Radical a mould. The Conservative minority in this community is strong, not only in property qualification, but also in sober judgment and sound sense; and the views of those who compose it should weigh, at least, so far as to lead Her Majesty's Government to guard the new Constitution very carefully against mob rule."

The franchise, then, is to be restricted with the deliberate intention of protecting the monied classes from what Sir F. N. Broome calls mob rule. I shall be much surprised if I find any of those who sit around me and claim to be Radicals, agree with that interpretation of the duties of the State towards the people of Western Australia. I state that this is one reason for this Bill which was given in the evidence before the Committee. There is another and absolutely contradictory version given, and that is given by Mr. Parker, a delegate who came forward on behalf of the Legislature of Western Australia. He poses as the representative of the Popular Party, but I have considerable doubt as to his legitimate claim to figure in that part. He gave as a reason for wanting this Bill that, as soon as the people get this Constitution, they will be able to sweep away the property qualification and the restricted franchise, and they will take steps to break up the land monopoly in Western Australia, by passing a Land Tax and Succession Duty similar to that passed in other Australian Colonies. I doubt this view, and believe the view put forward by Sir F. N. Broome. The whole history of the origin of this Bill shows that it has been promoted and shaped by a narrow clique of moneyed men who do rule, and have ruled, and wish to continue to rule, the destinies of Western Australia. It is a Bill to enable the moneyed men of Western Australia to retain the control of the land question in their own hands. It is the Bill of those who wish to take the lion's share of land grants, such as the blocks of 12,000 acres per mile along the Albany and Beverly Railway—of those who wish to pick out the "eyes" of the land. It is said that the nominees of the Lower House will, of course, acquiesce in the resolution of that House in favour of abolishing the property qualification. Is that at all likely, when we have the evidence before us that when this Bill was before them the nominee element deliberately kept the property qualification in defiance of the wishes of the elected Representatives? I move this Amendment not only because I have been requested to do so by Western Australians, with whom I have been in constant correspondence, but because I feel that the lowering of the franchise and the abolition of the property qualification are essentially necessary in the interest of those English, Scotch, Welsh, and Irish immigrants who carry their strong hands and stout hearts to Western Australia, but who by this squatter oligarchy will be excluded for years to come from taking any share in the rule of the colony either as electors or as Members of the Lower House. As a Radical I claim that they, as British subjects, have a right on going to Western Australia which is British land, thank God, and hope will remain so—to share settling questions which affect their interests and the interests of the colony which they have attached themselves. I say that, in the interests of those men who we expect to build up a great future for our colonies, and with the object of knitting more closely the feelings of cordance and friendship which exist between the colonies and the Mother Country, we ought, at least, to give the colonists fair play.

Amendment proposed,

At end of clause, to add the words "Provided that such Order in Council shall not be made until the said Scheduled Bill has been amended in the following particulars (that is to say) the abolition of the property qualification for member to be elected to the legislative assembly and by omitting 'and' in Section 39, Section (3), page 13, line 24, and inserting 'or,'—(Mr. Channing), —instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

(11.0.) BARON H. DE WORMS: I doubt whether the hon. Member has considered the Bill before the House, because he seems to have come to the conclusion that the proposed qualifications inserted in that Bill. The hon. Member seems to have overlooked the fact that the Western Australians themselves introduced this property qualification in the scheduled Bill; and though the hon. Member claims to speak on behalf of the Western Australians, the Committee will be inclined to accept the clauses of the scheduled Bill in preference to the authority of the hon. Member himself.

MR. CHANNING: Does the right hon. Gentleman contest the fact that the elected portion of the Legislature voted for the abolition of the property qualification?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Yes; but the property qualification remains as the result of the deliberations of the Legislative Assembly. They ought to be the judges of what they themselves desire. By the 32nd section of the 13th and 14th Vic. Western Australia and other colonies have the right exclusively to ferred upon them of making what conditions they like as to the qualifications for electors and elected Members. That is so, and I need not waste time upon arguing it. The hon. Member admits the Act confers that right, and in accordance with that Act they have inserted the provisions which are contained in the scheduled Bill. When the hon. Member says these provisions do not express the views of the people of Western Australia he must be aware that Mr. Hensman, to whom he has alluded, is a member of the Western Australian Legislature, and had an opportunity of expressing the views the hon. Member expresses by proxy. His views were not the views of the majority, and Mr. Parker, to whom the hon. Member has alluded, is the leader of the Liberal opposition in the Western Australia Legislative Assembly, and therefore, I think, as qualified and as able to express an opinion as the hon. Member. The Legislature in Western Australia Responsible Government will have the power of altering these qualifications when and if they think fit by subsequent statutory enactments of their own. If the hon. Member will look at Sections 5 and 73 of the schedule of the Bill he will see they will have that power, and they may some day use it. We have not the right or the power, under 13 and 14 Vict., cap. 50 and 59, to deprive Western Australia of the right conferred on the colony by Statute. [Cries of "No!"] If hon. Members will take the trouble to read they will see that I am correct. [Cries of "Read!"] It is so; the reference is open to any hon. Member—

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Order in Council, 30 days before this House.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: That power, I say, was given to Western Australia by the 13 & 14 Vict., caps. 50 and 59; and if hon. Gentlemen introduce this Amendment to the clause, it will simply have the effect of defeating the Bill. The Western Australians would not accept it; and they would be perfectly justified by Statute in refusing it.

*(11.5.) MR. T. H. BOLTON: I am not altogether opposing the Bill on the ground on which my hon. Friend (Mr. Channing) opposes it. I think it is very likely people in Western Australia, having at the present time responsibilities of Government, know the sort of qualifications that will probably suit the infant colony under its new conditions. They may think it desirable for a time that the suffrage should be restricted and that there should be qualifications for Members sitting in their Parliament; but if the arrangements are found to work unsatisfactorily, I have no doubt there will be sufficient force in public opinion to enlarge the suffrage and improve the arrangements connected with their Elective Assembly. I am, therefore, not prepared to oppose the Bill on that ground. But this Bill proposes to vest in this new Representative Assembly the full control of a vast territory—

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment moved is directed to an amendment of the schedule, and the hon. Member must confine himself to that.

*MR. BOLTON: Do I understand that I cannot refer to the original Motion in connection with the Amendment moved upon it? I am discussing the Amendment, but this does not deprive me of the opportunity of referring to the original proposition.

THE CHAIRMAN: There is no original Motion. An Amendment is moved to the clause. After that is disposed of, the question of the clause itself comes forward.

(11.8.) DR. CLARK: I had hoped for some information from the Under Secretary, but we only get an argument based on the statement that the people of Western Australia desire to have a property qualification, and will only have the Bill on this condition. As a matter of fact, the people of Western Australia—the bulk of them—the big majority of their elected Members, have voted against this property qualification, and the property qualification is only there because of the influence of Members nominated by a Government who have jobbed away millions of acres of land. These, with a small number of elected Members, have introduced the property qualification to keep power in the hands of a ring. The whole influence of the Government is based upon inaccurate information, and instead of retorting upon the hon. Member that he should seek information, the right hon. Gentleman should give us evidence from the colony. He will find the difference is as between 10 and 7. I am very anxious that Responsible Government should be conferred upon Western Australia, knowing how this House treats all these colonial questions with contempt, and hon. Gentlemen opposite do not like to be troubled with these things which affect a bigger country than this, and likely to be greater than this has ever been; but I cannot support a Bill that will throw power for some time into the hands of men who have misused that power and have jobbed away millions of acres of land. I would support a Bill for a Constitution similar to the Democratic Constitution of all other Australian Colonies; but against the wish of the majority of the elected Representatives you are thrusting this Constitution upon the colony. The majority of the elected Members were against it, and only the nominated element carried it. It is for the purpose of retaining power in the hands of those who have misused it. Why should a man of £5 or £8 rental be disqualified, and the man who pays £10 be qualified? It is an absurdity in modern legislation. Why the exclusion of ministers of religion? We may have such men here, and often in the colonies the leading men are ministers of religion, who devote themselves to the support of religion. But you are going to disqualify this class, and why? I can understand a Clerk in Holy Orders being disqualified because he is a State-paid official, and by disrobing he can qualify himself. Then, again, if a man absents himself from illness, or any other cause, for two months, he loses his qualification at once. We are not prepared to delegate to a Committee of 21 gentlemen full power of determining all these points. I am not prepared to follow the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle in maintaining this property qualification. I am strongly in favour of a Bill to confer Constitutional Government on Western Australia; but it should be a Bill giving power to the people such as is enjoyed in Great Britain, irrespective of whether a man holds a large amount of freehold property or not.

(11.13.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E): My hon. Friend is really trying to induce the Government to impose conditions against the wishes expressed by the people of Western Australia. The people there have settled the matter in Constitutional manner under the Act 13 & 14 Vict., and have passed their Bill. Wise or not in our judgment the Bill may be, but I am of opinion that the people of Western Australia are far more competent to form a judgment upon the points that have been raised than we who live so many thousand miles away from that country. We do not understand what the franchise means out there. Mr. Carter, who opposed the property qualification, said he had not the slightest doubt that as soon as the colony had this Constitution, the property qualification would be completely swept away, and the franchise would be reduced to something approaching manhood suffrage. Witness after witness in giving evidence asserted that this franchise which the Western Australian Legislature have now established is exactly the same as, or perhaps even less restricted than, the franchise originally established in the other Australian Colonies, where it has been widened step by step. It would be a monstrous thing to hang up this Bill indefinitely, and so to deprive the people of Western Australia of the advantages which they desire to acquire, in order that hon. Members in this House may give effect to their own particular views.

(11.15.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I have no wish to deprive the people of Western Australia of the Bill, and have no reluctance to entrust them with this power. I have carefully read the evidence given, and I have listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire, and certainly I think that if it is in the power of this House to make the Amendment, it is necessary to make the Bill what it ought to be. I observe the right hon. Gentleman did not read us the particular part of the schedule of the Act 13 & 14 Vict. which deals with this particular point. The right hon. Gentleman said it will be in the power of the Legislature of Western Australia to abolish this property qualification in the future, and, as I understand, it is quite within the power of Western Australia to accept the Bill with this Amendment. I conceive it to be the duty of every friend of Manhood Suffrage to support this Amendment. I approached the Bill with an open mind. I was told it was absolutely necessary to pass the Bill this Session in order that Western Australia might have the benefit of it, and I assented to that. But now I find that it is not absolutely necessary to pass the Bill rapidly if we are not satisfied with it. If it is possible to add the Amendment, and Western Australia can still accept the Bill. I hope the Amendment will be pressed.

(11.16.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): In the interest of Members who are disposed to facilitate the progress of the Bill, but take exception to details, I would ask will it be in order to propose any Amendments to the text of the scheduled Bill?

THE CHAIRMAN: No, I think not. It is a mere historical statement of what passed in the Legislature of Western Australia.

(11.17.) MR. DEASY (Mayo, W.): There seems to be a general impression that, if the Amendment were accepted, the result would be to hang up the Bill for another year. That is not so. An Order in Council may determine whether this Amendment can be accepted or not, and it will be for the Privy Council to advise Her Majesty whether the Bill should be sanctioned or not. This is an important point that influences me in my opinion whether I ought to support this Amendment. If I thought that it would have the effect of putting an end to legislation of this kind for a year I would not vote for it. I would not be a party to preventing the people of Western Australia from managing their own affairs according to their own wishes, but I feel it is essential for good government that the colony should have a really popular franchise such as obtains in the other colonies. If you restrict the franchise in the manner proposed you may rest assured that continual agitation and dissatisfaction will result, while a great deal of the property of the colony will become alienated in the interests of the few who will govern under this Bill. Whatever may be said to the contrary, half a dozen families guide the destinies of Western Australia. In a short time, no doubt, as public opinion advances, these men will have to change their views, and democratic principles will prevail; but, in the meantime, they will simply be feathering their own nests, and when the people come to look after their own affairs they will find very little to administer, inasmuch as everything worth having will have been appropriated. It will be a regretful thing if this Bill is sanctioned by Parliament in this form. I trust that the Amendment will be introduced, and I am sure it will in no way retard the progress of the measure. It has been urged again and again that the restrictive franchise will have no practical effect on the Government of the colony. If that is so, why retain these objectionable provisions; why not abolish these restrictions, and put the Government of the colony, practically speaking, into the hands of the people? I know that words are attributed to Sir Napier Broome to the effect that to lower the franchise will be to give mob rule, but I cannot reconcile this with the known condition of things. My own opinion is, that unless a Constitution similar in every respect to those which obtain in other colonies is given to Western Australia, the question will not be regarded as satisfactorily settled. You will have it reopened from time to time, I do not wish to prolong debate. I am anxious to see this Bill pass in an amended form; and I trust Radical Members, who have always been on the side of household suffrage and manhood suffrage, will not permit such a clause to go through without such an Amendment as this moved by my hon. Friend.

(11.23.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down appears to be under a misapprehension as to the powers of the House. Both he and the hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment talk as if the House were imposing a restricted suffrage upon the people of Western Australia. It is doing nothing of the kind. The power of the British Parliament is simply either to accept or reject the Constitution the colony itself has passed. The colony, under the powers conferred on it by the Act 13 and 14 Vict., c. 59, has passed a Constitution, and the House can accept or reject it, but cannot amend it. The effect of accepting the Amendment would be to refuse a Constitution to Western Australia until the House has compelled the colony to amend the Act. I cannot conceive any more offensive and tyrannical way of imposing a Constitution on a colony. It is because I am strongly in favour of Local Self-Government and of Home Rule for the colonies, and of leaving them to say that a particular Constitution will suit them, that I strongly object to this Amendment. The Committee may be perfectly at ease as to the progress of free institutions in Western Australia. The Legislature which can amend the present Constitution Act can also amend the Act to which the House is invited to give its assent, and the Committee may very well trust the Legislature to be established by this Constitution to make such reforms as may be necessary for the interests of the colony. I therefore think the Committee should give its consent to the only Constitution it is possible for the British Parliament to give.

*(11.27.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): The speech we have just heard has filled me with amazement. As I understand the right hon. Gentleman, this House has no power to amend the Bill. Then why, may I be permitted to ask, were we allowed to enact the farce of passing the Bill through Committee if we have no power to amend the Bill submitted for our endorsement?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The scheduled Bill cannot be altered; the Bill itself may be.

*MR. CREMER: We are asked to pass a Bill which creates a property qualification and confers a restricted franchise, a qualification fortunately long since abolished in this country, and a franchise restriction that has disappeared from among us. We are invited, as it were, to take a step backward by this Bill, and this I decline to do. We are asked to enact for our kindred in Western Australia restrictions against which we long ago successfully struggled, and to this, I, as a Democrat, offer my sturdy opposition. I hope that a large minority, at least, of the Members of this House will register a solemn protest against the proposals of the Government as contained in this Bill.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: They are not the proposals of the Government.

*MR. CREMER: If the Bill is not being promoted by the Government, why are we asked to consider it? The Government might as well close the Debate and tell us we must simply be dumb on the matter. If the Government are not promoting the Bill who are? Some of the proposals it contains are most extraordinary. The franchise proposed is one which the House of Commons would reject with indignation for itself, and why should it be imposed on the colony.

Sir J. Gorst

The result of the Bill will be that a certain body of persons will get all the power into their own hands. I shall, as a Democrat, offer the most strenuous opposition to this measure, and I am amazed that the leaders of the Liberal Party should give their assent to such reactionary proposals.

(11.34.) MR. J. MORLEY: I will not go into the argument whether or not my hon. Friend is a good Democrat, but I may say I am sure that my hon. Friend has only taken up his present position through thorough misunderstanding. The scheduled Bill is no more the work of the Government than it is the work of the hon. Member himself. The Western Australian Legislature have full power to pass that schedule, containing the restrictions to which I no less than the hon. Member object, without coming to this House at all [Sir G. CAMPBELL: No, if they had not been obliged to get the assent of the British Parliament in matters dealing with land. The 25 and 26th Victoria enacts that the Legislative Council of Western Australia may alter the provisions for the election of Members to the Council and for the qualifications of electors and of the elected Members.

Sir G. CAMPBELL: Go on.

MR. J. MORLEY: Certainly I will go on. The enactment continues—

"Provided always that every Bill passed by the Council shall be reserved for the signature of Her Majesty's pleasure thereon, and shall be laid before Parliament 30 days at least before Her Majesty's assent be given to it."

If the House wishes to take away the power to which that Statute refers, the House will have to repeal that Statute. My hon. Friend forgets that Mr. Brandreth, the legal representative of the Colonial Office, gave evidence before the Committee, to the effect that for the Imperial Parliament to interfere in any way in the qualifications of the electors of Western Australia the Statute which has been quoted this evening would have to be altered. This is a Bill which has been passed by the representative Government of Western Australia, without any definite decision in the matter I contend it is not for the House to override. If the Committee adopt the Amendment the effect will be that they will have sent the Bill back to Western Australia to be revised. The Colony certainly do not wish that, for the immense weight of opinion in Western Australia is strongly in favour of the whole Bill being passed, and passed without delay. Moreover, that is not merely the feeling of Western Australia; but, as an hon. Member has stated, the Agents-General representing the whole of Australia back up the demand, and I believe I am right in stating that they have waited on the First Lord of the Treasury and pressed him to fix a date for the passing of the Bill. That is an important fact, and would it be wise, because certain views are entertained in reference to property qualification for voting—views which I myself share—to oppose the wishes of the colonists in this matter, and to force those views upon Western Australia? Would it be wise to thus place ourselves in a false position, not only with reference to Western Australia, but the whole of the Australian Colonies? I believe not, and it is because I think it undesirable that this House should burden itself with interference in all that is done in distant Dependencies, because I believe that this work can be better done by those on the spot, who are best acquainted with the circumstances—in short, for the same reason that I am in favour of Home Rule in Ireland, that I support the Bill, and entreat the Committee not to delay passing it.

(11.43.) Mr. JOHNSTON rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but the CHAIRMAN withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

(11.44.) Sir G. CAMPBELL: I am glad the right hon. Gentleman has read to the Committee the words of the enactment. The important proviso is contained in the fact that these Bills must be reserved for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure thereon, and that the Bill must be laid before both Houses of Parliament for the space of 30 days before Her Majesty's pleasure is signified. That means that if this House in that period requisitions Her Majesty not to approve the Bill, it will not be approved. This is a matter of Constitutional right, and I believe the passing of this Bill would only tend in years to come to increase the difficulties of popular Government.

Bench has interpreted my ideas. I would not for a single moment stand up and oppose this Bill on account of the prevailing opinion in Australia, although I do believe the Colony are making a great mistake in having this restricted franchise. I am in favour of Home Rule for Western Australia, and I believe the people there will not be content with anything but Home Rule. We may, and do, object to some of the details of this Bill, but I shall support it on broad principles.

(11.50.) Dr. CLARK: I shall support the Amendment, because for 12 years there will be a Council not elected by the people, but appointed by the Governor, under the Bill as it stands, and then there will be a Council elected by a small section, namely, the wealthy class only. I desire, as strongly as anyone can, that the people of Western Australia shall have self-government; but by this Bill you are not giving it to them, you are definitely withholding it from them for a long period.

(11.51.) Mr. W. REDMOND: I share the objection which has been expressed to the proposed property qualification, but the question is, whether the Bill before us with that qualification is not better for the people of Western Australia than a continuance of the present system. I have no hesitation in saying that the great majority of the people of the colony would infinitely prefer this Bill, and I cannot understand how anyone in favour of self-government can oppose or retard the measure. The sending back of the Bill to Western Australia to get re-considered the clause as to property qualification would postpone for a year certainly, and perhaps indefinitely, this extension of the liberties of the people, whereas if the Bill is carried I have no doubt that the colony will soon realise the wisdom of having an extended franchise.

*(11.54.) Mr. CHANNING: I maintain that the hon. Member is wrong in contending that the Bill will be indefinitely postponed if this Amendment is passed. Her Majesty's Government will have the power to make an Order in Council at any time, and the House will not have to consider the Bill again.

(11.55.) Mr. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): This Debate has manifestly raised a question of the utmost gravity, and one which ought not to be hastily determined. I am one of a considerable number of Members who entertain doubts as to the Constitutional position of this question. We have been told that if the Bill is amended it must be referred back to the colony. We ought to know more on this, and I beg, therefore, to move the adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Sexton.)

*(11.56.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I hope that the House will not consent to the Motion. This question has been very carefully considered by a Committee in which the House has full confidence. If the Bill is not passed, Western Australia will have to remain under her present Constitution, which is open to many objections. All that the House can do is to accept and sanction that which the colony propose, or refuse it; we cannot change it.

(11.58.) MR. FLYNN: I am very much in the same position as my hon. Friend. We do not understand the Constitutional bearing of this Bill. I take it that the vast majority of us are in favour of the Bill, and it would delay it but a day or two if we agreed to this Motion and had time to consider—

HOUSE OF LORDS,

*Friday, 27th June, 1890.*ALLOTMENTS ACT (1887) AMENDMENT
BILL.Read 1st, and to be printed. (No. 151.)

THE ARMY IN INDIA.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON, in rising to call attention to the Papers relating to the organisation of the Army in India, and especially to the recommendation of successive Governments of India in favour of the abolition of the existing arrangements for the command-in-chief of the Madras and Bombay Armies, said: My Lords, although I propose to confine myself strictly to the single point adverted to in the notice which I have laid upon your Lordships' Table, I fear such is the importance of the question, that I shall have to take up a larger portion of your Lordships' time, and to request your indulgence to a greater extent than I should have desired, but I will endeavour to compress my observations within the briefest space which is consistent with making intelligible the case which I have to present to you. The single point of our great military organisation in India, to which I am anxious to invite your attention, relates to the existing arrangements for the chief commands of the Madras and Bombay Armies, those two Armies which are known as the Armies of the Minor Presidencies. It will be within the knowledge of most of your Lordships that the Madras and Bombay Armies have separate Commanders-in-Chief, and are also administered by separate Military Departments. The Commander-in-Chief in India is also the Commander-in-Chief of the Bengal Army, but for the other two Presidential Armies, there are distinct officers bearing that title, and exercising in the main the functions which attach to it. No doubt the Commander-in-Chief of the Army in India has now for a considerable time exercised, especially with regard to the British troops in that country, a certain amount of general control and direction, but for practical purposes of discipline and administration, the Armies of Madras and Bombay are under the command of their own Commanders-in-chief, and under the Military Departments connected with the Governments of those two Presidencies. Now, my Lords, it is very easy to see how this system sprang up, and the necessity which originally existed for an arrangement of this kind, because when those separate Armies were first brought into existence there were no railways, there were no electric telegraphs in India, and there were interposed between Madras, Bombay, and Bengal, vast territories of independent and often hostile native princes, so that it would have been practically—and I might almost say physically—impossible for one Central Commander-in-Chief in India to attend immediately to the discipline and administration of Armies at such vast distances from each other, and separated in the manner I have described. But, as your Lordships are well aware, a vast change has taken place in India since those days. Railways have been made connecting almost every part of the country with other districts, electric telegraphs are to be found everywhere, and by the processes of conquest or lapse, or annexation, or in some other way, most of those independent native States have disappeared, and there is an uninterrupted geographical communication between the three Presidencies. It is not to be wondered at that as the consequence of changes of that description it should now be thought by many persons, and as, I venture to say, I shall show your Lordships in a few moments, it has been thought by four successive Governments in India that the time has come for making a large and fundamental alteration in this system of separate administrations for the different portions of the Indian Army. Changes of a similar kind have been made in the military organisations of almost every country in the world, as the result of similar changes and developments to those which have taken place in India. My Lords, this subject was first largely gone into at the time when my noble Friend the Earl of Lytton was Viceroy of India. He, in the year 1879, appointed a very influential Commission to inquire into the organisation of the whole Indian Army. That Commission had upon it such Civilians as the late Sir Astley Eden and the present Sir Charles Bernard, and it had upon it also generals so well known and so highly distinguished as Sir Frederick Roberts, General Sir Napier Campbell, and General Macpherson, besides various other Commissioners, all of them in their way men of distinction, whose names I need not detail to your Lordships at the present moment. No doubt, my Lords, the principal object which Lord Lytton had in view in establishing that commission was, as I have always understood, that of inquiring whether it was possible to make important reductions in the military expenditure of the Government of India. It was appointed at a time when the financial condition of India was unsatisfactory, and when it was supposed to be a great deal more unsatisfactory, as I have always thought, than it really was. That, I have no doubt, was the principal object of my noble Friend; but he always professed and always entertained as an object of not less importance, though possibly he might have thought of less urgency, the rendering of the organisation of the Indian Army more efficient. My Lords, it must always be borne in mind that the Presidential system of command, as it is called, had been gradually broken into, and impaired and weakened and altered before this Commission was appointed. A great measure of financial centralisation had taken place, the expenditure upon the Army had been brought altogether under the control of the Government of India, and in that way, among many others, the Presidential system has been impaired and broken into. What was left of it was imperfect, and, as I think I shall show your Lordships presently, it was hampering and inconvenient. I have often heard it said that this system of Presidential command is a great out-growth of long experience, and an organisation that has been built up by the accumulated experience of many years. That is quite a mistake. The Presidential system was established, as I have said, under totally different circumstances from those which exist at present, and what has gone on from those days has not been the building up of a system the foundations of which were established a century ago, but it is the breaking down at all points of a system which was established in tolerable perfection at the time it was first set up. Lord Lytton's Commission went very fully indeed into the whole question, and made a very complete, elaborate, and most able Report. I am afraid, my Lords, that that Report and the Papers connected with it have never been laid upon the Table of your Lordships' House, but they have been laid before the other House of Parliament, and, consequently, I am free to quote from them in the course of my remarks. That Commission, after a careful consideration of the whole question, reported to Lord Lytton's Government at the commencement of 1880; and their Report was immediately taken into consideration by that Government, but, as your Lordships are aware, Lord Lytton did not remain long in that year in the position of Viceroy of India—he resigned in the month of April or May, and his Government, therefore, were only able to send home a Despatch forwarding the Report of the Commission with certain Minutes by some Members of the Government. They were not able to go into the subject fully themselves, and to give a deliberate opinion as a Government upon it. Those Minutes show, no doubt, that there was considerable difference of opinion among the Members of Lord Lytton's Government upon the particular point to which I am now drawing your Lordships' attention. But there was no doubt whatever of Lord Lytton's own opinion upon the subject, because in a very able Minute which he wrote, and which has been sent home and laid before the other House, he used this language—

“Under the present system the Armies of Madras and Bombay are neither independent Armies nor portions of one great Army of India. All the evils of provincialism are maintained without that complete independence which were it proved to be desirable could alone justify the maintenance of the control at present exercised by the Local Governments.”

As I have said, Lord Lytton was only able to record his opinion upon the more salient points of the Report, and when I went out and succeeded my noble Friend, in 1880, the Report had only been sent home with those recorded opinions, and it was placed in my hands just as I left this country. I need scarcely tell your Lordships that, with an Afghan war upon my hands, I was not anxious to take up this question, or to go into the consideration of the very large matters which were involved in it, and the Government with which I had the honour to be connected had no opportunity of doing so until in the course of the following winter of 1881 it was expressly directed to do so by the then Secretary of State for India, Lord Hartington. It was at Lord Hartington's special direction that we took up the Report and went into the matter, and we did so very fully. We sent no less than 15 Despatches upon the subject to the India Office, dealing with the Report in all its parts, and with the exception of a difference of opinion upon this very question with which I am now dealing on the part of the gallant officer who was Commander-in-Chief in 1881, Sir Frederick Haines, the Government of India were upon this point at all events, and upon almost every other point, absolutely unanimous in their recommendations. Sir Frederick Haines differed from us, but he was succeeded by a man possessing, I think I may say without question, the largest experience, probably of any living man, of the Indian Army, and upon military affairs in India, I mean Sir Donald Stewart, and my gallant friend Sir Donald Stewart cordially concurred in the recommendation of the Government with which I was connected, as did all my other Colleagues at that time. I should remark here that the military member of the Council, who is, of course, required to be very well acquainted with these matters, and who is a distinct officer from the Commander-in-Chief, was General Wilson, who had been for a long time secretary to the Military Department of the India Office, and who had been specially selected by Lord Hartington to be sent out there, the office of Military Member of the Council having become vacant at the time when this subject was under consideration. Upon this point, my Lords, we also took exactly the same view as had been taken by the Commission and by Lord Lytton himself as Viceroy, and we recommended that the office of Presidential Commander-in-Chief in the two Minor Presidencies and the two Military Departments of Madras and Bombay should be abolished—that the Madras and Bombay Armies should be commanded by two Lieutenant Generals, that the special Military Department should be got rid of, and that the unity of command so established should be placed in the hands of the Commander-in-Chief in India. But I should ask your Lordships to particularly bear in mind this point, both as to the Government of Lord Lytton and as to that with which I was connected, that we never proposed for a moment the abolition of the separate Armies of Madras and Bombay. In reference to this point, I may mention that Lord Lytton used in his Minute, what, I think, was a very pertinent expression; he spoke of the Armies of India as being "like water-tight compartments." We never proposed to alter that water-tight compartment system; we objected to the maintenance of separate Commanders-in-Chief and Departments, just as Lord Lytton himself objected to them. Indeed, the Commission went further in that very direction, and proposed to divide the Bengal Army into two portions, so that instead of having three water-tight compartments there would have been four. The Government I was connected with were unable to adopt that recommendation, for reasons which I cannot enter into at the moment; but I am anxious your Lordships should clearly understand that when we proposed, for reasons which I will lay before you briefly in a moment, that the separate Commands-in-Chief and Military Departments of Madras and Bombay should be abolished we were not anxious or desirous that the separate Armies should cease to exist. We thought that that was an important portion of the military organisation, although experience has shown (and that is an important matter) the difficulty in the present day of really and strictly maintaining that separation with our present increased means of communication in India. We found when we came to look into the matter that the Bombay Army was very largely recruited from among the Punjaubees. Sikhs and Pathans make very good soldiers, and the Bombay Government was always seeking to get such men into its ranks, thereby upsetting the water-tight compartment principle; and we had to lay down stricter regulations than had been previously in force in order to prevent this, if I may so term it, "poaching upon the proper manor" of the Bengal Army, though I am afraid those regulations were not always successful in preventing the continuance of the practice. The proposal which the Government with which I had to do submitted to the Secretary of State, was that the Presidential Armies of Bombay and Madras, being maintained as separate bodies, they should be brought more directly under the unity of command of the Commander-in-Chief in India, and that the two officers who had been hitherto called by the names of Commanders-in-Chief in Madras and Bombay should cease to hold that title, that they should be called Lieutenant Generals, and that they should be strictly under the direction of the Commander-in-Chief in India and of the Military Department of the Government of India. Now, my Lords, it has been sometimes said by the critics of this proposal that we were the advocates of an extreme system of centralisation. That, I venture to say, was altogether a mistake. We did not desire more centralisation. On the contrary, we submitted several proposals in exactly the opposite direction, especially tending, among other things, to give greater financial latitude to the commanders of the local Armies. I very well recollect that my noble Friend Lord Kimberley, who was Secretary of State for India at the time, seemed to think that was going too far in the direction of decentralisation by giving greater financial latitude to the Commanders of those Armies. My Lords, I merely mention this matter in order to show that it was from no desire for centralisation that those proposals were made. The principle upon which we desired to base the organisation of the Indian Army was the principle of unity of command, not of close centralisation. On the contrary, we would have given as much latitude as we could to the local commanders, but we desired to secure that which, I venture to say, is essential to any military organisation in the present day and under the conditions of our time—we desired to secure complete and undoubted unity of military administration in the hands of the Commander-in-Chief in India. Our main object, my Lords, I may say in respect to this part of our proposal, was an increase of efficiency, but we believed that some economy, though not a very large economy, would result from this part of the proposal. Some doubts have been thrown upon that matter, and I do not want to enter into any controversy about it. I have said that I believe the economy which would have resulted from our proposal would not have been a large one; but in the present financial condition of India, I think even small economies are not to be despised. But the principal object we had in view was increased efficiency by the securing of that unity of command which appeared to us to be so essential. Now, my Lords, the views which the Government of India of that time entertained were not founded upon theory; they were founded upon practical experience. That which Lord Lytton had found during the part of the Afghan War which took place when he was Viceroy, I found equally during the part of it which occurred while I held that office. It was the practical experience which we both had of the inconveniences and difficulties and confusions which resulted from the then existing system which made us believe that it was of essential importance that a change should be made in it. My Lords, of course a great many matters connected with a question of this kind are not matters which can be introduced in a public discussion; but I think I may, without impropriety, allude to one at all events of the very marked difference in the position in the Government of India towards the Army of Bengal and towards the Armies of the Minor Presidencies. When the expedition was sent to Candahar, after the unfortunate battle of Maiwand, the Government had to select the troops to be sent out. That expedition was ordered by telegraph, and was required to be despatched with the greatest possible rapidity. Accordingly, the troops were put on the march as soon as might be. The names of the officers who were to command the Bengal Brigades were duly submitted to the Government of India by the Commander-in-Chief in India, and I felt it to be my duty as Viceroy to consider and inquire into the position and services of the officers who were so recommended. The Government of India and the Viceroy as representing it were responsible to Parliament and to the public for the appointment of those officers; and, of course, it was our duty to make all the inquiries we could as to their qualifications. But when I came to do the same thing with regard to the Bombay Brigades and asked for exactly the same information with regard to them which had been given to me with respect to the Bengal officers, I found two things—in the first place, that that information did not exist in the Archives of the Government of India in the same way, and to the same extent as it existed with regard to the Bengal officers; and I found also that the Bombay officers had been appointed, before their names had been approved by the Government of India, by the Bombay Government to the command of their brigades, and were on the march towards the scene of action. Of course, under those circumstances, even if I had hesitated with regard to the qualifications of any one of those officers, I could not, unless the case was of the most flagrant description, have exercised the power of controlling the choice which had been made. I merely mention this, my Lords, to show how these questions do affect matters of the gravest importance in connection with an Army in the field. I could go into the practical difficulties with respect to several other matters of military organisation as shown in time of war, but I will not do so; I will merely venture to ask your Lordships to take my assurance that those difficulties were cropping up almost constantly. Well, my Lords, we sent home those proposals, and they were rejected in July, 1883, partly, perhaps, because we did not make the exact nature of our proposals as clear as we ought to have done, and therefore they were not thoroughly understood; partly because the saving which we thought we should make by them was contested at the India Office—the saving was in itself, I will admit, never supposed to be a large one; and possibly partly from a fear of change and from a want of that experience which we possessed who were actually concerned in the administration of the Indian Army, and who had been so recently engaged in carrying out the operations of war. This part of our proposal, therefore, my Lords, fell to the ground, and there was an end of it for the time. Well, my noble Friend Lord Dufferin succeeded me at the end of 1884. He was in no hurry to deal with this question. Four years elapsed before he wrote his Despatch upon the subject; but in June, 1888, having given to the question, as the time that he took shews, the fullest and the most careful consideration, he again addressed the Government at home on the subject. And, my Lords, you will observe that my noble Friend, like myself, had had actual experience of the operation of this system in time of war, because he had been engaged in the supervision of the military operations which took place in Burma; and if you will turn to his Despatch in the Blue Book on your Lordships' Table you will see that it is a great deal upon the Burmese experience that he rests himself, and it is by facts derived from that experience that he illustrates and defends his recommendations. I hope your Lordships will allow me to give the words of my noble Friend's Despatch, for they are much better than any I could employ myself. They have the full weight of his authority, and they have not merely the authority of Lord Dufferin himself, great as it is, but of the whole of his Government. Lord Dufferin wrote on the 1st June, 1888, to the following effect. He had been alluding to these Burmese difficulties and inconveniences which I have just touched upon, and he goes on:—

“It will be readily understood how much embarrassment and confusion such a complicated procedure is calculated to bring about. With this experience on record we view with apprehension the possibility of our being called upon at any future time to undertake more extensive military operations, while hampered by so faulty a system which violates all the recognised principles of sound military administration; and we feel that we shall be incurring a grave responsibility if we did not once more place on record our sense of the danger to India of allowing the reform, so strongly advocated by our predecessors, to be postponed any longer. We now, therefore, submit to your Lordship our earnest and deliberate opinion that the time has come when what still remains of the Presidential system should be finally abolished; and the entire administration of all the Indian Armies should be made over to the Commander-in-Chief in India acting in direct communication with the Commanders-in-Chief of the local Armies and under the direct orders of the Government of India.”

My Lords, these are very serious words. The opinion expressed there is a very grave one. It is exactly coincident with the opinion which I had myself formed from the experience I had had, and I remember that I used to say when in India that I should be very sorry indeed to be responsible for the conduct of a great war under the system which existed at that time. That view is here fully and entirely confirmed by the opinion expressed by Lord Dufferin and his Government, and it is confirmed by them, as your Lordships will see, after a most prolonged and careful consideration of the whole question. Well, my Lords, when that Despatch of Lord Dufferin arrived in England, what course did the noble Viscount opposite take? He sent a telegram to Lord Dufferin requesting that the Government of India would prepare a General Order upon the subject in full and minute detail. Here are the words—

“A General Order in draft giving effect to the measure; also drafts of all Orders to be thereon issued by the Commander-in-Chief for all arrangements in minute detail.”

My Lords, the Government of India undertook the task, and there is given here in this Blue Book a very long General Order, prepared with the greatest care and in the most minute detail. It occupies the chief part of the Blue Book, and it certainly might have been supposed that after that had been done, the principles upon which that general Order was founded, would have received the sanction of the noble Viscount opposite; but as I shall show your Lordships in a moment, that was not the case. But I wish to strengthen my case yet further by another brief quotation from the opinion of my noble Friend Lord Dufferin, because, with this draft Order, there was sent home a Minute by Lord Dufferin, and in that Minute he thus described the leading principle upon which the draft General Order was founded. Therefore, in saying that the principle which I am advocating is the leading principle of that General Order, I am only repeating what Lord Dufferin said.

“The leading principle of those proposals was that the Army administration should be so contrived as to permit decentralisation in such military business as was not of the first importance, while the supreme financial and administrative power should remain in the hands of the Governor General in Council, and further that the Commander-in-Chief in India should be placed in command of the whole Army of India, instead of his powers being confined chiefly to the control of the Bengal Army. In respect of the organisation of the Indian Armies, it is desired to maintain in the most complete manner the separation of the Bengal Army from the Armies of Madras and Bombay;”

and then the Minute refers to the recruitment of Armies in the other parts of Hindostan and in the Punjab. That is the leading principle upon which that General Order was framed, and it is to that leading principle that I am asking your Lordships' attention to-night. I should perhaps mention here that Lord Dufferin's Government in one minor respect differed from the recommendations of previous Governments. They retained the titles of the Commanders-in-Chief at Madras and Bombay. They did not propose to call them Lieutenants-General; they proposed to leave them the title of Commander-in-Chief, although they subordinated them altogether for the purpose of unity of command to the Commander-in-Chief in India. That is a very minor matter. I daresay Lord Dufferin's Government may have been wise in taking that course, and certainly it is not a point on which I should think of raising any difference of opinion. Well, my Lords, this elaborate scheme, prepared at the call of the noble Viscount opposite, was sent home to England, and was, I have not the least doubt, by the time it took, fully considered by the noble Viscount and his Council; and the result, I regret to say, was that the noble Viscount did not feel himself in a position to accept, at all events at present, this part of the proposal of the Government of India. I will give the words of the noble Viscount in a moment; but he did accept (and in doing so he did much good) a great many of the minor proposals of the Government of India, all tending in the direction of getting rid of this Presidential system. He pulled out more stones; he destroyed the structure still further; he rendered it more liable to fall down than it was before. It was, perhaps, rather an insidious policy on the part of the noble Viscount, and I confess I should have been glad if he had adopted a bolder policy, for I am afraid that the rubbish left behind by the removal of those stones is likely to encumber the administration of the Indian Army for some time to come. What he said was

this, in a Despatch to Lord Lansdowne's Government—

"I regret to have now to inform your Lordship that for the present, at any rate, I find myself unable to enter into the large question of military organisation which has been so ably put forward. I am advised that, in order to give effect to any measure for the withdrawal of the Armies of Madras and Bombay from the control of those Governments, recourse must be had to Imperial legislation. Her Majesty's Government consider that such a course would be highly inexpedient, as it would certainly give rise to discussions, which must cause delay prejudicial to the Public Service, and I cannot deem it advisable to consider the re-construction of the Indian military system on any less comprehensive basis than that advocated by your Government."

My Lords, that might be taken to be a diplomatic mode of saying that the Government did not like to bring a Bill for this purpose into Parliament, and that they thought it would be difficult to pass. I shall have a word to say upon the argument put forward in that form in a moment; but the noble Viscount's language is that the discussions which must arise "would cause delay prejudicial to the Public Service," by which I understand him to mean, that the discussions arising on the passing of such a Bill through Parliament would necessarily take some time, and that during that time every question with regard to this military organisation must stand over. I venture to differ from my noble Friend in that respect. It seems to me that he might not only have done upon his own authority all he has done—that he might have pulled these stones over which he so properly rejoices out of this antiquated structure just the same, but that he might have made a clean sweep of the remaining rubbish by bringing a Bill into Parliament and settling the question once for all upon that basis, which he truly says is the only real basis upon which it can be settled. My Lords, that Despatch was received not by the Government of Lord Dufferin, but by the Government of Lord Lansdowne; and now we arrive at the administration of a fourth Viceroy in connection with this question. And what was the opinion of Lord Lansdowne's Government upon it? Your Lordships will recollect that Lord Lansdowne's Government might, if they had liked, have left that part of the question alone. The decision of the noble Viscount upon it was, so far, final for the time. His other directions related to the remaining matters which I have called the minor points. But so strongly did Lord Lansdowne's Government feel the importance of this question that they would not pass it by—they would not let it alone though they might have done so if they had liked, but they recurred to it again and expressed in the very gravest terms their view of the question. This, again, is the unanimous language of Lord Lansdowne's administration—

"Four successive Governments of India have thus supported the proposals which were put forward by the Army Organisation Committee 10 years ago. The alterations proposed in the administration of the Army are not merely for the purpose of remedying inconveniences, but to impart a practical and working form to an accidental organisation which, in course of time, has developed into a cumbrous and complicated machinery. We desire, therefore, once again to place before Her Majesty's Government our conviction that it would be a misfortune of the greatest moment if this Amendment of the military administration which we consider to be essential to the efficiency of the Army in this country should not be carried out in the breathing time of peace, which we fortunately now possess, and if the desired change so persistently and impartially advocated by the Governments of India were to be postponed until the disastrous experience of war should force upon Her Majesty's Government the necessity of effecting this most necessary reform of the Indian Army System."

My Lords, it is impossible for any Government of India, with the respect which they owe to Her Majesty's Government at home, to use stronger language in regard to any kind of reform than that which I have just read to your Lordships. What, then, is the position in which the matter stands? It is this: you have had four successive Governments of India all combining to recommend this change—perhaps I ought to say, to be strictly correct, four successive Viceroys, because the united opinion of the Indian Government in the case of Lord Lytton's Viceroyalty was not recorded on the subject. You have had all those Viceroys supporting this change and three of them unanimously supported by their Colleagues in the Government. I need not remind your Lordships that those four Viceroys were men of very different characters and training. They were men belonging to different political Parties, and I should imagine that we all went there with no preconceived opinion upon this subject. I can say that for myself, and I have no doubt it was the case with my noble Friends. We all went thoroughly into the question; three of us had experience of war as well as peace, and the whole four came to the conclusion that it is a matter of the gravest moment that the administration of the Army in India should be put upon such a footing of unity of command as that which was pressed upon the noble Viscount opposite by those four Governors. My Lords, in these proposals you have had men like Sir Donald Stewart and Sir Frederick Roberts, two successive Commanders-in-Chief fully agreeing, and giving them their most entire and cordial support; and I confess I can hardly conceive a stronger case than this for calling upon Her Majesty's Government to take steps to deal with this question upon, as the noble Lord says, the only satisfactory footing upon which it can be dealt with. My Lords, the English Government in India ought always to be in a state of perfect preparation for war. It has always been my view—and I desire to say that this is no mere view of my own, for I have heard the same opinion expressed by others of greater experience and knowledge of India than myself—that the Army in India ought to be ready to take the field at any moment upon a telegraphic command from the Government of India. You cannot secure that perfect efficiency unless you have a sound system of organisation, and you cannot have a sound system of organisation unless you secure that unity of command which is found to exist in every great military organisation throughout the world. I do, therefore, most earnestly submit to Her Majesty's Government that they are incurring a very grave responsibility in resisting the urgent demands and disregarding the repeated warnings they have received for so long a time. If they had brought in a Bill, and it had failed, then that responsibility would not have rested upon them; it would have rested upon others. But when the noble Viscount opposite practically tells the public not in this country only, but in India, that this great reform spoken of in such very strong language by successive Governments of India cannot be carried out simply because a Bill cannot be passed through Parliament, I do venture to say that I think an argument of that description is one which might be fraught with serious consequences. I do not think it is an argument with which this question should be met; and if the hesitation of Her Majesty's Government to deal with this most important matter rests solely upon that ground, as it appears to do, then I do say that Her Majesty's Government are called upon by a very urgent demand to take this question into their serious consideration and to deal with it in the ensuing Session. Some steps, as I have already said, have been taken by the noble Viscount, and, if he will allow me to say so, I desire to give him every credit for those steps; but the principle, which is a wrong principle, remains, and it remains to obstruct and hamper the Public Service, and to weaken our Military Administration in India. I do, therefore, urge the Government to re-consider the matter and to do their part to give effect to the reiterated proposals of four successive Viceroy's who have had practical experience of the working of the present system in peace and in war, and who, differing in a great many other things in regard to Indian questions, have been absolutely unanimous in saying that the present system is one which they would regard with the greatest alarm if it were in existence at a time of serious peril.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount Cross): My Lords, I am not at all sorry to have heard from the noble Marquess the speech which he has addressed to your Lordships' House. I am quite aware that this is a matter which has engaged the attention of the successive Governments of India for a long time past, and that not only the noble Marquess, but other Viceroy's have taken the same view: that Lord Dufferin felt the necessity for a change very strongly, and that Lord Lansdowne is undoubtedly of the same opinion. Now, the noble Marquess said that when the matter was first considered by him, he and his Government very properly took a great amount of trouble to investigate for themselves before they ventured to address the Government at home upon this particular subject, and that in a Despatch which they sent home they went fully into the matter and put forward every argument they could use in order to further their views. Now, I should like to consider for a moment how that Despatch was received by the Government of the day. The noble Lord (the Earl of Kimberley), who sits next to the noble Marquess, was at the India Office at that time, and it fell to his lot to frame the Despatch which was to answer this pressing demand of the Indian Government. The noble Earl went very fully into the matter, and he alleged certain reasons why he did not feel inclined to accept the decision of the Government of India upon this point. I should like to read to the House one or two sentences from that Despatch to show, at all events, how the matter was viewed at that time by the Government of the day when the noble Earl was Secretary of State for India. The passage is at paragraph 37 of the Despatch where Lord Kimberley was alluding to the weight of authority for and against the change. I do not think the noble Marquess made quite enough of that particular point. He says—

“There is no doubt that the Military Authorities in this country, as well as in India, have been very much divided upon this point; and although it is perfectly true that four successive Viceroys have pressed the Government at home to take the course proposed, it is equally true that there is a very strong weight of authority on the other side among military men.”

That, no doubt, was felt by the noble Earl to be the case when he penned this Despatch from which I am reading a few words. He gives certain names of people as being strongly opposed to this particular plan, and then he says—

“I mention these names, not as outweighing those of others who support the scheme, but in order to show that I could not press the measure on Parliament on the ground that there is a general agreement in favour of the scheme on the part of military and administrative officers who have been consulted, but that, on the contrary, I should have to say there is a considerable body of experienced opinion opposed to it. This opinion, I should say, is shared by the majority of those Indian officers of military experience who have been consulted in this country.”

Therefore, the noble Marquess must not take it that all the opinion is in his direction; quite the reverse; because when the noble Earl came to discuss the question with his military advisers here (and Sir Donald Stewart was one of them at the time if I am not mistaken) he found that the great weight of military authority was against the noble Marquess instead of in his favour. The Earl of Kimberley's Despatch goes on at paragraph 53—

“On the whole, I have come to the conclusion, for the reasons I have explained, that it is not expedient to ask Parliament to legislate for the purpose of giving effect to your recommendation.”

He was not afraid of a Bill not passing, but that it was inexpedient to present one—

“Your Lordships will, I am sure, understand that it is with much regret that Her Majesty's Government find themselves unable to adopt a measure which all the Members of your Government support; but looking to the direction of military opinion upon the question, to the political objections which may be urged to the proposed changes in the constitution of the Madras and Bombay Armies, and the absence of proof of financial saving, they do not find such a weight of authority in its favour as would justify them in recommending to Parliament such an extensive and fundamental change in the existing military system.”

The Despatch which the noble Marquess had sent home, and which had been, as he has told us, so carefully prepared, was clearly also very carefully considered by the Government of which the noble Earl was a member; and after weighing every consideration and argument that could be urged by the noble Marquess in favour of his proposition they were prepared upon their own judgment to decline to adopt the proposal, and they came to the conclusion that it was not expedient to ask Parliament to make this fundamental change which the noble Marquess pressed upon them to make. So the matter ended; the Government of the day went out; and I think the next time the matter was pressed upon the English Government was when Lord Randolph Churchill was in office. He had to consider the question with his military advisers, and he came to the conclusion it was not expedient to bring a Bill into Parliament on the subject, that it would require a Bill, and there was no time at that period of the year for it. It was on that ground, I believe, that he objected to taking any step. He stated in his Despatch of the 29th October, 1885—

Under existing circumstances such a course would be, for the present at any rate, altogether impracticable, and need not, therefore, be taken into consideration."

Then the next Despatch which came from India on the matter was one addressed to myself. I also went very thoroughly into it, and I certainly consulted all the Military Authorities I could upon the point. No one was more strongly against the proposal than the illustrious Duke, the Commander-in-Chief in England; and certainly no one ever wrote to me more strongly against the proposal than the late Lord Napier of Magdala. He was opposed to it very strongly indeed. That, in my opinion, strengthened very much the view which my noble Friend the Earl of Kimberley had taken, that as all the Military Authorities were certainly not on one side on the subject, we should have to move with considerable caution in regard to it. Having satisfied myself that an Act of Parliament was absolutely necessary, if the measure was to be carried out, and having satisfied myself that if I brought it into this House I should have been opposed by such very good authorities as I have already mentioned, I did not think there was much chance of a Bill of that kind, in the present state of public opinion, and of military opinion, passing through Parliament. Therefore, I had to consider what was the best thing to be done. I did not like to delay the other reforms, which I thought were so very useful and desirable. I did not think even if a Bill could be brought in it would be wise to attempt to carry out this particular measure; at the same time I thought I would cast about to see whether, with the assistance of my noble Friend, I could not carry out a certain amount of reform which would remove a great many of the difficulties the noble Marquess has alluded to, and which the Commander-in-Chief in India said stood in his way in approaching this matter. I will take the opportunity of saying that I am glad the noble Marquess approves of these reforms, such as they are. They all had a tendency and were in the direction of lessening the Presidential system, and they are certainly in the way of giving much greater power to the Commander-in-Chief without centralisation. The Military Accounts had already been dealt with, but we dealt with a great many more matters, and we put the Commissariat, the Transport, the Clothing Department, and the Military Works all entirely under the Commander-in-Chief; so that I think we have gone a long way towards removing a great many of the difficulties which, no doubt, the Commander-in-Chief did feel were pressing upon his position. Now, my Lords, I am not at all saying that this matter of what remains of the Presidential commands is not a question which really does not want great consideration, as my noble Friend says. I quite agree with that, and I think that very likely the Debate which the noble Marquess has initiated to-night may call the attention of military persons still more to this matter than has been the case hitherto, so that we shall be able to get further judgments upon the matter. But, my Lords, I think the divergence of authorities I have cited is quite enough to warrant any Government in saying you must be quite certain you are right before you take this revolutionary step; but when you have made up your mind that it should be taken, take it by all means. I must confess that I think the Government of India, in the last Despatch they wrote upon the matter, placed their case a little too high. I think they put it a little too strongly, because I do not think they would or could, under the system which goes on, now feel the disadvantages to which the noble Marquess had formerly alluded. For the moment, supposing there was a great war, the Commander-in-Chief in India knows perfectly well that the whole of the Army that was engaged would be practically placed under his command. The Army in Burmah is placed under his command. If the point is taken that he would be in difficulties, owing to not having the powers which he wanted for other purposes, the reforms I have already inaugurated would practically do away with the other mischiefs which the noble Marquess alluded to in his Despatch; and, therefore, although I cannot promise that Her Majesty's Government will bring in a Bill to effect this purpose, I can inform him that the whole matter is still under the consideration of the Secretary of State in communication with the Government of India, not simply in reference to this matter of the Presidential commands, but to other matters connected with the different regiments belonging to those Armies. But one thing I think I may lay down without contradiction—that is, that it would never do to be continually tampering with these Armies. I think when any reform is resolved upon there ought to be something like, if not finality, settlement for a time about it. I do not mean mere financial reforms. But when you have made up your mind to carry out substantial reforms, do let them be fixed, at all events, for some time to come. It is not fair to keep the Army of India unsettled and uncertain as to what its future is to be. When this step is taken it ought to be taken after due consideration, and when we have obtained a greater consensus of military opinion upon the subject than up to the present moment we have had.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I am very glad my noble Friend behind me has brought this very important subject before the House, because I quite agree with him that there is, perhaps, no more important question connected with Indian administration than that which has been raised. The noble Viscount has referred to the decision which was given by the India Office at the time when I had the honour to hold the position of Secretary of State for India, and he has quoted what, I think, are certainly two most material passages in my Despatch then written. My Lords, I quite agree with my noble Friend behind me as to the grave responsibility which attaches to any one who has to deal with this subject, and I do not know that I ever felt a greater responsibility than in coming to the decision at which I arrived. It certainly was not come to by the Government to which I belonged with any precipitation, because my noble Friend Lord Hartington, who preceded me, found the question one of such doubt and difficulty that he did not deal with it while he was Secretary for India, and it fell to my lot to give that decision. Now, I cannot agree with my noble Friend in assuming that there is only one side to this question. It seems to me that it is essentially a matter in which you have to balance very different considerations. My own opinion, of course, upon a military subject is absolutely worthless, but I came to my conclusion after a very careful consideration and study of the military points in consultation with the Military Authorities, to whom I had access, India, in regard to such a matter, is not to be dealt with without reference to her peculiar circumstances. There is not the slightest doubt that in a European country, where the population is homogeneous and not in the peculiar circumstances which are connected with India, it would be the best plan to have a central military administration and one supreme command. I do not suppose anyone out of India, who has not a knowledge of that country, would have thought such a system could have grown up as exists there. But that system, as it has grown up, has adapted itself to the circumstances of the case. I shall presently consider how far some of those circumstances have altered. The question is not merely a military one, it is also a political question; and if you put out of sight the political question, and deal with the subject only from a military point of view, I do not think you can justify the decision you may arrive at, whichever way you may look at it, from the merely military aspect. The political aspect of the question is alluded to in my Despatch in a very short passage, which I may, perhaps, be allowed to read to your Lordships. It is to this effect. In paragraph 49 of my Despatch, I say—

“In confining my remarks to a few points only of that part of the question, I beg your Lordships to consider that it is from no desire to under-rate your arguments in favour of the scheme, but even if their validity were admitted, they would not, in my opinion, be sufficient to outweigh the considerations with regard to the political situation of Madras and Bombay with their Armies, enabling them, in any unforeseen contingency, to act by themselves, without reference to the Central Government.”

I apprehend that paragraph contains really the gist of the arguments on the other side. I had the benefit of excellent military advice when I was at the India Office. The Chief Military Adviser of the Indian Council at the time was that able and distinguished man—Sir Henry Norman, and Sir Henry Norman had an extremely strong opinion against the scheme. I consulted, as the noble Viscount has mentioned, all the Military Authorities who I thought could give an opinion of any weight, and I arrived at the singular result that there was, it might almost be said, an equal opinion on both sides, though, perhaps, the majority, as I stated in my Despatch, were against the scheme. Then the noble Viscount stated very fairly the difficulty I felt in going to Parliament under those circumstances, because I could, of course, adduce no authority of my own upon a military question, and I should have been obliged to show Parliament that there was sufficient military authority for the change proposed. I was very well aware that there were many eminent and able men in favour of the scheme. At that time you had Sir Donald Stewart, a man of great experience, and now you have Sir Frederick Roberts, whose opinion is second to none. So much from the military point of view. But, my Lords, the political aspect of the question is one which cannot be lightly put aside. It may have been that Sir Henry Norman, and those who advised me, were too much impressed with their recollections of what had occurred during the mutiny, and may have given too much consideration to the circumstances which arose during the occurrences of that perilous time. But although it may be possible that no such great crisis will ever arise again you never can be certain in a great Empire such as India that you may not have internal troubles to deal with which might greatly embarrass you if the local armies could not act separately. There is, moreover, the consideration of the very great difference between the populations from which the Madras Army is entirely recruited and from which the Bombay Army is partially raised, because it is quite true, as my noble Friend has stated, that a considerable number, and more than Government approve of, Pathans and others not natives of the Bombay Presidency, are recruited in the Bombay Army. There is no doubt that the Central Government in India being placed at Calcutta at so great a distance from Bombay and Madras would not be so completely in touch with the Armies there as the Local Governments. That might formerly have been a serious source of danger, but I admit that the greatly improved communication which we now have in India, both by railway and telegraph, has considerably weakened

the force of that argument. My Lords, I came to the conclusion, with great reluctance and hesitation, that I could not advise Her Majesty's Government to go to Parliament with a Bill. I say that because I felt strongly the responsibility of the position. Lord Lytton, and most of the Members of his Government, and also my noble Friend and his Government, had made strong recommendations on the subject; but, as I have said, I conscientiously believed I had not such a case as would have justified me at that time in proposing to Parliament the change which the Government of India desired. Now, let us see how the matter stands at the present time. It is, undoubtedly, a strong fact that the same opinions have been expressed by two more Viceroy, so able and experienced as Lord Dufferin and Lord Lansdowne, one, after four years of administration himself, having also been connected with the War Office at home, and another, at present in office in India, also with experience himself of military administration. I say, my Lords, it is a very grave fact that they have recorded in the strongest language their opinion that the Government at home will incur the very gravest responsibility if they neglect to carry into effect this reform. And besides that, there are certain arguments in these Despatches presenting new considerations which were not so pressing, or did not exist at the time when at the India Office I had to deal with the matter. There cannot be the least doubt, as I think Lord Dufferin's Government point out, that there have been two changes which very much affect this question—one, the new condition of affairs upon the frontiers of Beloochistan and Afghanistan, and the other, our acquisition of the whole of Burmah. The first is, perhaps, of the widest and most serious significance. We have now occupied a very advanced position in Beloochistan, we have a railway passing through the Khoja Ranges, in what was formerly part of Afghanistan; and we have created at Quetta a first class military station, which has now become one of the most important military positions of our Indian Empire. It is, of course, essential, from an Imperial point of view, also that this position should be entirely under the control of the Supreme Government as regards the troops stationed there, and yet it may be that the whole of the native troops stationed there are from the Bombay Army, and if that Army were to remain under the Local Government great inconvenience may arise. We must consider the very great change which has taken place as regards the general military position in India. Formerly we had to provide almost entirely for internal dangers. Now, unfortunately, although affairs happily wear a peaceful aspect at the present time we are obliged to admit that we have upon our frontier a great Power with whom we may one day have to deal. Therefore, the chief military question which the Indian Government have to deal with is the defence of our frontier. For the defence of such a frontier, more especially if we should have to defend it against a European Power, it is of the utmost importance that the administration should be concentrated in the Indian Central Government. My Lords, it seems to me that is an argument which must be set strongly against the argument put forward on the other side, which I admit is one of considerable weight as connected with the internal management of affairs in India. Then, with regard to Burmah. That is now a very large possession. It is garrisoned by the Madras Army. About half the Madras Army is in Burmah, and your Lordships can easily see how inconvenient it would be that that large force should be under the orders of the Local Government at Madras, and not under the control of the Supreme Government.

VISCOUNT CROSS: It was under the control of the Supreme Government.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Well, my Lords, although it may be under the control of the Supreme Government for the time, as it must undoubtedly be, it is shown by the Government of India in the Despatches on the Table that there is considerable administrative inconvenience in the present arrangement. Then, as regards the minor reforms. I did something in that direction, but I am glad to say that the noble Viscount has gone farther. That part of the question probably has been carried as far as it can be carried, and it is the great question of the separate armies that remains to be considered. I appreciate very strongly the way in which both Lord Dufferin's Government and Lord Lonsdale's Government have alluded to the importance of maintaining segregation as they have called in the different Armies. That shows, I think, that as far as it can be done they will be kept separate; but your Lordships must not suppose that the mere wish on the part of the Government to keep up this separation is sufficient. Once you have a central control of the whole of the Armies at Calcutta, I feel perfectly convinced that the centralisation principle will overcome the Local Government principle in regard to administration, and, whatever may be the opinion of the Government, military administration in India will necessarily, year by year, take a more centralised character. Therefore, although I acknowledge the justness of the views of the Indian Government with regard to segregation, I think we must set against it the natural tendency to increased central control. I wish the noble Viscount had given us the Despatch of Lord Randolph Churchill. I do not think it contains much that is of very great importance, but it should have been given to your Lordships as part of the history. To sum up the whole matter, I freely confess that in the face of the opinions of, now, four successive Viceroy, extending over a period of 10 years, opinions expressed in the most uncompromising and strongest manner, I feel that I should, if I had to deal with the question now, have great hesitation in refusing to give effect to their recommendations, and in persevering in the conclusion at which I formerly arrived. It is a very serious responsibility that we should in this matter neglect the opinions of such experienced men, men on the spot who have necessarily a closer and more complete acquaintance with all the surrounding circumstances than we can have. I must also say that from the military point of view, I think the recent experience of Sir Donald Stewart and of Sir Frederick Roberts ought to have great weight with us. I feel bound, therefore, to say, having expressed an adverse opinion before, that if Her Majesty's Government should come to the conclusion that the time has arrived at which they can present a Bill to Parliament for carrying this change

*THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: My Lords, upon this subject I wish to offer a few remarks, though it is not one which ever came before me officially, but, of course, I have naturally paid great attention to the Despatches received from India, and especially to the Blue Book which has been laid upon the Table of your Lordships' House. The difficulty of this subject cannot be more clearly set forth than in mentioning the fact that four successive Viceroys, Lord Lytton, the Marquess of Ripon, Lord Dufferin, and Lord Lansdowne, have advocated this change, and that four Secretaries of State for India, Lord Hartington, Lord Kimberley, Lord Randolph Churchill, and the noble Viscount opposite, Lord Cross, have found themselves unable, after full consideration with all the desire which they would naturally have felt to support the recommendations of the Viceroys, to give effect to the wishes of the Indian Government. My Lords, I think I may, as having been myself Viceroy, say one thing without risk of offending my noble Friends who have also filled that office, namely, that when a scheme has been deliberately set forth and advocated by the Government of India, when the men who have framed that scheme had the ear of the Viceroy, it is exceedingly difficult to go back from a scheme which has also received the assent of other Viceroys of India; and I think there must have been some influence insensibly exercised over my noble Friends by the naturally strong feeling of the Military Departments in India in favour of greater centralisation of the Armies in India. My Lords, I am very much in the same condition of mind as my noble Friend (Lord Kimberley) who has just addressed your Lordships. He has just stated, with great clearness and ability, and with perfect frankness, the difficulties of the situation, and I should, undoubtedly, with him be disposed to support the views of the Government of India in this matter, but with one important reservation, namely, that I must confess that the Papers, as presented to your Lordships, containing the scheme are not to my mind sufficiently satisfactory to justify the Government in acting. Now, my Lords, that is the practical question before the Government at the present time. The objections to centralisation have been so fully expressed by my noble Friend who last addressed your Lordships that I will not repeat them at length. One great advantage at present is that too great a centralisation of the military administration in the Commander-in-Chief is prevented. My noble Friend Lord Kimberley has frankly admitted that if this scheme is to be accepted it must be assumed that centralisation will take place. I have to represent to your Lordships that, in my humble opinion, that would constitute a very serious danger. Those who have studied the events of the Indian Mutiny must be aware that one of the main causes of the want of discipline in the Bengal Army was the centralisation which existed in the office of the Adjutant-General of the Army in India, and the taking away from the officers commanding regiments the powers they had over their men. I am not for a moment suggesting that my gallant Friend, Sir Frederick Roberts, is likely to fall into an error of that kind; but I do suggest to your Lordships, and I believe it is only common sense, that very able men put into positions of great executive responsibility are apt to think that they alone can act rightly, and to desire to diminish the responsibility of those serving under them. If this plan is carried out it appears to me that every precaution should be taken against such a result as that. I do not find in this very able collection of General Orders, extending over I do not know how many pages, which has been sent home from India, and which I think the noble Lord was quite right in asking for, anything clear upon this matter. I find, on the contrary, some suggestions for Orders which, to my mind, would rather tend to centralisation, than to deter the Commander-in-Chief's office in India from centralising the business of the local Armies. For example, I find in some of these draft General Orders that the approval of the appointment of officers commanding native regiments in the Armies of Madras and Bengal is to rest with the Commander-in-Chief in India. That does not appear to me to be at all necessary. I find, also, on looking at the correspondence which has been laid on your Lordships' Table, a very clear indication of the view taken at present in the office of the Commander-in-Chief in India, that a great part of the detail work connected with the local Armies would have to be sent up to Calcutta. I find, at pages 230-236, that Colonel Harris, the officiating Adjutant-General of India, writes to the Chief of the Military Department—

"That the Commander-in-Chief would undertake the larger matters of discipline, equipment, and other matters in Madras and Bombay, which are now dealt with by the Commanders-in-Chief and the Governments of those Presidencies."

No words can be larger than those. If that proposal is accepted, the Commander-in-Chief in India would be able to deal with anything connected with the Armies of Madras and Bombay. The answer given by the Government of India was, I venture to think, a very right one. The reply sent to that letter was that—

"The Government of India consider that it is desirable to leave to the local Commanders-in-Chief the fullest responsibility and authority in regard to the discipline of their Armies."

The opinion of the Government of India appears to me to be absolutely sound in this matter; and they went on to say that if sufficient power was left to the local Commanders-in-Chief, hardly any new matters need be sent for the consideration of the Commander-in-Chief at Calcutta. My Lords, the opinion of the Government of India I hold to be the right one in this matter, but I think this correspondence shows that there is even now some vagueness, some failure to make it quite clear, that for all purposes of discipline and minor administration, the powers exercised by the officers in command of the Madras and Bombay Armies should not be interfered with by the Adjutant-General's Office of the Commander-in-Chief in India. Now, my Lords, the opinions expressed by my noble Friends Lord Ripon and Lord Dufferin appear to me to be as sound and practical as can possibly be. The words used by Lord Dufferin I especially venture to express my entire agreement with, namely—

"That the decentralisation of military business, and the delegation of powers to the Commanders of Military Forces, is the principle to be aimed at."

But I say that further consideration requires to be given to this question, and I am glad to hear that the noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India (Viscount Cross) intends to give that further consideration to it. My Lords, the other point mentioned by my noble Friend Kimberley, as to which I would like to say a word, is the very important consideration as to the possibility of Bombay or Madras being separated from Calcutta. If this scheme is carried out without some provision being made for such a contingency as that, I should like my noble Friend the Secretary of State for India to consider what the legal effect of the alterations proposed by the Government of India in the Army Act would be. What action could the Governments of Madras or Bombay take in respect to military procedure, supposing that the Army Act was amended in the manner proposed, and all power whatever taken away from the Governments of Madras and Bombay over the Armies of those Presidencies? There is not one of your Lordships who has paid attention to the subject who is not aware of the great advantage to the Public Service which was rendered by Lord Elphinstone, when Governor of Bombay, at the time of the Indian Mutiny; and I venture to suggest that, even if this separation be made, at least some kind of legislative provision should be introduced, enabling, in a time of difficulty or crisis, either the Government of India or the Government at home to give certain authority to the Madras and Bombay Governments, if necessity should arise. Those two instances, my Lords, may, perhaps, to a certain extent enable your Lordships to understand how full of difficulties this question may be. No doubt, looked upon as a question of military administration, the thing is clear enough. Unity of command, unity of administration—are principles which have guided, no doubt, the Commander-in-Chief in India in the suggestions he has made. But I agree with my noble Friend, Lord Kimberley, that this is a matter which requires to be considered upon broad political grounds, and not upon military grounds alone, and I consider that the former Secretaries of State, who have filled that office for the last 10 years, and the noble Viscount opposite who fills it now, have only done their duty in declining to carry out this measure without a more full and complete consideration of all the different aspects of the subject, and of the precise manner in which the proposal is to be put in force. In conclusion, my Lords, I venture to think it would not be right of my noble Friend the Secretary of State for India to put the responsibility of settling this question upon Parliament. It is a matter which, I think, rests with the Government, and that the Government should be entirely satisfied with the nature of the scheme they have to propose to Parliament and be able to support it by completely and fully answering the military or political objection to it before they present a measure to Parliament.

*THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, I may be permitted to say a few words though, personally, I feel that I can say much less than the distinguished Members of this House who have already spoken; but I have had opportunities of hearing and judging of the opinion of some of the leading military men in India, and as already the names of two of them, at all events, have been referred to, and their opinions quoted, I can fully endorse every word that has been said by the noble Lord Earl Kimberley, when he expressed his anxiety, on a military subject, not to go against the opinion or against the advice of such distinguished men as Sir Henry Norman and the late Lord Napier of Magdala. I have had numerous conversations, constant conversations with those two distinguished officers, and others—I could name others, but perhaps those two names will suffice. Those distinguished officers, and many others, have all said to me that it would be a most ticklish and delicate thing to interfere with the present arrangements of the three military commands in India, and though, in many respects, centralisation or united command is advantageous, that the disadvantages of change would be so great that they hoped they would not be incurred. Now, I believe Her Majesty's Government has certainly given many Orders lately, or given sanction to many measures which have very much simplified the military requirements in India, and so long as those military requirements can be fulfilled without any organic changes being made, I should strongly urge your Lordships to be very careful and very delicate in introducing any very great alteration, such as that of doing away with the two minor Presidential Armies and combining them with that of Bengal. I am perfectly aware that there is a strong sentiment on the subject in India, and that some people there are desirous of this change, but I do not think, and I am very glad to hear what the noble Lord who has just spoken has said upon that point, that it would be possible now that our administration in India has become so vast, for one man and his surroundings to carry on the work. The duties of the military administration of so vast an Empire are enormous. I regret I was not able to be present when my noble Friend the Marquess of Ripon who has brought this subject forward spoke, but I was detained in another place. I trust your Lordships will forgive me, feeling my own inexperience in Indian matters, for having quoted the opinions and stated the views of men in whom I am sure every member of your Lordships' House has as much confidence as I have myself. I would strongly urge the Government to be most careful in making any alterations in the direction of doing away with the two minor commands.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) (PLEURO-PNEUMONIA) BILL.

(NO. 105.) COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee."

*THE EARL OF JERSEY: In asking your Lordships the other day to give the Second Reading to this Bill I promised my noble Friend Lord Kimberley to state what had been done in Ireland. In 1888 there were 2,638 head of cattle slaughtered, and compensation paid to the net amount of £15,400; in 1889 there were 1,165 head of cattle slaughtered, the net compensation paid being £7,563; this year, up to the 14th June, 1,010 head of cattle have been slaughtered, and the net compensation paid has been £6,500.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: Before the House goes into Committee, I wish to refer to a statement which was made by my noble Friend the Marquess of Huntly on the occasion of the Second Reading of the Bill with reference to the carrying out of the Acts by the Local Authority in Forfarshire. Lord Huntly quoted from a newspaper, in order to show how one Local Authority sometimes carries out the Acts and Orders in a way which renders nugatory whatever may be done by neighbouring and adjoining counties, a case in Forfarshire where pleuro pneumonia had broken out among a herd of cattle. Nine of them were stated to have been slaughtered, but 81 of them which had been in contact with the diseased animals were actually sold and allowed to possibly disseminate disease over the country. I desire to say that I am myself a member of the County Council in Forfarshire, and from long experience besides I can testify to the manner in which the Local Authority there perform their duties. I was, therefore, a little surprised to hear the statement made by the noble Marquess, but I was not at the time in a position to say anything in answer to it. However, I have since heard from the Local Authority on the subject, and they have requested me to make a statement to the House. The outbreak referred to occurred on the 2nd May upon a farm three miles from Forfar. There were not 81 cows in the herd as stated, but there were 98 oxen and three cows; on the 10th May the Local Authority resolved to slaughter the whole of those cattle, and they were all slaughtered accordingly. I may also state that the Forfarshire Authorities invariably slaughter all animals which have been in contact with animals affected with pleuro-pneumonia, and not only so, but it has been their practice in every case to make minute inquiries with a view to tracing the source of the disease. I know, practically, from the amount of our rates, how very careful the attention is which the Forfarshire Local Authority pay to their duties in regard to slaughtering, and on some occasions they have been found fault with in the county because of their rigid adherence to the practice of slaughtering all animals which have been in contact with diseased animals. I merely desire to mention this in justice to the Local Authorities.

*THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY: I am very pleased that my noble Friend has been able to make this statement. In justice to myself, I may say that I quoted the case as mentioned in a newspaper which circulates in Forfarshire. I am very pleased to hear that our neighbours in Forfarshire are not so much to blame in their administration of the Acts as I thought.

*EARL SPENCER: Before this Bill goes into Committee, I wish to call the attention of Her Majesty's Government to two matters. They are matters with regard to which I do not wish to move any Amendment; but they are important questions, and I shall be glad, therefore, if Her Majesty's Government will give some attention to them. The first question relates to the present powers of the Board of Agriculture. There is a very prevalent opinion in the country that very stringent measures will have to be taken with regard to cows coming from town dairies before pleuro-pneumonia can be stamped out in the country. It was at first thought that some additional clause should be introduced into this Bill in order to give the Government power to deal with those dairies; but if I am not mistaken, the Government have already very sufficient powers with regard to them. The powers to which I allude are the general powers of drawing a cordon round places for the purpose of preventing the spread of pleuro-pneumonia. I am the more confirmed in that opinion when I look to the Report of the Irish Privy Council on the recent administration of the Pleuro-Pneumonia Orders in Ireland. There, I see, that in the order of 1888, which effected such widespread slaughter among animals which had been in contact with pleuro-pneumonia in Dublin, there are very stringent directions with regard to infected centres. Therefore, as the general powers, though different in administration, are the same as in England, the Board of Agriculture will have ample powers for isolating infected districts and drawing a cordon round them in the case of large towns. It will be satisfactory to me, and it will, I think, be satisfactory in the country, where there is considerable interest naturally felt on the subject, to hear from the Government that the view I have taken is correct in regard to that matter. Then there is another matter to which I wish to refer, and I wish to speak upon it because I feel uncertain as to whether your Lordships' House has any power to deal with it. It may be a matter for argument, but I think there is some doubt as to whether your Lordships' House could have an Amendment moved with regard to it. My noble Friend Lord Belper, who is Chairman of the County Council of Nottingham, made some remarks upon the Second Reading which were of importance with regard to the time when this Act is to come into force. He said something to this effect: that there would be considerable difficulty, he was afraid, as the 1st September drew near, in the effectual working by the Local Authorities of the powers which they now possess. Naturally, as the time for the Government taking over the management of the slaughter draws near, the Local Authorities will be anxious to relieve the local rates of the total cost of the compensation payable, and may be tempted to defer action under the Orders in order that the payment may come upon the Government. I think that is a very serious matter, because we already know that some Local Authorities (and I am glad we have just heard from my noble Friend the Earl of Camperdown that Forfarshire is not numbered among them) are somewhat slack in carrying out the Orders of the Board of Agriculture; and they will certainly be increased in this slackness by the very obvious consideration that they have only to defer action, and the Central Government will have to pay the full cost of compensation instead of themselves. That, my Lords, is a serious matter, and the difficulties, which are already great of the Board of Agriculture will be considerably increased, because, if the Local Authorities are slack in their administration, there will be a great many more cases to be dealt with hereafter, and I should be glad if Her Majesty's Government would consider whether some such suggestion as this could not be adopted. In the Bill before us the question of compensation is treated somewhat differently with regard to Ireland, to the way in which it is treated in England. In Ireland the £20,000 a year which is to be given for the purposes of this Bill is retrospective. The compensation which has been paid by the Local Authorities under the Orders of the Irish Privy Council of 1888 is to be at once paid by the Central Authority. I believe at present the rule in Ireland is that the Local Authority should pay one-half of the cost of slaughter and that the Central Authority should pay the other half. It is made retrospective, therefore, in that respect in Ireland. I do not wish anything of the sort done in England, but I should like the Government to consider whether, with a view of preventing any inducement to slackness of the Local Authorities, they could not make this Act come into force at an earlier date, say the 1st or the middle of July, with regard to compensation. No doubt, the slaughter would have to be carried out by the Local Authorities, but the compensation might be put under the supervision of the Board of Agriculture out of the £140,000 which is to be paid in the one year. No doubt it would anticipate the period of payment; but I believe, in the long run, it would be really good economy, because it would make the Local Authorities more attentive to their duties in carrying out the Act, would induce them to do so more efficiently, and would prevent the difficulty which my noble Friend Lord Belper pointed out the other night. As I said before, there is some doubt as to whether your Lordships could introduce an Amendment on the subject. It is not in any way increasing the cost or charge upon the public funds; it would be merely appropriating it in rather a different manner. However, I wish Her Majesty's Government would take that point into their consideration, and, perhaps, my noble Friend, either to-night or on the Third Reading of the Bill, will be good enough to state the views of Her Majesty's Government upon those two points, which I think are of considerable importance.

Earl Spencer

*THE PAYMASTER GENERAL (The Earl of Jersey): My Lords, I am informed that the Board consider they have ample power to deal with dairies under the clause of the Act of 1878. Of course, the noble Earl will understand that I could not pledge the Government at this present moment to any particular course; but if he would prefer that I should bring before the Minister of Agriculture the points he has alluded to, I will do so, and make a statement later on. But I may say, with regard to the last point, there would be a difficulty in leaving the Local Authorities to slaughter by themselves, because they might, perhaps, be too much inclined to slaughter if they knew they were not going to pay the expenses. After all, a Local Authority would not be worth the name of a Local Authority if they failed to carry out their duties simply because they thought the expense would fall upon the rates. However, I will make further inquiries upon the point.

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I think if the noble Lord will refer to the 16th clause of the Act of 1878 he will see that upon the Report of the Inspector the Authorities have power to declare a dairy or cowshed an infected place--

"Where it appears to the Inspector of the Local Authority that pleuro-pneumonia has existed for six days, or appears to have done so, in any cowshed, field, or other place, he shall forthwith sign a declaration and serve it upon the occupier, and thereupon that place shall become a place infected with pleuro-pneumonia subject to the decrees of the Local Authority."

I think that amply provides for the point raised by my noble Friend.

*EARL SPENCER: That was not the power which I referred to. I believe there was a power in the Act enabling the Privy Council, in order to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia, to stop movements of cattle.

*THE EARL OF JERSEY: That is Clause 32, prohibiting the removal of animals. They have that power.

On Question, agreed to.

House in Committee accordingly.

Clause 4.

*THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY: My Lords, my object in moving the Amendment of which I have given notice, is to elicit from my noble Friend information on one point. The effect of this Bill is to place the whole duty of inspection on the Inspectors nominated under the authority of the Board of Agriculture. It appears to me that if the whole country is to be under those Inspectors there might from time to time be outbreaks occurring in different parts of the Kingdom, and a whole army of Inspectors might have to be employed. I think it would be necessary to provide in such an event, if several places had to be inspected, and the Inspector could not go to one of them, being engaged elsewhere, that he might be able to authorise some deputy on his behalf to enter upon that place. The value of this clause is that it does away with the obligation upon the Inspector under the Act of 1878, to give his reasons for entering, in writing; but it seems to me it is too small a power that only the Inspector of the Board of Agriculture may enter at any time or place. That is why I suggest the insertion of the words, "or authorise by writing under his hand." One can quite understand three different outbreaks occurring in one county, and I think, therefore, there should be a provision which would enable the Inspector to delegate some qualified person to inspect.

Amendment moved, in Clause 4, Section 1, line 32, after the word "enter" to insert the words "or authorise by writing under his hand any person to enter and inspect."—(The Lord Melford [M. Huntly].)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: I think it would be a most tyrannical proceeding. The Inspector under this Bill has power to visit any cowshed, field, or place he pleases, and he is not obliged to give any reason for it; but he may do so simply because he himself suspects there is pneumonia existing there, and then, upon his report that he finds pleuro-pneumonia existing there, the animals would be slaughtered. But the noble Marquess proposes to give the Inspector power to send anybody he pleases. It need not even be a veterinary surgeon; but it might be some intimate friend whom he would send to inspect the suspected field or cowshed. I think that is a provision which could not be tolerated for a moment. You give the Inspector the power to do it because he is a person who is reliable, and he would not be appointed Inspector unless he was fit for the post; but the noble Marquess's proposal would allow the Inspector to employ anyone, qualified or not.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I think the noble Duke has a little overlooked the great difficulties which would arise in such a case as the noble Marquess supposes. It has occurred to me before that if there are several outbreaks happening in parts of the country at considerable distances from each other, the number of Inspectors who would have to be employed by the Government would be most alarming if this Act is to be carried out efficiently. In fact, I have no doubt that the Board of Agriculture will find, unless they take large advantage of local assistance, that the thing is absolutely beyond their power. My only desire is that the Act shall be fully and efficiently carried into effect, and I cannot help thinking you might put in such words as these: "An Inspector or any person duly authorised by the Board of Agriculture." So that the persons who might go to inspect a place might not be actual Inspectors, but still persons who would be very fit to inspect upon occasion. I think we should give the Board of Agriculture as much latitude as we can, so that Inspectors who were overburdened with work or had too many calls upon them might be able to employ competent persons to do the duty which has to be done. Possibly, the point might be further considered and dealt with before the Report.

*THE EARL OF JERSEY: I do not agree with the noble Lord that it would be impossible for the Inspectors to do the work. Supposing there were a serious outbreak, a larger number of Inspectors would have to be employed ad hoc. There is no number of Inspectors put down in the Bill. But this clause is to give an Inspector the right to go into a cowshed, land, or place without giving any reason whatever as to why he enters. I think that is a very extensive power to give, and one which ought not to be delegated to anybody else but to responsible competent Inspectors.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I do not suggest that. I said fit and competent persons.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): I think my noble Friend has forgotten that we have passed a previous sub-section under which the Board of Agriculture may employ such additional Inspectors, valuers, and other persons, as they think necessary. So that they already have that power upon emergency.

*EARL SPENCER: I still think my noble Friend is right with regard to this. I do not think it is right to increase the number of Inspectors; you have degrees of authority; and an Inspector is a very important man. Of course you may appoint anybody an Inspector, but I do not think that is a very desirable way of carrying out the Act. I think there may be occasions, as was stated on the Second Reading, when it may be essential to appoint somebody to act as Inspector, but you ought not to lower the authority and value of the Inspectors themselves.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: In answer to what the noble Viscount has said, the sub-section to which he has referred does not meet the point. On the contrary, it makes it clear that something must be added. This clause limits the performance of the duty of an Inspector. I differ from the noble Marquess with regard to the Inspectors having power to appoint other persons, but I wish the Board of Agriculture to have power to employ them. You may wish to employ a perfectly qualified veterinary surgeon ad hoc. For that purpose, the words "An Inspector or other person duly authorised by the Board of Agriculture," would not embarrass them in the least, and would give them the necessary power.

*THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY: I will withdraw my Amendment in favour of the suggestion of the noble Earl. But if, as I would suggest, the noble Earl should consider the point between now and the Third Reading, that would be sufficient.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I think what has been said with regard to the 5th sub-section of Clause 1 hardly applies to this matter. If the person is appointed by Government as Inspector, his pay might become a serious matter. Of course, we all want to ensure that this Act shall be carried out as well and as cheaply as possible; but I think the Government certainly ought to take into consideration whether it would not be wise in them to appoint persons for a temporary purpose and in a temporary manner.

*THE EARL OF JERSEY: I will have the question referred for consideration, but I think it is really only a dispute about a name.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: If the noble Earl will consider it, that will be sufficient. We only wish, of course, to make the Bill efficient, and I hope he will not reject it without considering it.

*THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY: Then I withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY: After Clause 4 I propose a new clause, for this reason: The difficulty which has been found in working the Act of 1878 in the counties has been in getting convictions in the case of persons liable to penalties for offences. By Clause 61, Sub-section 2, of the Act of 1878, it is enacted that—

Now, my Lords, that is a very difficult thing to define. What is “with all practicable speed”? That difficulty has been very ably made use of on behalf of those persons who have been found offending, and it has been made the means of getting off even the most arch offenders. My proposition, therefore, is that a new clause should be inserted making it an offence if any person fails to give notice to the Inspector, leaving out the words “with all practicable speed.” That would make conviction more easy for the offence of neglecting to give notice of a diseased animal being in the person's possession. I may be told that the power is at present quite sufficient, but I can only say that I am informed it is very difficult to secure a conviction under the clause as it now stands. That is the reason I suggest to the Government the addition of the clause I have put down.

Amendment moved, after Clause 4, to insert as a new clause—

“Any person neglecting to give notice to the Inspector of the Board of Agriculture or the local authority of a diseased animal being in his possession, or selling, moving, or transferring any diseased animal, shall be subject to the penalties for offences under clauses sixty to sixty-six inclusive, of the principal Act, and in addition to the powers conferred by that Act.”—(The Lord Meldrum [M. Huntly]).

*THE EARL OF JERSEY: I agree with the noble Lord that there has been great difficulty in getting a conviction in some of these cases; but, still, the difficulty would exist, I think, whether those words were in or not, because the question would always arise, what is “neglecting”? It would be urged at once that the man had not neglected, because he was not aware that the animal was infected. Therefore, I do not think the noble Marquess's proposed words would make any difference in enforcing the law as it is at present. Of course, what is required is to make the Magistrates look upon the offence in a more severe light than it is sometimes looked upon at the present time.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

*THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY: There is another point upon this clause to which I wish particularly to call the attention of the noble Earl, which has arisen in connection with the administration of this Act. Under Clause 31 of the principal Act it has been held that, where the owner of a diseased animal neglects to give notice of that diseased animal being in his possession, that constitutes an offence, and the Local Authority can withhold the compensation payable for that animal. But where that animal has been in contact with a number of other animals on a farm and those animals are ordered to be slaughtered, as regards the compensation to which he is entitled for those animals which have been in contact with the diseased animal, he cannot be held to have committed an offence in that respect, and the compensation cannot be withheld. Now, I have very good evidence from many parts of Scotland as to the necessity for providing that such cases should be included among the offences, and that is the reason why I have put down the clause I now propose. The clerk of our Local Authority writes to me in these words—

“What I think is wanted is a clause declaring that if such an offence is committed the penalties should extend not only to the value of the diseased animal or animals, but should go the full length of enabling the Board of Agriculture to withhold all compensation from the offender for all the cattle belonging to him which may be slaughtered in consequence of the outbreak.”

There is an extract from another letter which I should like to read to your Lordships from a gentleman who for many years has taken great interest in the subject upon our Committee in Aberdeenshire. He says —

“Please impress upon the Committee and all with whom you act the defect arising from the absence of some heavy penalty being attached to reckless dealing and culpable negligence. It is my firm opinion that until some such enactment as your clause comes into force so long will men deal recklessly, and without regard to consequences, and all efforts to eradicate this scourge will be rendered unavailing.”

My Lords, I believe that if the Bill should be passed without this clause, the Board would not be able to withhold compensation for the animals which have been in contact with the disease, and we should be simply in the position in which we are now, having power to withhold compensation for animals which are diseased, but we should not be able to withhold it in respect of animals which have been in contact with them. It is for that reason I suggest the clause which I now move to be inserted.

“When any person neglects to give notice of a diseased animal being in his possession, or is convicted of any offence under Clauses 61 and 62 of the principal Act, it shall be lawful for the Board of Agriculture to withhold in whole or in part any sum payable to him as compensation under this Act.”—(The Lord Meldrum [M. Huntly].)

*THE EARL OF JERSEY: The Board of Agriculture are of opinion that they do not require the clause which the noble Marquess has moved. I quite see the point which he has laid before the Committee. They consider that if an owner has an animal which is infected by pleuro-pneumonia, and of which information is kept back by him, it will be a sufficient penalty for the offence if he is fined, as he can be, up to £20 for that animal, and if he does not receive compensation for its slaughter. It should be borne in mind that it never pays anybody to have his cattle slaughtered, or it ought not to pay a person to have his cattle slaughtered, if good valuers are employed. I hope the noble Marquess will not consider it necessary to press his Amendment.

*EARL SPENCER: I must confess I am not convinced by what the noble Earl has said, because I really hardly think he sees the point of the noble Marquess's suggestion. A man has an animal which is diseased, and he has a large herd. He neglects to report it, because he would rather run the risk of losing one animal than have the whole of the animals slaughtered and the place put under restriction. Therefore, he is naturally very much disinclined to report, and he neglects to report. Well, he runs the risk of being detected. If he is detected, no doubt he will not be paid for the one animal, but he will get full compensation for the whole of the remainder. We want to put a greater fine upon him. We know there are throughout the country certain dishonest people who are willing to take the risk of not being discovered, because they know that, at the worst, they will get full compensation for all the other animals which may be slaughtered. We think, therefore, that a greater burden should be put upon dishonest men who hide the disease. I quite agree with the Amendment of the noble Marquess, and I think that in a case of that sort the Board of Agriculture should have power not only to withhold compensation for the diseased animal under the section, but also to withhold compensation from owners for animals which have been in contact with infected animals.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: Do I understand the noble Marquess to say there has been a judicial decision upon this point?

*THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY: I do not think a judicial decision has ever been given. I do not know that the question has come before the superior Courts; but in every case of a Magistrate's decision it has always been so held.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Has it ever occurred in a case exactly in point where it was obvious that the owner of the animals was prepared to run the risk? He certainly might not care for losing £15, the compensation for one cow only, and I, therefore, hope this power will be given.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I hope the noble Earl will take this matter into his consideration, for I am sure it is one of the most important matters in the whole Bill. The chief danger we are exposed to is that of having a large number of animals throughout the country which have been in contact with diseased animals. If a man has an animal which is diseased, he runs the risk, of course, if he does not report it, of getting nothing for the diseased animal, and being possibly fined £15, but he will perhaps be doing the very thing the noble Marquess was afraid had been done in Forfarshire, that is, he may send out 60 or 70 cows all over the country which had been in contact with the diseased animal; and remember, my Lords, that we are very much exposed to this in large dairies, especially in towns. A thing of this sort might easily happen there, and surely it is desirable to make the penalty in such cases as large as possible. I hope the Government will therefore take the matter into their serious consideration.

*THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY: If my noble Friend will promise to consider it by the Third Reading I will withdraw the clause.

Amendment, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

Bill reported, without Amendment; and to be read 3^d on Tuesday next.

FLASHING SIGNALS—ADMIRAL COLOMB'S INVENTION.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*LORD SUDELEY: In rising to ask Her Majesty's Government whether they were now in a position to state what reward they proposed to give to Admiral Colomb for his invention of flashing signals, said: My Lords, before I put the question of which I have given notice I wish for a few moments to refer to a rumour which I have heard, namely, that the Treasury propose to offer to Admiral Colomb the paltry sum of £2,000. Now, my Lords, if that be true, such a sum is so far below what the merits of the case deserve, and would be such an insult to the Navy, that I sincerely trust the matter may be re-considered, and that, at any rate, my noble Friend who will answer this question will be able to say that the statement is incorrect. Your Lordships are aware that when this question was brought forward some three weeks ago the matter was gone very thoroughly into, and my noble Friend who represents the Admiralty stated at once that he fully concurred in the statements I had made;

he showed how very valuable this invention was; he showed that our fleets could not go to sea, or proceed in fogs, or at night, if they had not the advantage of being able to use these flashing signals; and he showed generally that the Admiralty thoroughly approve of Admiral Colomb receiving a suitable reward. At that time my noble Friend showed also very clearly that while the Admiralty were very strongly of opinion that a great deal ought to be done for Admiral Colomb, they were fettered and controlled entirely by the Treasury. If the head of one public Department thinks a sufficient reward should be offered to a meritorious officer it is un-constitutional and unusual for that Department to throw the blame entirely on the Treasury. The Treasury is really the servant of the Government. If the First Lord of the Admiralty and his colleagues know a grievous wrong is being done to the Navy, there are ways of forcing the Treasury to do what they consider right. Surely, my Lords, the Admiralty, and through them the Government, are alone responsible, and it is a very weak procedure to say they cannot do it because the Treasury are opposed. As I stated on the former occasion, unfortunately there is a strong feeling growing up in the Navy that as regards rewards the same attention is not paid to that branch of the Service as to the Army. Here we have a case in point. I could name other instances, but I will name one which is a very clear case. Only a short time ago Major Watkin made an invention which will be of great use in time of war for the Army, and no less a sum than £25,000 and £1,000 a year for 10 years was awarded to him, making altogether £35,000. But in the Navy what do we see? Admiral Colomb invents a system by means of which our ships can be safely navigated in the dark and in fogs. It has been acknowledged that without that invention our ships could not go to sea; yet year after year this matter has been postponed, and we are now told that the Treasury propose to give the inventor the paltry sum of £2,000! My Lords, the two cases are exactly similar. Here you have in one case Major Watkin receiving for his invention of the range-finder a sum of £35,000—and I do not for a moment say that is too much—and, on the other hand, if the rumour I have heard is correct, the paltry sum of £2,000 is offered. My Lords, I do not think it is necessary for me to say any more. I will only add this: that if it is true my noble Friend, on behalf of the Admiralty, is going to say that is really the case, every officer in the Navy will feel that an insult has been offered to the Navy, and a very painful feeling will be aroused. I sincerely trust my noble Friend will be able to say something different. I am quite certain that if he does mention £2,000 it will bring great discredit on Her Majesty's Government. I beg to ask the question of which I have given notice.

LORD ELPHINSTONE: My Lords, I must, in the first place, thank my noble Friend for having from time to time put off this question, which has undoubtedly been a very long time on the notice paper. When last Friday he put the question I asked him to defer it until to-day, because there was a correspondence going on between the two Departments, the Treasury and the Admiralty, at the time; and it was only to-day that we received a definite reply from the Treasury, in effect that they had fully considered Admiral Colomb's claim in all its various points, and they made a definite proposal to the Admiralty for Admiral Colomb's acceptance. There were certain conditions attached to this proposal, and the letter from the Treasury, or a copy of it, would be forwarded to Admiral Colomb. My noble Friend asks what the sum named was. The sum which is proposed in the Treasury Minute is, I understand, £2,000.

THE EARL OF CLANWILLIAM: Well, my Lords, I was never more astonished! Upon my word, I really cannot express my astonishment at such behaviour. Such treatment of a Naval Officer! No words can express my astonishment. My Lords, the reward is totally inadequate.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH: My Lords, I am very sorry the noble Lord has no power in this matter, and that my noble Friend has made his statement to so very thinly-attended a House. I can fully confirm, not from personal experience but from evidence which is perfectly trustworthy, and I think impossible to contradict, the value of Admiral Colomb's signals. However, I may refer to my own experience when another system of signals was used, of which I was very cognisant. It was my lot very many years ago to serve as officer of the watch in a very large fleet where the old code of signals was used. A fog came on, and they at once became invisible. I am told on the best authority that, with the present system of Admiral Colomb's signals, every species of danger, all fear of confusion, may be avoided by using them. I well remember at the time I mention sailing with that large fleet off the coast of Portugal. Signals were made; I myself repeatedly saw them, but they were extremely confusing—quite incomprehensible; the vessel anchored, and when the fog cleared away there was not another ship out of 25 in sight. I can only join my noble Friend in expressing entire astonishment at the course which has been taken by the Admiralty in this case. With regard to what my noble Friend opposite has said in reference to rewards in the Army, I may mention that Major Palliser, who invented a gunnery system and introduced the use of chilled shot, received £10,000, was made a baronet, and was promoted in the Service. Another case was that of Mr. Hale. His invention was in regard to the manufacture of rockets. He received £8,000. Captain Moncrieff received £10,000—I forget exactly what the subject of his invention was—I believe it was for gun-carriages, but it was vastly inferior in value to Admiral Colomb's. For that invention Captain Moncrieff received £1,000 a year for some years and £10,000 down. Within the last few days I see that a foreign Government, only a third or fourth-rate Naval Power, has offered four times this amount for an invention which has been made for it, even before it has turned out to be successful. If naval officers are to be treated in the way Admiral Colomb has been, and if the Naval Service, which entails such hard conditions upon sailors, is to be so disregarded and discouraged, I can only say that, in the future, there will be no inducement to naval men to employ their skill and leisure, as Admiral Colomb has done, in bringing out valuable inventions which in this case have been of great advantage, not only to the Navy, but to the Merchant Service, and every ship that sails. I think my noble Friend will agree with me that the original reason why Admiral Colomb's claims were put aside was that there was a misapprehension as to his position. I believe it was understood that Admiral Colomb had accepted the paltry sum of £500 as putting an end to all his claims. That, I think my noble Friend is now perfectly aware, was a misconception on the part of the Admiralty; the matter has gone on for nearly 30 years; Admiral Colomb has borne it all with great patience, and I think both he and the Navy deserve better treatment.

LORD ELPHINSTONE: I only desire to correct one statement of my noble Friend: he has referred to the Admiralty as having awarded £2,000 to Admiral Colomb. The Admiralty had nothing to do with it; it is entirely in the hands of the Treasury.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH: That was a mistake of mine. I do not think the Admiralty can have considered the matter, and I do not think the matter was thoroughly laid before them.

LORD SUDELEY: A great deal of correspondence has, I understand, taken place between the Admiralty and officers in the Navy with regard to Admiral Colomb's invention, and I beg to give notice that I shall move for a copy of that correspondence on Tuesday next.

QUESTIONS.

CHARGE AGAINST AN INDIAN POLICE OFFICIAL.

Sir THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if his attention has been called to the statement that an Indian Police Official, in the execution of a warrant for the arrest of a Moughyr banker named Indranarain Saho, used improper methods of search towards members of the banker's family; and whether he will institute an inquiry into the matter?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): No, Sir; the Secretary of State has received no information of any such incident.

SIR T. ESMONDE: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he will have an inquiry made?

*SIR J. GORST: The question of the hon. Member is somewhat indefinite. There are many thousands of police in India, and the question does not even give a reference to the district in which the incident occurred. I am afraid, therefore, that it would be exceedingly difficult to cause an inquiry to be made with any satisfactory result.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I will repeat the question. I am afraid that it may have been put down wrong.

PETITIONS OF EAST INDIAN SUBJECTS.

MR. BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye): I beg to ask the hon. Baronet the Member for Walsall (Mr. C. Forster), as Chairman of the Committee on Public Petitions, whether, in the case of Indian Petitions signed in the Devanāgarī or Urdu characters, any means exist whereby the Committee can form an opinion as to the genuineness of such signatures; or whether it is the case that, by some custom or Standing Order made in previous years, the Petitions of East Indian subjects are exempt from the scrutiny to which ordinary Petitions are exposed?

SIR C. FORSTER (Walsall): In answer to the question of the hon. Member, I have to state that there are no means of testing the genuineness of signatures signed in native characters to Indian Petitions. I may remind the House, as bearing upon the question, that in the Session of 1881 the Committee on Public Petitions were ordered to print Petitions, even if informal, which, in the opinion of the Committee, bore upon Indian subjects.

LORD REAY AND THE GOVERNMENT OF BOMBAY.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether, with reference to the statements made in India and here respecting Lord Reay's offer to resign the office of Sir Thomas Esmonde

Governor of Bombay, it is the fact that, although Lord Reay did not tender his resignation to the Secretary of State for India, he did make a communication to the Viceroy on the subject?

*SIR J. GORST: The statement which I was instructed by the Secretary of State to make in this House on the 8th of May, that Lord Reay never tendered his resignation of the government of Bombay, was correct; but the Secretary of State has been unofficially informed that Lord Reay, by a secret and confidential telegram, the text of which was not communicated to the Secretary of State, intimated to the Viceroy that he would resign in the event of the mamlutdars being dismissed; and my noble Friend has been further unofficially informed that the Viceroy succeeded in dissuading Lord Reay from tendering his resignation.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): After that grave statement will the right hon. Gentleman still refuse to afford facilities for the discussion of the question?

MR. J. GORST: I must ask for notice of that question.

MR. BRADLAUGH: May I ask the leader of the House whether, after the very grave statement that Lord Reay felt it his duty to make a communication to the Viceroy almost equivalent to a tender of his resignation, the Government will not afford the means of having the question raised in this House?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I will consider the matter; but I am sorry to say that the opportunities I have of affording facilities for discussion are very slight indeed.

THE WHITGIFT TOMB AT CROYDON.

SIR JAMES CORRY (Armagh, Mid): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Penrith (Mr. J. W. Lowther) if the Charity Commissioners are aware that the restoration of the Whitgift Tomb and the payment of £200 out of the income of the Charity had been done with the express approval of the Patron and Visitor (the Archbishop of Canterbury); that the legal advisor (now deceased) raised no question as to the right of the Governors to use the income; that the Commissioners had themselves allowed the sum of £250 to be used out of the income towards the cost of re-building Croydon Parish Church ; and whether, in the face of these facts, the Commissioners would restore the money they had taken from the private purses of the present Governors, some of whom, were on the Court when the money was voted ?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith) : So far as the Charity Commissioners are informed, the Archbishop of Canterbury has not purported to give an express approval, as a Visitor, to the expenditure in question. It was at the instance of the Archbishop that the Governors applied for the ex post facto approval of the Charity Commissioners. The Commissioners learn that on the occasion of the original sanction of this expenditure by the Governors, their then legal adviser, who was present, was not asked for and did not offer his opinion ; and that when the question was before the Governors on a subsequent occasion, their present legal adviser expressed an opinion adverse to the expenditure, and ultimately declined to sign a letter to the Commissioners in the matter. The grant of £250 towards the re-building of the church was made by the Governors, with the previous sanction of the Commissioners, given in view of the fact that the interests of certain beneficiaries of the foundation were directly involved in the restoration of the accommodation hitherto provided for them in the church. Under these circumstances, and in view of the fact that the Governors have not challenged in a Court of Law the decision of the Commissioners, they are unable to promise any re-consideration of their decision.

THE ZANZIBAR PROTECTORATE.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether slavery is still a recognised institution on the clove and other plantations in the Island of Pemba ; whether he can state what is the average life of a slave employed on these plantations ; whether the large numbers annually required to make up the deficiency caused by deaths are necessarily recruited by new importations of slaves by the slave traders of the mainland ; and whether, in view of the intended Protectorate, Her Majesty's Government hope to induce the Sultan of Zanzibar to abolish the status of slavery in Pemba, under the exceptional circumstances in which it is maintained in that portion of his dominions ?

*THE UNDERSECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.) : Her Majesty's Government are aware of the existence of, and of the evils attending, slave labour in the Island of Pemba, and, in any changes which may be impending in that island, the policy which successive British Governments have followed with regard to the Slave Trade, will not be departed from.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if it be true that England and France have bound themselves by Treaty to respect the Sovereign rights of the Sultan of Zanzibar ; and if the Government have taken Zanzibar under their protection in the same way as Egypt ?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON : A Declaration was exchanged between this country and France on the 10th March, 1862, by which they reciprocally engaged to respect the independence of the Sultan of Zanzibar. There is no British Protectorate over Egypt.

MR. BLANE : Is there a Protectorate over Zanzibar ?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON : The House is aware that Her Majesty's Government propose to assume a Protectorate.

EGYPTIAN DEBT.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs when it is intended to present to Parliament Papers relating to the conversion of the Egyptian Debt ; and whether those Papers will include the Despatch lately mentioned by M. Ribot in the French Chamber, in which Lord Salisbury, according to M. Ribot's statement, explained or disavowed expressions contained in a recently-published Despatch from Her Majesty's Representative in Egypt ?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON : There are no Papers of importance which could be laid at present. The observation mentioned by M. Ribot that it was the duty of an officer reporting to Her Majesty's Government, to express his own views, and his own views only, was made in conversation and has not formed the subject of a Despatch.

PUBLIC OFFICE PENCILS.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the marks on the pencils supplied to the Public Offices, namely, "V. (Royal Crown) R. Broad Arrow. Civil Service. A Foreign Name. Broad Arrow. Bavaria," imply that such pencils, although bearing the British Crown, the Royal Cypher, and the British Government Brand, are made by foreign workmen, although paid for by British taxes; and, in such case, when the order was given; under the authority of what Department of State; what was its total amount; why it does not appear in the Parliamentary Return "Contracts with Foreigners" of this year or last; whether tenders were invited from British manufacturers giving employment to British workmen, and using lead raised in Cumberland or other parts of the United Kingdom; and what was the theoretical saving to the National Exchequer in this State encouragement of a foreign instead of a British industry?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The Crown, Royal Cypher, and Broad Arrow marked on lead pencils used in Government Departments, are placed upon them as a means of identification under the Public Stores Act, 1875; the addition of the name of a foreign country is made under the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, when the pencils have been manufactured abroad. Pencils are not purchased by the Stationery Office under running contracts, but in lots as required from time to time. In the last 10 years no order has been given for pencils to any "contractor outside the Kingdom." The orders given are not for pencils manufactured in any particular country, or from materials produced in any particular place, but for pencils of the kind required by the several Departments. I am unable to say what the theoretical saving is from purchasing foreign-made pencils, as there are no means of saying what would be the effect of limiting the orders to home-made pencils.

In reply to a further question by Mr. HOWARD VINCENT,

MR. JACKSON said: I believe that what happens is this. Different kinds of pencils are tried, and then the form is decided upon. In this case, the order was given to a London firm.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to give notice that I will call attention to this matter in Committee of Supply.

CRIMEAN VETERANS.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): I had intended to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the necessitous circumstances of many of the veterans who served in the Crimean War and Indian Mutiny; and whether he can now promise any measures for their relief? but at the request of the right hon. Gentleman I will postpone the question until Monday.

MILITIA VALISES.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether there have been repeated complaints of the unserviceable quality of the valises, made of so-called "French cloth," issued to certain Militia battalions with the brown leather valise equipment; what steps are to be taken to replace them with proper equipment; and whether it is the fact that commanding officers who have for three years running been ordered by Sir Evelyn Wood to report to the War Office on these valises supplied by Messrs. Ross do not even get a reply to their complaints?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): Questions upon this subject have already been asked and replied to in the House. There have been several complaints as to the valises referred to; but, from motives of economy, they must be used up.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): At whose expense is this to be done, at that of the manufacturer or of the Government?

INFANTRY RANGE FINDERS.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in June, 1888, the War Office advertised for designs for Infantry range finders, and about 17 out of some 200 sent in were selected for trial; whether, subsequently, a further competition took place between Major Watkin's instrument and that of

Mr. Lynam, of Dundalk; whether it is the fact that the War Office has refused to allow Mr. Lynam to see the results of this competition; whether Major Watkin, who has already received a very large sum for another range finder, is in Government employment; and whether Mr. Lynam's instrument did, or did not, prove superior in accuracy and speed to that of Major Watkin?

MR. BRODRICK: Designs for Infantry range finders were advertised for in May, 1888. About 40 specimens or descriptions of instruments were received, of which four (including Mr. Lynam's and two of Major Watkin's) were selected for further trial. It is contrary to the practice of the War Department to allow inventors to see the Reports which are made upon their inventions. Major Watkin is in Government employment. After very careful consideration the Committee, while admitting the accuracy of Mr. Lynam's instrument, were of opinion that Major Watkin's was better adapted for the rough work of a campaign.

MR. HANBURY: Is it the practice to invite persons to compete, and then to give them no opportunity of judging whether the War Office has treated them fairly or not?

MR. BRODRICK: In a competition of this character the Reports are not given to the various competitors because they might be damaging to individuals.

MR. HANBURY: Are they informed whether they won the competition or not?

MR. BRODRICK: Of course, they are informed whether they have succeeded or not.

HELIGOLAND.

SIR ROBERT FOWLER (London): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether provision will be made in the terms of the cession of Heligoland to enable British fishermen to exercise the rights they have so long enjoyed of fishing within three miles of the island?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No; the right of fishing in the territorial waters of the island, which appears to be of little value, will not be retained; but provisions will be made for the other rights enjoyed by British fishermen.

THE MUTINY ON BOARD H.M.S. EGERIA.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what were the causes which led to the mutiny on board H.M.S. Egeria?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): An inquiry into the circumstances referred to has been ordered by the Commander in Chief of the Station, but the result has not yet been reported to the Admiralty.

POLICE SUPERANNUATION.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House the proceedings of, and evidence taken by, the Committee which sat from last October onwards, to consider the Police Superannuation question?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The proceedings of the Departmental Committee were suspended, and the evidence taken by them was not completed; but, such as it is, I have no objection to lay it before the House if there is any general desire to see it, or before any Committee that may have to consider the Bill.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): Was there any evidence taken with regard to Scotland?

MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, having regard to the fact that, under present arrangements, in many Constabulary forces police are pensioned on two-thirds of their pay after 25 years' faithful service, and also to the small difference between the three-fifths proposed in the Bill and two-thirds, less than £7 upon a salary of £100, or about 3½d. per diem on the pension of a first-class constable, and bearing in mind the years of successive Governments through which these 30,000 deserving public servants have waited for the superannuation scheme and also the very small percentage of constables who last 25 years, Her Majesty's Government can on re-consideration consent to the two-thirds pensions after a quarter of a century, without age disqualification?

An hon. MEMBER: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers this question I wish to ask if he can state whether it is the intention of the Government to extend this principle of superannuation to other classes of workmen besides the police; and, if not, on what grounds do they propose to tax workmen, who are in the receipt of less wages, for the superannuation of the police?

*MR. MATTHEWS: I must ask my hon. Friend to allow me to postpone my answer to his question till a later period of the evening, when I move the Second Reading of the Police Superannuation Bill, and when I shall have a better opportunity of fully stating the views of the Government on the point he raises. In reply to the further question, I have to say that the police are the only class to whom the Superannuation Bill will apply.

MR. MONTAGU WILLIAMS.

MR. MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been directed to the following observation, reported in the Dublin Daily Express of the 25th instant, to have been made by Mr. Montagu Williams at the Thames Police Court the previous day, and characterised in that journal as a piece of silly impertinence—

"I expect there are a good many strangers from Ireland in this country; for my part, I wish they could all be sent back;"

and will he call the attention of the Lord Chancellor to the language alleged to have been used by Mr. Williams?

*MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the learned Magistrate that he made use of no such language as is imputed to him by the Dublin Daily Express. A man applied to the Magistrate for money to pay his journey to his own country, stating that he was an Irishman. The Magistrate replied to the effect that he had no funds for such a purpose; that a large fund would be necessary if all foreigners in London were to be sent home; but that an Irishman was not a foreigner, and was in his own country here.

Mr. Howard Vincent

THE POOLE POLICE.

MR. BOND (Dorset, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the authorities of the Borough of Poole have expressed a desire to amalgamate the borough police with that of the County of Dorset for a period of five years, to test whether such arrangement can be carried out to the satisfaction of both parties; and whether he is able to give his consent to this scheme, which will effect a large saving to the local taxpayers of the borough?

*MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; I am aware of the proposal to amalgamate these two forces. The matter involves some question of law, and also depends upon the view which may be taken of it hereafter by the Secretary of State, whoever he may be; but I am advised that his sanction will be necessary under the Act of Parliament.

ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT.

MR. ALFRED PEASE (York): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can explain why Her Majesty's Government, having lately refused to admit the validity of ancient Portuguese claims to African territory lying between the territory occupied by that Power on both the Eastern and Western Coasts of Africa, have since then acquiesced in the German contention with regard to certain African territory in favour of the "Hinterland" principle, and have announced that they cannot oppose "The claim which the German Government based on the fact that the region was in the immediate rear of their own;"

and what was the reasons for this difference of policy in the two cases; and whether Her Majesty's Government has secured for England, on the "Hinterland" principle, the region to the rear of Walfisch Bay as a sphere of British influence?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: It will be seen on reference to the Despatch addressed to Sir E. Malet, on the 14th inst., that Her Majesty's Government have not accepted the Hinterland doctrine as advocated by Germany. Claims of Portugal rest on historical grounds which are not admitted by Her Majesty's Government. Negotiations are still proceeding in regard to Walfisch Bay and Damara-land.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is the case, as shown by the map in the Tea-Room, that under the Agreement with Germany the sphere of German influence has been extended 250 miles southward, to about the 22nd degree of South latitude, and about 350 miles eastward to the Zambesi; whether this will carry German authority eastward more than half the way across the African Continent, and place a new German territory of over 300 miles between North Bechuanaland and West Makolololand; whether this will cause one section of the Makololos to be under German influence and another portion under British influence; and whether he will show on the map the old German boundary on the West Coast as well as on the East?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I do not understand what the hon. Member means by the first paragraph of his question. The German Agreement with Portugal of 1886 defined the limits of their respective influence on the West Coast of Africa; but the boundaries of the German and British spheres in that quarter have not till now been clearly described. Only a strip of territory 20 miles wide will give the Germans independent access to the waterway of the Zambesi. It is possible that there will be Makololos within both the German and British spheres. The tracing paper attached to the map in the Tea-Room shows the eastern boundary of German Damaraland on the 20th parallel of east longitude, up to the 18th parallel of south latitude; that is unaltered; but above that, and to the north-west, it had not been defined previously. We have secured the recognition of British influence by our neighbours in vast regions; we ought not to be jealous of what remains.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, Col'lege): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to a statement of the Vienna correspondent of the Times, to the effect that—

“The Russian papers attach most importance to the theory that they have themselves derived as to there being a secret clause in the Agreement relative to East Africa which would make England and Germany allies in case of war;”

and whether he is in a position to dispel this source of irritation by denying the existence of any such secret provision or understanding in connection with the Agreement?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government have undertaken no new obligation in regard to European Powers either in the present Agreement or otherwise.

HAMPTON COURT PARK.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, N.W.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he has received a copy of a resolution passed unanimously at a large meeting held at the Mansion House, on the 13th instant, under the presidency of the Lord Mayor, to the effect that it would be a great boon to the people of London, as well as the people of Kingston, if Hampton Court Park were open to the public; whether this sufficiently meets his objection, that “the opening of the park could only be in obedience to the demand of the public generally”; and whether he will now favourably reconsider the question of opening the park to the public?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (MR. PLUNKET, University of Dublin): A copy of the resolution referred to in the question has been received by me, and it is my intention to submit it for the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. At the same time I must observe that a desire on the part of the inhabitants of the neighbourhood of Hampton Court, or of any portion of the public, is by no means the only element in the question, as I fully explained in the Debate on the Estimates, when I was supported by a large majority of the Committee.

THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether a meeting of representatives of the Metropolitan Police was allowed to be held at the Paddington Police Station, last week; whether another meeting which was to be held at Bow Street Police Station on the 23rd was prohibited; whether it has been customary to allow the members of the Force to meet and discuss their grievances; and whether it is intended to allow the men to meet and discuss the question of their superannuation and their wages?

MR. C. GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): Was not the late Chief Commissioner, Mr. Monro, favourable to the men holding meetings, and have not the new orders come from the new Chief Commissioner?

MR. MATTHEWS: A meeting of men from different divisions was held at Paddington, but it was held without authority from the Commissioner, who was, however, of opinion that there had been a misapprehension of the orders on the subject. A Petition was received by the Commissioner, on Monday, asking permission to hold a meeting that afternoon at Bow Street. It was received too late for a reply to be sent. No permission was given, and the meeting was not allowed. The Consolidated Orders do not allow meetings of the Force without the permission of the Commissioner, and it has not been customary to allow them. Recently permission was conveyed through the superintendents of divisions for the men to meet in their own divisions, to discuss the Superannuation Bill, and that permission has not been withdrawn.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES.

MR. HOWELL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can state to the House the total number of Friendly Societies in the United Kingdom, the number registered, and the estimated number unregistered, the total number of members, the aggregate amount of the funds, and the estimated amount expended in benefits, in the year 1888, and the total income and total expenditure for that year?

MR. JACKSON: I shall be glad if the hon. Member will be good enough to put this question on Monday. I have not been able to obtain the information.

GENERAL ANDERSON.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether General Anderson has resigned, or been removed from, his position at Woolwich Arsenal; and, if so, can he state to the House the reason for General Anderson's sudden resignation or removal?

Mr. James Rowlands

MR. BRODRICK: If the hon. Member refers to Dr. Anderson, the Director General of the Ordnance Factories, I am glad to say that there is no foundation whatever for the question.

SWAZILAND.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies why Sir Francis de Winton's Report on Swaziland has not been laid upon the Table?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, Toxteth): Because, Sir, negotiations largely based upon that Report are still in progress.

THE POST OFFICE JUBILEE.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is his intention to publish a Jubilee Report this year, giving full particulars of the progress of the Department during the last 50 years, with all details as to changes in inland, foreign, and colonial rates, &c.?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that I had not contemplated the compilation of so stupendous a work as that to which the hon. Member refers, and, indeed, there would not be time within the limits of an ordinary Session to collect, collate, verify, and edit the postal history of the past 50 years.

ASSAULT AT DEWSBURY.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Attorney General if he can now say whether, in the case of the conviction for common assault at Dewsbury, on 9th June, the prosecution was against a man arrested by the police on the charge of indecently assaulting two mill girls; whether the girls were directed by the police to pay, and did pay, in addition to the Magistrates Clerk's fees of 17s., a further sum of 5s. for the attendance of a witness; whether, in proceedings for such offences, the law provides for compensation to prosecutors; and whether there is any enactment making prosecutors in such a case liable for Justice Clerk's fees and compensation to witnesses?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I must ask that the question be deferred until Monday.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I will repeat it on Monday.

PRIVATE SECRETARIES TO MINISTERS.

MR. WATT: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Government have any objections to the publication of a Return of the private secretaries to Ministers since 1869 who have received permanent appointments in the Public Services?

MR. JACKSON: The Government have no objection to give the information, but, as the wording of the Return would have to be first considered, I desire that the hon. Member should speak with me if he wishes to proceed further.

THE LICENSING CLAUSES AND A NATIONAL GALLERY OF BRITISH ART.

MR. QUILTER (Suffolk, Sudbury): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if, in the event of the Licensing Clauses being withdrawn, Her Majesty's Government will consider the desirability of applying the sum (or a portion of it) thus rendered available towards the provision of a suitable site and building for a National Gallery of British Art in a central position in the Metropolis?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in answer to a question yesterday, indicated the course the Government desired to pursue with respect to Mr. Tate's most generous offer.

MR. QUILTER: Cannot the Government establish a gallery in a position more accessible to the north and east of London than South Kensington?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am under the impression that South Kensington is accessible to the north and east of London. Sites for such a gallery more accessible to the north and east of London would be very difficult to obtain.

MEETINGS OF POST OFFICE OFFICE OFFICIALS.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster
VOL. CCCXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

General what have been the total expenses of employing the official reporters who have been engaged to report the proceedings and speeches at meetings of Post Office officials; and where the items of these expenses will appear in the Post Office Vote?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The payments made to the official reporters in question amount to £74 4s. 2d. These charges will be included in the total amount expended under the head of incidental expenses.

EMERGENCY MEN.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the case of Lord Clanricarde's emergency men, who were tried at Woodford, on 5th of May, at the prosecution of Mr. Patrick M'Dermott for stealing turf, the property of complainant, which was dismissed by the Magistrates on the ground that plaintiff had his remedy by civil action; whether these same Magistrates fined evicted tenants of Lord Clanricarde some time previously for digging potatoes which they had sown in their lands previous to their eviction; and what action, if any, the police have taken with regard to the turf thefts of Lord Clanricarde's employés?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I am informed that the Magistrates, after hearing the evidence, dismissed the case without prejudice, stating that they considered it a case for a civil remedy, as they believed the caretakers did not act with guilty intent, but in the belief that the turf was the property of their employer. In 1888 one evicted tenant was fined for illegally removing the peat from a farm which he previously occupied, but which at the time of the removal was in the occupation of Lord Clanricarde. The Magistrates, who heard the case now in question, did not, as a matter of fact, adjudicate in the case heard in 1888. No action has been taken by the police.

CORONERS' SALARIES.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the decision of the Judges in a case reserved by Mr. Justice Andrews, at the Spring Assizes of 1889, for the county of Down, whereby they decided that the annual salary payable to every Coroner ought to be calculated anew in each year, according to the average amount of fees upon the inquests held by him, or his predecessor in office, during the five years then last past; whether he is aware that it was contended on behalf of the Coroners of Down, that the third section of "The Coroners' (Ireland) Act, 1881," which substituted an annual salary in lieu of the fees formerly paid to Coroners, provided, or was intended to provide, that the annual salary was then to be fixed once for all, on the calculation to be first made after the passing and pursuant to the third section of said Act, and an annual salary so calculated was paid to Coroners in Ireland from the passing of the Act up to the time of this decision; and whether, considering that this section of the Act was intended to prevent unnecessary inquests, and that it so operated before the decision of the Judges was given, and considering also that, by this decision, Coroners in Ireland have now a pecuniary interest in holding the greatest number of inquests in every year, he will make inquiry into the matter, with the view to have their salaries fixed once for all, as was intended during the passing of the Act?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I should like to examine the Papers before giving a definite answer to the question.

IRISH LIGHT RAILWAYS.

Mr. DALTON (Donegal, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he can now state when the Government intend to go on with the Stranorlar and Glenties line, passed unanimously by the Grand Jury at the last Spring Assizes, and supported by all sections of the community; and what is the reason of giving precedence to the Killybegs line, which has not received unanimous local support?

Mr. JACKSON: In answer to the hon. Member's question I have to say that the Government, in the interests of the counties, attach great importance to satisfactory arrangements for working being made, and, if possible, with existing railway companies. No proposals for working have, so far as I know, been put forward in the case of the Stranorlar and Glenties line. Proposals for working have been put forward in the case of the Killybegs line, and, therefore, the negotiations have made more rapid progress.

LORD COURTTOWN.

Mr. JOHN BARRY (Wexford, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the following statement in the Daily News of the 24th June:—

"A case has just been tried before Judge Darley, County Court Judge of Wexford, which was an appeal on behalf of Messrs. Kennedy and Doyle from a sentence of three months' imprisonment with hard labour, imposed by a Coercion Court, on a charge of conspiracy. Doctor Counsel appeared for the appellants, and, alleging that the case was one of mere police suspicion, was about to call evidence of character stating that the defendant Kennedy bore the very highest character in his district. Judge Darley, however, when the question of character was being discussed, produced on the Bench a letter he had received from Lord Courtown, who, in an apparently confidential communication, discussed the merits of the case with the Judge, and said the defendant Kennedy bore a very high character, and was a most respectable man, although a member of the National League, and that he had no doubt that that evidence was sufficient to justify Kennedy's conviction. Lord Courtown added a hope that Kennedy's character would qualify his punishment!"

if Lord Courtown made the private communication to the Judge, as alleged; and whether any inquiry has or will be made into the facts of the case?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no title to interfere with, or ask questions of, County Court Judges as to the discharge of their judicial duties.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is not aware that any person in England who sent such a letter to a Judge would stand a good chance of being proceeded against for contempt of Court, and whether he thinks Lord Courtown is entitled to act in the way he has done?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member is going on the hypothesis that the statement in the question is necessarily true.

Mr. CLANCY (Dublin County, N.): Does the right hon. Gentleman deny the truth of the statement?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not deny or affirm it. What I say is that I have no title to ask questions of, or interfere with, a County Court Judge in respect to the exercise of his judicial functions.

MR. J. BARRY: Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire as to the facts?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; it is no part of my duty to write to a County Court Judge asking questions in reference to alleged transactions at some trial in which he has adjudicated.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this is not the first time that Lord Courtown has interfered with the administration of justice in Ireland?

MR. J. BARRY: I wish to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether we are to understand that a letter addressed to a Judge in Ireland concerning the character of the defendant on trial before him is not to be held contempt of Court?

MR. MADDEN: The hon. Member has put an abstract question to me. There is an allegation——

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: "Allegation" indeed! What are you talking about? It is a fact.

MR. MADDEN: A certain matter occurred before a County Court Judge, and my right hon. Friend has already explained clearly that he is unable to ascertain the truth of the statement one way or the other.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the fact that the Judge was influenced in his decision by the action of Lord Courtown, and that the matter was reported in almost every newspaper in Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The only information I have on the subject is derived entirely from the question, and I do not think it necessary to make further inquiry.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Will the Chief Secretary bring the matter to the notice of the Lord Chancellor, if he holds that he has no right to interfere himself?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The only excuse that I should have in bringing the matter before the attention of the Lord Chancellor would be that, in my opinion, the County Court Judge acted improperly in receiving a letter addressed to him on the Bench, and not punishing the author of it. It is not my business to attack the County Court Judge, which I should be doing indirectly by adopting the course suggested, and I repeat that I have no title to interfere in the matter.

MR. J. BARRY: I beg to give notice that I will take the first opportunity of raising the question in Supply.

FATHER CROWLEY.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if it is a fact that, at the trial of Father Crowley, at Bantry, on the 23rd instant, the following forces were stationed in the town: 150 police, under the command of a county Inspector and four district Inspectors; 50 soldiers of the Welsh Regiment, under the command of Captain Trishy; and 50 marines from H.M. Gunboat Shannon, under the command of Captain Kelly; and, if so, why was this force drafted into this town? I beg further to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention had been called to the reports in the Cork papers of the trial of Rev. J. J. Crowley, at Bantry, on Monday last, before Mr. Roche, R.M., and Captain Wick, R.M., on a charge brought under the Criminal Law and Procedure Act, in which it is stated that——

"Mr. Shinkevin (counsel for the defendant, said that he should complain that some of his witnesses were not permitted to enter Court) and were hustled about by policemen;"

and that Mr. Roche, R.M., said——

"That orders had been given to admit the witnesses, but the Bench had not control of the outside arrangements of the Court;"

If he can state who had charge of the arrangements outside of the Court, and why were not the proper facilities given for the admission of witnesses on behalf of the accused clergyman?

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): I beg also to ask the Chief Secretary whether he is aware that on Wednesday, the 25th instant, at Bantry, County Cork, the Rev. Father Crowley, of Goleen, County Cork, was sentenced by the Magistrates, Messrs. Roche and Welch, to sentences of one month each on two charges of intimidation, and a further term of four months in default of giving bail to be of good behaviour, on the charges of having intimidated the Rev. Mr. Hopley, Rector of Tourmore, County Cork, and Sergeant Rourke, of the local police force, by using expressions of indignation at what he considered the unjust eviction of a Protestant tenant, who is old and blind, named Bayley, and his treatment by the Trustees of the local or Protestant Church, of part of the lands of which Bayley was a tenant, another part of the charge of intimidation against Father Crowley being that he used intimidating language when expressing sympathy with a Protestant tenant, named Tom Donovan, who was recently imprisoned for refusing to remove from his land a hut he had permitted to be erected there as shelter for an evicted tenant; whether his attention has been called to the fact that Sergeant Nolan, who was examined for the prosecution, admitted, on cross-examination, that Father Crowley was remarkable for the moderation of his language, and had often been the means of bringing about amicable settlements between landlords and tenants in the district; and that on several occasions, in his chapel and elsewhere, he had himself heard Father Crowley warn the people against breaking the law, and whether in this case, the Magistrates having refused to state a case for the Superior Courts, any appeal is possible?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Rev. Father Crowley was sentenced for very gross intimidation against a Protestant clergyman, named Hopley, and a police sergeant, named Rourke, for having given evidence against one Donovan, who, as I understand, had threatened violence against Mr. Hopley. Sergeant Nolan praised the moderation which Father Crowley had often shown in his language. Unfortunately, that moderation does not seem to have been invariable. The Magistrates may be compelled by a mandamus to state a case if their refusal to do so has been an improper one.

DR. KENNY: How is it, if this is a case of gross intimidation, a sentence of only one month's imprisonment was inflicted, by which the accused was deprived of the right of appeal. In view of his own promises in this House, will the right hon. Gentleman in future instruct the Magistrates to give such sentences as would allow an appeal?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not admit that the infliction of a sentence of one month indicated that the offence was otherwise than of a serious character.

Dr. Kenny

With regard to the last portion of the hon. Member's question I can only repeat that I have neither the right nor the power to interfere with the Magistrates.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that most of the parishioners of this clergyman have joined the Roman Catholic faith as a protest against the sentence?

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I beg to give notice that at the earliest possible date I will call attention to this extraordinary case.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Was the alleged intimidation employed on behalf of a Protestant tenant, whom the Roman Catholic clergyman represented as oppressed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, I do not think that that accurately represents what occurred. The case originally arose from the eviction of a Protestant tenant, but I understand that Donovan, with regard to whom Mr. Hopley gave evidence as to threatened violence, was not a Protestant. [Several hon. MEMBERS: Yes, he was.]

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will take any proceedings for criminal conspiracy against the 40 Protestant families who have left the Protestant church and gone to the Roman Catholic church, and thereby deprived the Protestant clergyman of his living?

[No answer was given.]

DONAGHADEE HARBOUR.

COLONEL WARING, (Down, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he has yet received the Report of the Irish Board of Works' Inspector on Donaghadee Harbour, and, if so, what steps he intends to take with regard to it?

MR. JACKSON: I have received Reports from the Board of Works, and have come to the conclusion that it will be necessary to incur some expense, but I am not prepared to do that to any great extent, because the traffic would not justify it.

POLICE PROTECTION IN IRELAND.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will give the names of the strangers visiting Ireland since 1st January last, who asked for, and received, police protection?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should hope there are none; but, in order to be certain, local inquiries would be necessary all over Ireland.

"SHADOWING."

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has seen the statement in the newspapers that Mr. P. D. Kenny, of Birmingham, who lately visited his relations at Kilkelly, Mayo, was "shadowed" by the police during his stay in that country, although his only object in Ireland was to visit his friends; whether he belonged to any organisation of an Irish character, or joined in any demonstration, or made, or attempted to make, any speeches whilst he was in Ireland; whether he is aware that, while Mr. Kenny was sojourning at his sister's house, two policemen came each morning, watched the doors till he came out, and then followed him wherever he went, keeping constantly within hearing distance, and stopping to listen to his conversation when he spoke to friends whom he met, and that when Mr. Kenny was engaged in changing some clothing in a shop the policemen entered the room where he was and stood staring at him while he was engaged in undressing and re-dressing, and whether he will take steps to have visitors to Ireland protected from being thus followed by the police?

MR. MC CARTAN: I have also to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been called to the paragraph in the Echo of the 24th instant, under the heading "Shadowing in Ireland;" whether he is aware that Mr. P. D. Kenny, of Birmingham, complains that during a recent visit to his friends in Kilkelly, County Mayo, "his life was rendered unendurable by the persistent shadowing to which he was subjected;" whether two policemen came each morning to his sister's house during his stay there, and watched the doors till he came out, and then followed him wherever he went, and kept constantly within hearing distance of him, and came and listened to the conversation when he happened to meet a friend on the road; that these policemen followed him into a shop where he went to order a suit of clothes, and pursued him into the room where his measure was taken, and remained there all the time he was in the room, and that this shadowing continued until he left the place; and whether he will state by whose directions, and on what ground, Mr. Kenny was thus subjected to a continuous system of "shadowing"?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that owing to statements in the Nationalist Press that Mr. Kenny had addressed meetings of a National League Branch which was suppressed as an unlawful association, his movements were watched by the police when he entered the proclaimed district, but that it is not the case that they watched his sister's house, nor was any supervision exercised over him there. The police did not enter any room where Mr. Kenny was changing his clothing.

MR. CLANCY asked how the Chief Secretary could pay attention to the statement that Mr. Kenny had attended a meeting of a suppressed branch of the Irish League when he had repeatedly alleged that those branches were things of the past?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I only spoke of the desire of Mr. Kenny to appear to have attended, and not of his success.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I wish to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman has seen by the Daily News of a few days ago that I have taken this question word for word from that newspaper; and will he inquire of the editor of the Daily News from what source he got his information?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think that I can add to my responsibilities that of keeping the Daily News straight in all its assertions.

THE ORDER OF SUPPLY.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that there are several very important urgent questions connected with Vote 3, in Class 5, of the Estimates; whether there is any reason for the continued postponement of this Vote; and whether he will consult the convenience of the House by taking the Votes in the order in which they have been begun?

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I should also like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, will the Army Clothing Vote be taken first on Thursday, and then the War Office Vote.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is intended to take the Clothing and Victualling Vote first, and the War Office Vote afterwards. I trust that these Votes may both be taken in the course of the evening. In answer to the hon. Member for Peckham, I am aware that there are important questions connected with Vote 3 in Class 5 of the Estimates, and I am anxious that the Vote should be put down for discussion at the earliest possible moment, but at present I am not in a position to say when it will be taken.

*SIR W. BARTELOT (Sussex, N.W.): May I ask whether Lord Hartington's Report is to be discussed in connection with the Army Vote? Will the Chairman of Committee allow us to fully discuss that Report on the Vote?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I ought to say that the Government propose to proceed with the Bills on the Paper on Monday in the order in which they stand. I have always been under the impression that upon the War Office Vote it will be possible for the House to discuss the question which involves the Report of the Commission, presided over by the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale. It is, of course, not in my power to limit the discretion of the Chairman of Committees, but I have little doubt that reasonable discussion will be allowed on the subject of the Report.

*SIR W. BARTELOT: The Navy question is so mixed up with the Army question that both ought to be discussed together. Does my right hon. Friend think that the Chairman of Committees will allow us to discuss the two questions together?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sure my hon. and gallant Friend will forgive me if I decline to express any opinion upon the point. There are two separate Reports, the one relating to the Navy, the other to the Army, and it is for the Chairman of Committees to determine whether on the War Office Vote it will be right to discuss them both.

*SIR W. BARTELOT: This is a very important question. Will the right hon.

Mr. Baumann

Gentleman set aside a day for the discussion of the Report affecting, as it does, the Navy as well as the Army, if it should prove to be necessary?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will endeavour to meet the views of the House. A Vote for the Admiralty still remains to be taken, and it will afford an opportunity for the discussion of the matter in which my hon. and gallant Friend is interested. If it should be possible to place this Vote and the War Office Vote together the Government will do so.

INDIGENT EMIGRANTS.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been called to the rejection by America of certain indigent emigrants recently conveyed to New York by the Cunard steamship Umbria, and to the company being required by the United States Authorities to bring them back to Liverpool; and, if he can state the nationality of these persons who are unfit for America, and, in the event of their being foreigners, if their re-patriation can be effected, having regard to there being less space in the United Kingdom than in America for superfluous foreign workers?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (SIR M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I am informed by the company that the passengers in question are seven Belgians, who, it is alleged, had, by previous contract, engaged themselves to labour at their avocations as glass-blowers in the United States, and had thus brought themselves within the category of persons who are prohibited by American law from landing in that country; also that the men were not indigent, and that their families who accompanied them to New York, remain in America. It is understood that the men are returning to Belgium.

THE IMPRISONMENT OF MR. JASPER TULLY.

DR. FITZGERALD (Longford, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state why Mr. Jasper Tully, editor of the Roscommon Herald, now undergoing a sentence of three months' imprisonment under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, has been removed from Sligo Gaol to Tullamore Gaol?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board report that the transfer was made in accordance with the general practice in similar cases.

IRISH PRISONERS IN ENGLISH PRISONS.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that at a recent meeting of the Dalkey Town Commissioners, the Chairman refused to allow a letter from the Limerick City Council to be read, which letter contained a copy of resolutions adopted in Limerick relative to the maltreatment of Mr. John Daly and others in English prisons; and what the reasons for his action were; and, if so, why the usual custom was not followed in this case at such Board of reading all communications?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no control over the Town Commissioners.

CLARE INFIRMARY.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state how near to the doors of the Clare Infirmary the police stationed themselves, or were stationed by the officer commanding them, in order to watch the movements of the two hon. Members for Clare on the occasion last year on which the hon. Members attended at the Infirmary for the purpose of fulfilling their duties as Governors of the Institution; and whether the "shadowing" which was practised on that occasion had his sanction?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that on the occasion in question the police were not stationed at any particular place; nor did they approach the door of the Infirmary nearer than about 100 yards.

CHARGE AGAINST AN IRISH POLICEMAN.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether a complaint of moonlighting has been brought against a policeman named Palmer, stationed at Shanballymore, near Tipperary; whether it is true, as alleged, that Palmer, under cover of night, attacked the cottage of a poor widow named Corbett, breaking all the glass and sashes in the front and back windows; that Palmer, on being told to desist by Mrs. Corbett, replied "that if she came out he would shoot her," and endeavoured also to burst in the door; and that he attacked and broke the windows at the house of Mr. William Burke at Boherveedrum, of Michael Bryan and Mr. John Trehy; and whether any steps will be taken to prevent similar occurrences in and around Tipperary?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have had no time to receive a special Report on the complaint against the policeman Palmer, but from a Report previously received on the same subject it appears that there are serious charges pending against the constable before the Magistrate. In the meantime, he is, of course, suspended from duty.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I would ask whether it is true that on the occasion here referred to the house of a man was attacked at night, that the man jumped out of bed, and pursued the person who had broken the windows of the house, and found him to be a constable, and that the man and his wife took the constable to the police station? Is it true that a number of outrages of the same kind have recently been committed in the district; and, as the right hon. Gentleman, in a recent speech in this House, made the commission of outrages an excuse for the suppression of public meetings in the district, will he institute a special inquiry into the question of the source and origin of these outrages?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think there can be any doubt as to the origin of the outrages committed, but I will inquire, if the hon. Member wishes me to. As the constable's case is sub judice it would not be right for me to interfere further at present.

THE CENSUS.

MR. WOODALL (Hanley): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is now in a position to say when the Bill for authorising the Decennial Census will be introduced; and how soon the Report of the Departmental Committee will be presented to the House?

*MR. RITCHIE: I hope shortly to introduce the Bill?

THE PAY OF THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

MR. H. L. W. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the subject of the pay of the Metropolitan Police, especially with regard to the difference in the rate of remuneration granted to the City Police as compared with the Metropolitan Police, will be referred to the Select Committee appointed to consider the Superannuation Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think it hardly possible to do that, as it would be irregular to refer the matter to the Committee.

APPEALS UNDER THE ALLOTMENT ACTS.

MR. J. COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): I wish to ask the President of the Local Government Board a question of which I have given him private notice, namely, whether he is aware that by the exclusion of all Municipal Boroughs from the operation of the Allotments Appeal Bill, large numbers of agricultural labourers will be altogether deprived of the benefits conferred by the Bill; and whether he will take steps to remedy this defect by giving the same right of appeal to labourers living in the smaller county boroughs as defined in the Local Government Act, 1888?

*MR. RITCHIE: I do not deny that the absence of an appeal in the cases to which the question refers is a matter for regret. As the hon. Member knows, the Government proposed originally that an appeal should be allowed; but the opinion of the House was so opposed to this that, notwithstanding our belief that there ought to be an appeal, we felt we could not resist the opposition. The Government cannot now consent to take the initiative in respect of any legislation intended to remedy the defect to which the hon. Member refers.

MR. J. COLLINGS: There were 200 of these small boroughs, nearly half of them having less than 5,000 inhabitants, and many of them only 2,000. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that if the measure is not amended a very considerable portion of the agricultural labourers of this country will be deprived of the advantages which it was intended to confer upon them?

*MR. RITCHIE: I am aware that the hon. Member is correct in his statement as to the boroughs which will be placed in the position which he deprecates; but how far the labourers will be deprived of the benefits which it is proposed to confer by the measure I am unable to say.

MEMORANDUM ON THE POLICE BILL.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): Will the Home Secretary explain the meaning of the word "confidential" which appears on his Police Bill Memorandum? How far may the House make use of the information contained in it? I see it can be purchased for the sum of 1d.

THE REPORTED CESSION OF DOMINICA.

MR. A. PEASE (York): I beg to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether there is any foundation for the statement which has appeared in the French newspapers, and been copied into the English papers, that the British Government are disposed to cede the island of Dominica to France in consideration of her renunciation of all rights over the Newfoundland fisheries?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: This is the first I have heard of the report. There is no foundation for the statement.

MOTIONS.

POLICE (SCOTLAND) (PROVIDENT FUND) BILL.

FIRST READING.

(4.40.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): In asking the leave of the House to introduce a Bill to establish an Insurance and Provident Fund for the police of Scotland I hope I may be allowed in a few words to explain the purport of the measure. The reason for its introduction is to be found in a speech made by the Home Secretary on Monday night. The right hon. Gentleman informed the House that, in his opinion, the sum that might ultimately fall on the rates in Scotland under the Government Bill might reach £120,000 a year. Making all deductions, that would involve an ultimate liability within 25 years of £70,000 upon the ratepayers of Scotland. When we consider the fact that the total amount now paid for police by the people of Scotland is only £145,000, it becomes obvious that an additional sum of £70,000 would be a burden so great that it is impossible to suppose the ratepayers would bear it. I have considered whether the Government Bill could be so amended as to protect the ratepayers of Scotland, and I have found considerable difficulty in doing so in the absence of some special Instruction to the Select Committee. In these circumstances, the only course open to me is to introduce such a Bill, and ask the Government to refer it to the same Committee as that to which their own measure will be referred. I am anxious to assist the Government in getting the Superannuation Bill passed during the present Session, because I conceive if superannuation is not provided at this juncture it may possibly be a long time before it is provided to the police of Scotland. Briefly, my proposition is that a Provident Fund shall be established, to be managed by a Board of five, the Chairman to be paid and appointed by the Government, and the four others elected by the police. To that Board I would hand over the grant of £40,000 and other sources of revenue provided by the Government Bills. I may point out that the Government are giving to this Superannuation Fund a sum which, if capitalised, would amount to £1,800,000. In Superannuation or Insurance Funds provided jointly by employers and workmen the employer acts liberally if he contributes one-half, but in this case the Government are bestowing six times the amount contributed by the police. I propose that the Board should pay pensions to men at a certain age after a number of years service, to be fixed by the Board, to persons wholly incapacitated from any cause whatever, and to the children of policemen who died from any cause whatever.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is rather exceeding the brief explanatory statement permissible under the Standing Order.

MR. HUNTER: I was about to conclude. I propose that pensions should not be forfeitable under any circumstances, and that a policeman leaving the Force, whether dismissed or discharged, shall be entitled to get back his contributions with compound interest.

Bill to establish an Insurance and Provident Fund for the Police of Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Hunter, Mr. Asquith, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Eslemont, Mr. McEwan, Mr. Philipps, Mr. Robert Reid, Mr. Angus Sutherland, and Mr. John Wilson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 360.]

DIVORCE BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Hunter, Bill to amend the Law of Divorce in England, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Hunter, Mr. Asquith, Mr. Cobb, Mr. Fenwick, and Mr. Herbert Gardner.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 361.]

SELECT COMMITTEE ON BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (ABRIDGED PROCEDURE ON PARTLY CONSIDERED BILLS).

Ordered, That the Committee do consist of 21 Members.

Mr. Arthur Balfour, Sir Algernon Borthwick, Sir Edward Clarke, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Dillon, Mr. Dillwyn, Mr. Penrose Fitzgerald, Mr. Goschen, Mr. Gladstone, Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Hunter, Lord Hartington, Mr. Jennings, Mr. Labouchere, Colonel Malcolm, Mr. John Morley, Sir Stafford Northcote, nominated Members of the Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That 'Mr. T. W. Russell' be one other Member of the Committee."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

(4.52.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): If the House will examine the names it will see that the Committee as nominated comprises 12 supporters and nine opponents of the Government. These numbers, I believe, are based upon the proportional representation of Parties in the House in the ratio of one representative on the Committee for every 32 Members of the House. But even that does not work out quite right, because these proportions would give the Government $11\frac{1}{2}$ and the Opposition $9\frac{1}{2}$. I do not wish so much to raise any question about these figures as to object to the present system of nominating Select Committees. Up to 1880 the House was divided into two great Parties—the supporters and opponents of the Government; a Select Committee consisted of an odd number; and the Government had the odd man. In 1880, when the Liberals were in office, the Irish Members were about equally divided between opponents and supporters of the Government; and it was therefore agreed that the Irish of each side should have one Member on a Committee, so that the principle was still retained of allowing the Government one more Member than the Opposition. When the present Parliament was elected, an alteration had to be made, because it was found that certain gentlemen sitting on the Opposition side, and calling themselves Liberal Unionists, or some such absurd name, were to all intents and purposes supporters of the Government. It was not known at first what precisely these gentlemen were; we thought they had a merely temporary fad, and that in all probability they would very soon find salvation. We did not know that, except on one particular matter, they were disposed to support the Conservative Government; but the illusion is now dispelled, and at the present time they are really as strong supporters of Her Majesty's Government as the Conservatives.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): Hear, hear!

MR. LABOUCHERE: The hon. Member for the Bordesley Division admits the soft imputation. On account of this attitude of the Liberal Unionists it was decided to have a numerical representation of Parties on Select Committees; and the result is that the Government get a very considerable majority. It is a very different sort of a majority from that given to the Government by its having the odd man, which gives the Government a majority in case of a Committee being equally divided. In such a case the Report of the Committee would not be deemed to be so important, nor would it have such influence with the House if it were carried only by the casting vote of the Chairman. It may be said that in a Select Committee on procedure no Party question could arise; but I can conceive it possible that a Party question might arise in this Committee. Liberals may agree to the general principle that Bills should be carried over to another Session; but then would arise the question whether the principle should be applied to Bills of this Session or not. I can conceive the Liberals saying, "No; we think the matter ought to be discussed still further; we will not proceed in a hasty and impulsive fashion; we may lay down a principle, but may object to acting upon it before the coming Session." On the other hand, the Conservatives might say, "The Government have got into a terrible mess; they have had to give up one proposal, and they will have to give up their Irish Land Bill unless they can carry it forward to next Session." This is an illustration only of the way in which Party feeling might be introduced unless the House returns to the whole system of constituting a Select Committee. These Committees I am perfectly certain will not command the confidence of the country or of the House. I protest against a Committee of this kind being appointed with 12 supporters of the Government and only nine of the Government's opponents. Though I do not wish to make a personal question of it between the hon. Member for South Tyrone and the hon. Member for East Donegal, I propose to move to substitute the name of Mr. Arthur O'Connor for that of Mr. T. W. Russell, because I think the Liberal Unionists are over-represented on the Committee. If they are to be treated as Members of the Government Party the Government ought only to have 11 Members on the Committee, leaving 10 for the Opposition; and I think if this principle were adopted the decision of the Committee would be more likely to commend itself to the House.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the name of "Mr. T. W. Russell," in order to insert the name of "Mr. Arthur O'Connor,"—(Mr. Labouchere),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the name of 'Mr. T. W. Russell' stand part of the Question."

*(5.5.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I understand the Motion of the hon. Gentleman to be that the practice of Parliament for the last 10 years shall be departed from now, in order that the House may return to a practice which was condemned by the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. I prefer not to rest on my own authority in matters of this kind; and I will quote a high authority, and one which has guided the House for a good many years. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian made the following statement in July last :—

"It is undoubtedly the fact that some time ago the practice prevailed according to which it was usual, and I believe invariable, at least in Committees of smaller size, that a majority of one should be conceded to the majority of the day. I must say that I never admired the plan. I always thought the Rule a bad Rule, and I was always glad to avail myself of an opportunity of modifying it and altering it according to the practice which prevailed for a good many years before that Rule, and which has prevailed during the existence of the present Parliament. That is to say, that any Committee of the House should be made—especially when there is a matter of very great public interest, importance, and delicacy—as carefully and as nearly as may be the accurate representation of the sentiments of this House."

This is a question of great public interest, importance, and delicacy, and I think I should have the complete support of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian on this Motion, as the result of it would be to make the Committee an accurate representation of the views of the House. I am sure the Government and the House are very glad to hear the hon. Member for Northampton say that he will approach his duties in the Committee without any Party feeling; but bearing in mind the infirmity of human nature, and especially of Members of Parliament, it is very difficult indeed to find any question which does not become a Party question when hon. Members of this House come together. I think I am accurate when I represent the hon. Gentleman as saying that, while the Liberal Party may possibly assent to the principle, they may think it necessary to protest against its application at a particular time.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I only said it was possible.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is for the Committee, and especially for the unprejudiced Members of the hon. Gentleman's own Party, when they find themselves in that Committee, to speak for themselves in such a matter; but it is for the House to consider whether a principle agreed to by a Committee shall or shall not be applied to a particular Bill at a particular time.

MR. LABOUCHERE: The right hon. Gentleman is rather unfair in putting words into my mouth. I suggested that the Conservative majority might act on Party lines.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I should be sorry to put any suggestion into the mouth of the hon. Member. I am not desirous of entering on Party questions. I believe that the Committee will approach the consideration of the question which is referred to them with a full sense of its importance, and with no prepossessions. The question which the hon. Member has raised is whether we shall revert to the former practice prevailing before 1880, or whether we shall adhere to a practice which has existed now under three successive Governments and in three successive Parliaments, and which is supported by the very high authority of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. I believe that the course which the right hon. Gentleman has so consistently supported is the wisest and the fairest course for Parliament to adopt, and that a fair representation for all Parties in this House is the best method by which we can arrive at a successful result of the delegation of important duties to a Select Committee.

(5.12.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I regret that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian is not here. What I have to say is, of course, that I am in entire accordance with what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has said on a former occasion. With reference to the rule of the Government only having a majority of one, I agree with what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman opposite as to what was said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian last year. My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton must remember that it is important—and never more so than at the present time—to have regard not only to the rights of minorities, but also to the future interests of majorities. It is extremely inconvenient, as we have experienced in former times, for a Government to have only a majority of one in a Select Committee on an important question, especially if the Government have a great majority in the House and in the country. I do not object to the Government having in Select Committees a majority proportionate to their majority in the House, and this principle has been very much recognised in Grand Committees. No doubt great difficulties have been introduced by the novelty of having sectional Parties in the House. That, in my opinion, is a great Parliamentary misfortune. It was an unfortunate creation of the last General Election, and I hope that the next Election will sweep those sections away. Of course, it is extremely awkward to deal with the constitution of Committees when a certain body of Members are calling themselves by one name and acting under another. It is an embarrassing condition of things unknown in the history of former Parliaments, and we must make temporary arrangements to meet what we may hope to be a temporary evil. This is not a Party question; I do not see why Party considerations should arise in it; and I am confident that it will not be settled by a Party majority either in the Committee or in the House. It will be utterly impossible to deal with so grave a question as is involved in this proposed Constitutional change unless by general consent, both in the House and the Committee. Therefore, I do not, in reference to this particular Committee, concern myself very much about counting heads or reckoning upon close majorities. Though the House has admitted the question of proportionate numbers upon Committees in accordance with the state of Parties in the House, I would point out that the considerable changes that have taken place since the arrangement as to proportions was made have left Members on this side of the House not altogether satisfied, and they will not acquiesce in those proportions in the future. They feel that they are entitled to a larger share of representation on the Committees than they were at the beginning of this Parliament. I am not surprised that some dissatisfaction has arisen on account of the way in which those who were termed Liberal Unionists have been put forward in the matter. I think it was very unwise that opportunity should have been taken at this particular moment and on this particular question to give to that fraction a numerical force on the Committee to which they are not entitled, and I can well understand that Irish Members below the Gangway will not be satisfied with that course. I think, too, the House will notice with surprise that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Thanet Division has not been nominated for the Committee, seeing that he has expressed independent opinions on the matter. I feel that I cannot altogether agree with the hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Northampton that we should revert to the old system. I do not wish, however, to disturb the arrangement that has been made between both sides of the House, and therefore I feel bound to support it. I do hope that nothing that takes place now or hereafter will give a Party aspect to a Committee of so important a character.

(5.21.) MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): The First Lord of the Treasury, quoting the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, has said that in his opinion the Committee of this House should be representative of all sections of opinion in the House. We think that this Committee is not representative of one section, and I hold that the Irish Party have grave reason to complain that they are not fairly represented on the Committee. I have no desire to quarrel with the principle that the Government should have a majority on the Committee proportionate to their majority in the House; but in this case the Government must admit that they and the Liberal Unionists are one Party, or they would have no ground for the position which has been taken up by the Leader of the House in regard to this Committee. On the other hand, the Liberal Unionists must accept the position that they are not an independent Party, but a portion of the Tory Party. What claim, again, have the Liberal Unionists to three Members on the Committee, exclusive of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, although a Member of the Government, claims to be a Liberal Unionist? The Irish Members number 86, and the Liberal Unionists only 68, yet the former have only two Members on the Committee, while the latter have three. That is most unfair, according to the principle of proportionate representation laid down by the First Lord of the Treasury. When we look into the question narrowly there seems to be a particular reason for this. The object of the proposal appears to be to appoint a Committee, not so much to examine into the procedure of the House in order to ascertain how business may be facilitated, as to see how the passing of the Irish Land Bill may be facilitated. For it will be seen, on close inspection, that all those nominated to represent the Government and the Liberal Unionists on the Committee are known to be in favour of the Irish Land Purchase Bill, and of holding it over to another Session. Whose names appear in the list? Mr. Arthur Balfour, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Penrose Fitzgerald, Mr. Goschen, Lord Hartington, and Mr. T. W. Russell. All these are known as active supporters of the Land Bill, and it is a remarkable fact that no hon. Members who object to the proposal, whether Conservatives or Liberal Unionists, or who belong to the independent section of the Tory Party, are included. The Leader of the House has spoken of the freedom of action that should be allowed to the Committee; but, in my opinion, a deliberate attempt is being made by the Government, by nominating Members whose opinions are well known to be in a particular direction, to secure a Report that will be in favour of the Irish Land Purchase Bill, and of hanging it up until another Session. That, I contend, is another reason why the Irish Party should insist on the principle laid down by the Government of a fair numerical representation on the Committee, and I submit we are entitled to use every exertion to secure that this Committee is made representative of all sections of the House. For these reasons I most strongly and confidently support the Motion of my hon. Friend.

Mr. T. W. Russell nominated one other Member of the Committee.

Mr. Sexton, Mr. John Talbot, and Mr. Whitbread nominated other Members of the Committee.

Ordered, That Seven be the quorum.

Ordered, That the Reports of the Select Committees of the House on Public Business of the Sessions 1861, 1869, and 1878, and the Return "Parliamentary Proceedings," of the present Session, be referred to the Select Committee.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

POLICE BILL.—(No. 338.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(5.46.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): In moving that this Bill be read a second time I shall not think it necessary to detain the House with any long statement of the circumstances which have led to its introduction. I believe the House is aware that a Committee reported to the House in 1877 that dissatisfaction existed among the police, especially in the provincial forces, and mainly on the ground of the uncertainty as to pensions. Policemen had to wait until they were invalided or were 60 years of age before they could receive any pension. The Committee condemned the precarious and discretionary pensions, and recommended pensions as of right, after 15 years' service on a medical certificate of permanent incapacity, and after 25 years' service without medical certificate. They reported in favour of the Metropolitan Police scale as that on which pensions should be calculated. This Report produced a series of Bills. Mr. Hibbert introduced Bills in 1882, 1883, and 1884, and the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton, (Mr. H. H. Fowler) introduced one in 1885. These Bills were not proceeded with. On one occasion only—in 1884—did any of them get as far as Second Reading. I think it is no secret that the reason those Bills were not proceeded with was the opposition of hon. Members who represented the views of the ratepayers, and who thought that the burdens of local taxation were sufficiently heavy already, and that Imperial resources should be used to assist the local rates. These Bills were similar in their general outline. They all gave the constabulary, both in the Metropolis and in the Provinces, a right to a pension, instead of leaving it a mere matter of discretion, and they all established a Superannuation Fund, in which the ultimate burden of pensions was thrown on the rates. It was, of course, necessary that some assured source should be provided from which to obtain pensions which were no longer to be a matter of discretion, but of right.

A Bill was passed in 1883 for the Dublin Police and the Royal Irish Constabulary, framed on the same lines, and last year the City of London passed a Private Bill which established a system of superannuation for the police in that City. No one can deny that these facts constitute a strong Parliamentary case for legislation. The present Government were prepared to deal with the subject in 1887, but the Local Government Bill was then in an advanced state of preparation, and that rendered it desirable to give the new authorities time to consider the subject. Moreover, at that time a Royal Commission was inquiring into the subject of pensions generally, and the question of the superannuation of the police was not unnaturally postponed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has this year found means for contributing out of Imperial taxation towards the relief of the burden of superannuation, which would otherwise have fallen on the rates, and I trust there is now no longer any reason for delay. Delay is indefensible on many grounds. It will only increase the demands on the public purse, and may throw doubts on the sincerity of this House to deal promptly and effectually with what is admitted to be a grievance. Accordingly, we ask the House to give a Second Reading to this Bill. The present Bill is based on that which was brought in by the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. Fowler) when the former was Home Secretary. I mean the Bill of 1885. I know that on that occasion most careful consultations took place with the Metropolitan and the Provincial Police and the Treasury, and the Bill was the result of that careful consultation on the part of all those authorities. I therefore think it only fair to say that whatever credit may be due to the Bill I am presenting to-day, I desire to attribute it to the right hon. Member for Derby and the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton. On their Bill I have made some corrections in detail, which I think the right hon. Gentlemen themselves will admit to be necessary. The objects of the Bill are twofold. We desire to give not only fair, but liberal treatment to the constabulary throughout the country. They are not only a most deserving body of men, but we believe it is in the interests of the localities themselves that some fair and sound scheme of superannuation should be established. Our second object is to give full consideration to what is fair also to the ratepayers, who, after all, are a body of men many of whom are struggling with the necessities and difficulties of their circumstances, and whose burdens ought to be considered above all by the House of Commons. The main principle of this measure, like those of our predecessors, is to give to every constable throughout the country a pension, no longer as a matter of favour, but as a matter of legal right, with an appeal to a Court of Law if his pension is withheld from him after he has fulfilled the conditions necessary to entitle him to it. The ordinary pension is earned by 15 years' service and proof of physical disability for further service by medical certificate, or after 25 years' service without certificate. We have adhered to the period recommended by the Committee of 1877, and all the information leads us to believe that at any rate in the Metropolitan Force the utility of a constable is so far reduced that it is not desirable, either for his own sake or that of his employers, that he should continue in the service after 25 years on full salary. We have not imposed any limit of age, but have left that to the Local Authorities to decide. I do not propose to censure any Police Authorities, but it is obvious that the numbers of pensioners throughout the country is not up to the mark. This is no new discovery, for in the Report of the Committee of 1877 hon. Members will find it calculated that in the Metropolis out of every 100 men engaged there are 14 pensioners, in the counties 12, and in the boroughs eight. Returns made up to this year concerning superannuation to the police show that the number of pensions in the County and Borough Forces is still proportionately much below the number in the Metropolitan Force. Here, again, I do not wish to trouble the House with more figures than I need. Whereas in the County and Borough Forces of close on 12,000 men in each, as compared with the Metropolitan Force of 14,000, pensioners number 2,105 in counties, and 1,510 in boroughs, they are 4,074 in the Metropolis.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton): Are the City of London Police included in the boroughs?

*MR. MATTHEWS: I include the City Police in the boroughs, as they occupy a distinct position from the Metropolitan Force. They are a different force under different administration. The effect of this Bill will be that the men who are entitled to pensions in the provinces will get them, and, of course, there will be increased cost for the provincial Local Authorities. This, of course, is the dark side of the picture. These are the main outlines, and I need not dwell on subsidiary provisions. Under this Bill the medical inspection and certificate upon which these pensions are awarded are to be made realities. We mean that the men should be really invalidated before they receive relief at the hands of the ratepayers, and therefore provision is made for examination, if need be, by independent medical men. There is also a provision for a limited reduction of the pension allowance in cases where constables by their own vicious habits—drunkenness, for example—have contributed to the ailments unfitting them for service. These are provisions difficult to apply, but useful to insert. There are clauses rendering a constable liable to serve again if his incapacity should cease, and providing that any deductions made for misconduct during a policeman's career in the force shall be announced to him at the time, and shall be made according to rule and not arbitrarily. There is a clause providing for special pensions at a higher rate for constables disabled by injuries received in the execution of their duty. The average annual number of such pensions in the Metropolitan Force, taking the years between 1878 and 1888 inclusive, was only 21. This class of pensioners is therefore not a large class, but it is a most meritorious one. The injuries received range over a large scale, some being purely accidental and some the result of courageous conduct on the part of the constables. They range, in fact, from the case of a constable injured in consequence of his slipping on a piece of orange peel, to the case of a man who engages in a conflict with an armed burglar. Then we also propose to grant pensions to widows and children on a more liberal scale, and to give gratuities to constables who have not served sufficiently long to earn pensions. I now come to a very important point. What will the cost of this system be? I believe that the House will not grudge the cost of any pension system which is just and fair to the constable, which is not excessive on the one side nor parsimonious on the other. But we must look carefully at the figures to ascertain what the cost will be. In the Metropolis the Pension List has grown in a manner which is not without ugly features. The payments for pensions and gratuities which in 1870 were £87,492 a year have grown until this year they amount to over £200,000. The progression has been at a rapid rate. In 1870 the force amounted to slightly over 9,000 men; in 1888-89 it amounted to 14,242. I need not point out that the pension charge is one that does not accrue in the first years of the force, and under the metropolitan system it begins to accrue at the end of 15 years' service and the periodical increases of the force of course go to swell the ultimate total. The present system has not been in operation long enough for the full effect to be predicted. The figures are a little remarkable, and will interest those whose attention is directed to this subject. The existing scale of pensions was established in 1862. In that year only 18 per cent. of the force reached 15 years' service; only 8 per cent. reached 20 years' service; and only 2 per cent. reached 25 years' service. The records of the five years from 1884 to 1888 show a remarkable change, for 43 per cent. attained 15 years' service; 34 per cent. attained 20 years' service; and 15 per cent. attained 25 years' service.

*MR. STOREY (Sunderland): Are these estimates?

*MR. MATTHEWS: No; they are actual results taken from the figures in the Receiver's Books.

*MR. ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): Can the right hon. Gentleman give the limit of age in 1862?

*MR. MATTHEWS: No, I cannot answer that question. So far as I am aware, there never was a limit of age, but the average age during both periods of entry into the Service was 22 or 23 years. For some years very young men were taken into the service. The result of the experience we have had is, as I find from Dr. Farr's Report, that while it was anticipated that 14 per cent. only of the men entering the force would be pensioned, in the last five years 28 per cent. have come to the Pension Fund. Every year more and more men are brought into the Pension List. The men who enter the force now are younger men and men of better character, and the relative attractiveness of the force has increased. It is clear that we have not yet reached the maximum cost of the pension system, which has been in force since 1862. We have already reached the amount of £200,000, and must look forward to some 20 or 30 years more, during which the charge will grow at a rate more or less rapid. The ultimate charge will depend not only upon the number of pensions, but also on the pay which the men have received before becoming pensioners. As you increase the pay so will you increase the charge for pensions. The pension charge is a serious item, and the scale of the pensions is therefore most material. You must bear in mind that you have to act with fairness to the ratepayers. After full deliberation, we have presented the existing metropolitan scale, and we have not gone beyond it. The scale in the Metropolis has undergone several changes. The law upon the subject is that the Police Authorities in the provinces, as well as in the Metropolis, are able now to give not more than one-half pay after 15 years' service, not more than two-thirds pay after 20 years' service, and only on the condition that a man is disabled or is 60 years of age. Up to 1862 the scale in the Metropolis was very like that which the constables are now asking for. It was a scale of thirtieths, beginning with 15-30ths after 15 years' service, and giving 20-30ths after 24 years of service. This scale was examined actuarially by the late Dr. Farr, and it was reported by him to be unduly extravagant and to involve great danger in the future. Upon that Report the scale was altered to fiftieths, at which it has remained ever since. It gave one-fiftieth for each year of service after 15 years, but still always upon the condition of a medical certificate of disability or the attainment of the age of 60.

Mr. Matthews

The maximum of two-thirds of the pay was the ultimate limit, attainable only after 33 years of service. This scale was adopted on the recommendation of Dr. Farr, and it was altered in 1873 by Mr. Lowe, who raised the scale and made it more advantageous to constables by giving two-fiftieths for each additional year of service between 20 and 25 years; consequently two-thirds of the pay was attainable by 28 instead of 33 years of service. This scale has been in force ever since. It must not be supposed that since that time the constable has not secured advantages. He has had an increase of pay, tending to a considerable increase of pension. The first-class constable who, in 1864, received only £57 4s. a year, receives now £78; the first-class sergeant who in 1864 received £66 6s., has since 1878 received £100 per annum. There has, therefore, been a large increase of pay; there has been a considerable increase of average pay from police constables upwards, and there has been a considerable increase in the average pensions. In 1873 the average of the pensions was £44, and in 1889 it was £46. I give the round figures, omitting the odd shillings. There have also been other advantages in the shape of more rapid promotion from the rank of constable to that of sergeant. Therefore, while this scale has been in force, the condition of the men, both as to pay and pension, has been materially improved. This metropolitan scale, with its consequences, going up to £200,000 a year, is binding upon us; it is a legacy which we are not at liberty to shake off; we must submit to the burden. The question is whether for the future you are going to adopt a more liberal and lavish scale than the scale which has led to these results, and whether you are going to put on the ratepayers a heavier obligation. After full consideration, we have not felt justified in recommending any higher scale, and there is strong authority in support of our conclusion. It was the scale adopted in every one of the Bills of the right hon. Gentlemen opposite. The metropolitan scale was the maximum adopted by the right hon. Member for Derby. It was adopted in the Irish Act of 1883, and in the Act of 1889 for the City of London, which is lavish in these matters—["No, no!"]—well, then, abundantly liberal. It gave three-fifths, and not two-thirds, of the pay after 25 years' service. Although the Bill of last year adopted the same principle that we have adopted—namely, that pension should be given without disablement—yet it says that shall not be earned until a constable is 50 years of age. We have no necessary limit of age. But I have not exhausted our authority. The Committee of 1877, after giving full examination and careful study to the question, recommended that the metropolitan scale was one they thought fair as well as liberal. The scale is one which tends to prolong active service over 20 years. There are some curious and amusing illustrations of the operation of the scale of 1862 in precipitating retirement on medical certificates at certain dates when it was accompanied by pensions of increased amount. It is of great moment that you should graduate your pensions so as to postpone the temptation to leave the force, whether upon medical certificate or not, until the period of life at which a constable's services become less valuable. The result of the scale is, of course, that pensions after 25 years of service will be three-fifths, and not two-thirds, of the pay. The Metropolitan Police ask two-thirds, and we are told that it does not amount to much each man.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): Do the men or the officers demand it?

*MR. MATTHEWS: I think it is demanded all round, and that without very much consideration. It is an easy formula—all members of the force two-thirds pension after 25 years' service. But although I agree that the amount in each case is not large I must remind the House that the ultimate cost of the difference may become a cardinal matter. I will not, however, attempt at this moment to say exactly how much it would be; but according to the best information I have received the ultimate cost of the difference between two-thirds and three-fifths may come to £45,000 a year, which means something between a farthing and a halfpenny rate on the present valuation of the Metropolis. Therefore, I say, do not suppose you are dealing with a trifling matter in considering the difference between the proportions of two-thirds and three-fifths. Then you must remember that if you take two-thirds instead of three-fifths you dislocate the scale. You must either go with a jump from 28-50ths to 33-50ths at the 25th year, which would be an undesirable thing, or you must graduate the scale in the anterior years at a higher figure up to the 33-50ths, the result of which will be to increase the cost of every pension between 20 and 25 years, so as to make a solid addition to the difference between two-thirds and three-fifths. You must also bear in mind that this concession of two-thirds instead of three-fifths, if given to the Metropolitan Police, cannot well be withheld from the Irish Constabulary, and that the Dublin Police and the Provincial Police throughout the country will ask for it, too; while the City of London Authorities, who are never behind in their liberality in these matters, will also have to raise their pensions in conformity to the scale fixed for the Metropolitan Police. These, I think, are considerations which the House should weigh as the Government has weighed them. Let the House look at the result in figures, and say whether what we propose is illiberal or unfair. The three-fifths we propose in the Bill is, for a first-class constable, £46 16s. a year; for a sergeant it varies, according to class, from £53 to £59 a year; and for an inspector it varies from £70 to £97 10s. a year. These would be the pensions at the scale of three-fifths after 25 years' service. I ask hon. Members who advocate the claims of the Metropolitan Police to consider whether these amounts are not fair and reasonable pensions to offer to the men. Remember that by this Bill a man will get a pension at 46 years of age, for his service begins at 21, and is complete at 46, and the House knows what is the class of life from which the best constables are drawn, namely, the best of the artisan and labouring class. A man will at 46 years of age receive a pension of £46 16s., while it is not necessary that he should be invalided and have a medical certificate that he is incapacitated from the further performance of his duties. Therefore, he will not be disabled from earning money elsewhere, and it is not mere conjecture when I say that a man will be able to earn something besides his pension. I have had the record of 1879 looked into to see what became of the pensioners. There were 159 men pensioned in that year under the old system, when every pensioner had to have a medical certificate setting forth that he was incapacitated from further duty, whereas now, each policeman will retire after 25 years without any such certificate being required. Of these 159, 76 were earning on an average £54 14s. a year in addition to their pensions, and 83 were earning nothing; but this fact shows that the pensioned man leaving the Police Force, even with a medical certificate of incapacity for the further performance of his duties, can find remunerative employment elsewhere, and no one, of course, can grudge him that. On the contrary, I am sure we are all extremely glad to think he can do so. The House will observe that these pensioned policemen are sought after for many purposes by employers, because, in the first place, they are men of good character, and because, in the next place, there is a guarantee afforded by the fact that the pension is forfeited, under this Bill as before, by any disgraceful conduct. Therefore, the employer has the strongest guarantee for the good conduct of the men. I want the House to observe that the number of men who have served 25 years is not the insignificant matter suggested by the question put by my hon. Friend (Mr. H. Vincent) in the earlier part of the evening, and cannot be regarded by the Government as a matter of indifference. If my hon. Friend will take the trouble to consult the police records he will find that of late years the number of men who have resigned after 25 years' service, or more, is a steadily progressive figure. In 1880 only 34 constables out of a total of 131 pensioners had served 25 years or more; but in 1888, 62 out of 163 pensioners had served more than 25 years, a ratio very nearly double that of 1880. Generally, I may state that in the year 1888 the retirements on pension in all ranks, with a service of 25 years or more, were no less than 38½ per cent. of the whole number of pensioners. That is an enormous progression in length of service, for in the earlier years of the Service nothing like that will be found. Therefore, I say that every year in which this increased length of service is found it is obvious that this change will become of more financial consequence. But whatever is fair and reasonable ought to be done without the question of cost being considered, and so I prefer to present to the House the view that this amount of pension, namely, £46 16s. to each constable, from £53 to £59 for the sergeants, and from £70 to £97 for inspectors, is a fair amount, being given, as it will be, without a medical certificate, although the men may be a good deal battered and worn by length of service. I fear I may have detained the House too long on this matter; but it is one of considerable interest. I was anxious to put the case fully before the House. Of course, the House is aware that the men contribute to the Pension Fund by deductions from pay. In the Metropolitan Police the deductions are, for ordinary constables, practically 2 per cent., and for superior officers 2½ per cent. Those deductions, if capitalised and invested, would not pay 1-10th part of the proposed pensions, and, therefore, it cannot be said that this scale is illiberal or unfair. Let me mention one other feature of the Bill which to provincial Members may be a matter of interest. We have laid down for ordinary pensions—that is, for pensions other than for injury—a minimum as well as a maximum. The idea is that each Local Authority shall draw its own line within those limits according to its own idea of what is fair under local circumstances. There, again, the maximum remains the Metropolitan scale, and the minimum is, of course, a matter entirely for consideration by hon. Gentlemen representing provincial constituencies. I do not know whether I have drawn it too high or too low; but I have endeavoured not to be to illiberal to the police. The principle is to give to each Local Authority a certain amount of latitude. Again, we have empowered any Police Authority that thinks fit to impose a limit of age as a condition of earning the 25 years' service pension. The Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton fixed positively the limit of age at 55 years; but I have come to the conclusion that that is a limit which ought not to be fixed in the Metropolis. Few of the men in the Metropolitan Force reach that age while in the Service, and to fix such a limit would be to take back with one hand the boon we give with the other. In the City, I believe; the limit of 50 years of age has been imposed before the service pension can be obtained. We enable each authority to impose the limit for itself. I will now come to the interesting question of the Superannuation Fund. Here, again, the Government have followed the precedent of the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler.) I think we have provided for the Superannuation Fund the same sources of income, with the addition, of course, of the Government contribution. The right hon. Gentleman asked the other evening what were the amounts that these various sources would furnish. I have sent round to all the Local Authorities begging them to give me the figures necessary to answer the question with precision. I have not yet received the answer, but I hope confidently to lay the information before the House before the Bill is in Committee. The right hon. Gentleman is probably aware of the Return which Mr. Hibbert procured. It was a Return of 10 selected counties and 10 selected boroughs, setting out the amount of the different sources of income in them. This, however, must be an imperfect guide, so far as the whole country is concerned, because circumstances have changed a great deal since the figures were collected. Still, they will serve to some extent. With regard to the mode of distributing the Government contribution, every kind of principle of distribution has been suggested to us—population, rateable value, numbers of the Force, and so on; but I think that I shall be able to show the House that the proper principle to adopt in regard to the relief of local charges is to grant that relief in proportion to the actual charges, so that according as each locality has more or less to pay for pensions so ought the Government aid to be given. If all the Police Forces of the country were of equal standing that would probably be the right method: but the House will see that in the case of a new Force recently established the locality would get nothing for 15 years, because during that time there would be no pensioners. Accordingly the principle we have adopted in this Bill is that from the beginning we give to each Police Authority an amount equal to the rateable deductions from the police pay that have been made in the locality in each particular year, and the rateable deductions may be as high as $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and I daresay, in many cases, will be. The Government will, therefore, add another $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., making 5 per cent., which will, in fact, double the contribution of the Police Force to the Superannuation Fund. In the counties the rateable deductions amount to £20,000, and in the boroughs to £22,000, so that £42,000 odd would be the rateable deduction according to the Return I have produced in counties and boroughs, excluding the Metropolis. That will leave a balance of £107,000 out of the Government grant of £150,000 to be distributed among the localities according to the principle I have mentioned, that is, in the ratio of the actual pension charges.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: The entire deduction from the pay of the police during last year was £44,000, of which £21,000 was the deduction in the Metropolis.

*MR. MATTHEWS: The right hon. Gentleman is quite right as to the Metropolis. The deductions from pay in the Metropolis were £21,000, in the counties £20,198, and in the provincial boroughs £22,439. Well, such is the principle the Government have adopted. We make what I may call a "nest egg" in the shape of a fund that must be invested and placed to the Superannuation Account. Of course, it is impossible to prevent any system from being abused; but I think that, on the whole, our plan will be found to give the fairest share to all parties. There is ample evidence that the Government contribution is needed, for there is a large amount of deficiency to be made up in the Superannuation Funds. In the Metropolis the deficiency is close upon £140,000; in the counties, £28,500; and in the boroughs, £14,000. They want this now, and still more will be needed when a more certain and uniform system shall have come into operation. If it should turn out that there is any real excess in any one of the Superannuation Funds there is a clause in the Bill which enables the Local Authority, with the consent of the Secretary of State, to devote it to some other purpose. I hope I have not wearied the House, but having detained it so long I will not detain it any longer. I believe most hon. Members are agreed as to the principle of superannuation to the police who have rendered valuable service to the public; and, in conclusion, I will express the hope that the passing of the Bill will not be delayed—a hope in which I am strengthened by the fact that in this House there is a general wish that superannuation should become certain and assured, and not be merely a matter of precarious chance or favour. That superannuation ought to be fair and liberal; and I believe the House will agree that after what has taken place on this subject, after the different attempts that have been made to legislate upon it, we cannot too strongly deprecate further delay. I therefore ask the House to do quickly what is reasonable and just, and having said this I leave the Bill in its hands.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Henry Matthews.)

(6.50.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): In the concluding remarks of the right hon. Gentleman I desire to express my entire concurrence. I think that this Bill ought to be passed, and I also think it ought to be passed as quickly as possible. I certainly may be allowed to entertain this opinion, because, as the Memorandum which has been laid before the House by the right hon. Gentleman, states, there were produced during the five years I was at the Home Office, no less than four Superannuation Bills—a sufficient earnest of the desire which then existed to bring about a settlement of this question. I do not speak of those Bills as my own. Whatever merit may have attached to them belongs to two gentlemen far more capable of dealing with the subject than myself—I allude to my friend Mr. Hibbert, who was, at that time, Under Secretary, than whom no man possessed greater knowledge of the matter, nor more ability to deal with it, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, who introduced the second Bill. But, Sir, I must ask the House to consider this circumstance, because it is one of great importance, namely, that all those Bills were founded on the investigations of the Select Committee of 1877, and, as this Memorial states, they were framed after communication with the Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police, and the Local Authorities of the boroughs and counties. Can the Government say of this Bill, as was said of all the other Bills, that it has been framed after communication with the Commissioner of Police, and the Local Authorities of the counties and boroughs? As is stated in this Report or Memorandum, those Bills failed. Why did they fail? It was not because they were unjust in their proposals or extravagant; not because they lacked the support of the Police Authorities; not because they did not have the assent of the Local Authorities, but because they were opposed in this House by the advocates of the relief of local taxation. I am specially desirous, in what I am about to say, to make no observation that may arouse Party or sectional feeling in this House. I am anxious to avoid that, and will employ no words that will in any way tend to produce such a result. I, therefore, merely say that the failure of those Bills was due to the opposition of the Party who favoured the relief of local taxation. The Government state in this Memorandum the reason why no Bills were introduced in the years 1882, 1883, 1884, and 1885, for the superannuation of the police, and why five years have elapsed without any attempt to settle this question. They say they have had a Superannuation Bill in preparation, but that its introduction has been delayed by the passing of the Local Government Act of 1888, which created a new financial authority in lieu of the old Police Authority for the counties. I can understand that reason and the argument founded upon it. They say the former Bills were produced after consultation with the Police and Local Authorities; that new Police and Local Authorities were instituted in 1888; and, therefore, it was not desirable that the whole of this question should be considered by the new Local Authorities. They say this for a very good reason, the validity of which I do not dispute; but I have to ask the Government this question, which I consider is a very important one, in reference to this Bill. The Memorandum states that it has been thought desirable that the new authorities should have time to consider the subject, and to become familiar with the financial conditions of their localities before an approved superannuation scheme was presented. That is the reason why this Bill has been delayed during the last two years. I ask the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House to this question, because I regard it as one of great importance. You have delayed the Bill for two years, with the object of allowing the Local Authorities time to consider the question. What means have you taken to ascertain the opinion of the Local Authorities with reference to the financial condition of their localities and the whole bearing of this subject? For five years you hung up this question, because you said you were going to establish County Councils. You have established County Councils, and two years have elapsed since their establishment. I ask the Government what are the results of the inquiry which, of course, they have instituted among the County Councils? Have you ascertained their opinions that you may lay before Parliament the justification or ground of this Bill? My right hon. Friends (Sir G. Trevelyan and Mr. H. H. Fowler) took the course of laying their schemes of superannuation before the Local Authorities in order to obtain their support. They laid them before the Commissioner of Police, and they secured his assent and support. And when they came to this House they were in a position to say that these Bills had been before the Commissioner of Police, who had approved them. The securing of the support of the Local Authorities, in my opinion, is the necessary preliminary and only foundation upon which you can have a satisfactory settlement. It is of no use having actuarial arguments, it is of no use demonstrating logically that the scheme is a good one. You want a practical scheme; you must have a scheme which has the assent of the people by whom it is to be worked. That is the basis upon which we proceeded, and that is the basis upon which I assume you have proceeded. How long has your Bill been under the consideration of the Local Authorities? That is a question you ought to answer to the House of Commons, which is asked to pass a Bill which is to be worked by the Local Authorities, and which will lay a heavy charge upon the localities. The Government put that in the fore-front of their Memorandum, as the reason why they delayed the Bill; and the one thing I missed in the long and able statement of the Secretary of State was the result of the consideration by the Local Authorities, which you have said, and properly said, ought to be the foundation of the Bill. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said certain figures had been sent down to the Local Authorities, and he hoped before the Bill passed through Committee that he would get replies. Surely, in two years the Local Authorities would have gone through all this matter, and the right hon. Gentleman would have obtained their approbation and support. You never thought of laying before the House a Bill of this kind without obtaining that assurance. We know perfectly well how difficult it is for the House of Commons to deal with matters of this kind unless it has the approbation and support of those who are acquainted with the details and working of the measure. The first question, therefore, which I have to ask the Government is whether the consultation they have had with the Local Authorities corresponds with that which we had five years ago? Having established the County Councils I take for granted your first proceeding was to enter upon this consultation, and let us know what has been the result of the consideration of the scheme by the Local Authorities. In the words of the Memorandum—

"It was thought desirable that these new authorities should have time to consider the subject, and to become familiar with the financial conditions of the localities before the Superannuation Scheme could be presented."

That was a statesmanlike view of the subject, the one condition on which the matter could be properly dealt with. And now we want to know the results of that consultation. Now, Sir, we are in the dark on that subject. We have no assurance that the course previously promised has been performed in this instance. With reference to the metropolitan police, not a word shall escape me to create any difficulties, or to exasperate any difficulties that now exist. This at least we know, that you are not in a position to state to the House of Commons that you have committed and obtained the assent or support on this question of the police, or of the Commissioner of Police. I put it no higher than that. With reference to the late Commissioner of Police, we know you did not agree. With reference to the present Commissioner of Police, of course, there has not been time nor material on which he or anybody else could form a judgment that could be relied on. It is of no use to say that this is a good scheme, that it is absolutely defensible, and that it is a scheme the abstract principle of which you can recommend. You must have a scheme which the parties interested in the administration of it are willing to accept. What assurance are the Government prepared to give us upon that point? We were able in 1882-3-4-5 to say that the Bills presented were accepted by the parties whom they affected. Are you able to say that this is a Bill which is accepted, and which will settle the question? Because it is of no use this House of Commons accepting the abstract principles of a Bill which will not settle the question. You will be in a worse position than you were before. The Secretary of State quoted various authorities to reinforce this Bill, whom I am bound to say that I respect, and am prepared on general principles to follow. But then that does not settle the question at all. A Bill that might have settled the question in 1885 does not necessarily settle the question in 1890. You talk of the Committee of 1877. The information of that Committee was very valuable on one point, incidentally and parenthetically to which I may refer the Secretary of State. I was rather surprised to hear him speak of Dr. Farr's opinion as regards the figures of 1862, and say that Dr. Farr had founded his calculations upon the experience of what took place before there were any pensions. Why, it was quite plain that men of various ages would remain much longer in the Force that had a pension than would remain in the Force where there was no pension. A more foolish calculation I never heard of than that of a man calculating for a pensioned Force on the basis of the figures of a Force that had no pensions. You might as well calculate your fire policies by the experience of a town built of wood, and apply the calculation to the circumstances of a town built of stone. The things are not commensurate. Therefore, I cannot understand that part of the argument. But that is quite parenthetical. To put it on general and more important grounds: It is nothing to show us the evidence of 1877, or the Bills of 1882-3-4-5. What you have got to satisfy us about—and you are the only people to satisfy us—is whether your scheme will meet with acceptance. Of course, Sir, I am in favour of the Second Reading of this Bill, and will support it. I desire that the House will address itself to the consideration of this question at the earliest possible moment, and dispose of it as quickly as it can. As far as I am concerned, I will assist in that. Well, now I observe on the Paper a proposal by the Government to refer the Bill to a Committee. I urge them to re-consider that proposition. I do not find any fault with the proposal that has been made. I know it has been suggested in various parts of the House that my right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton spoke of a Select Committee, but he spoke of it, not as compared with the Grand Committee, but as compared with a General Committee of the Whole House. What advantage will you gain by sending this Bill to a Select Committee? I can see none at all. It will take evidence, as did the Committee in 1877. If it does, you will not legislate this year. What evidence has it to take? Is it going to call before it representatives of the Police Force, and representatives of the police in the provinces? I confess I do not think that would be an expedient course. Is it to call before it representatives of the Local Authorities in different parts of the country? You have not the time to do that. If I were a Member of that Committee, I should not know what to do. All that you can gain as regards general principles of action, apart from questions of detail, you have already. You have it in the evidence taken by the Committee in 1877. You have it in the considerations of the Bills of 1882-3-4-5. What we want now is some information as to the existing state of things, in order to see that the Bill is appropriate to that state of things. The Government alone have that information. The Committee would divide the responsibility with the Government as to the proposals that are to be made. I am not prepared to divide the responsibility. They alone know what Bill will satisfactorily settle this question in the provinces and elsewhere. The right hon. Gentleman has discussed this question of the Metropolitan Pension List with the late Commissioner of the Police. Well, they unfortunately differed. But the Secretary of State had the knowledge, if we had not, of the feelings of the Police; and he argued in a controversial spirit upon the Memorandum of Mr. Monro on this subject. He may have been right; the Secretary of State may have been right, as to what would be a satisfactory settlement of this question. But the Government is the only authority that can tell the House what plan will satisfy the Force. Of course, a Committee of this House might say, We will ascertain for ourselves; we will not take it from the Government. We will send for the representatives of the Police, and hear their case. I deprecate such a course. I think it is not safe for this House, either in Committee or elsewhere, to undertake to manage the police. They can only do it through the Government. Therefore, the Government must be absolutely, completely, and finally responsible for proposing and carrying through this House a measure which will reasonably and satisfactorily settle this question. I cannot assume—I do not assume necessarily—that the circumstances which were favourable in 1885 are equally favourable now. It may be so, or it may not. Your scheme actuarially may be just the same, but the circumstances by which you are surrounded may be exceedingly difficult. As regards the metropolitan police, I do not see that the House by Committee can enter into the question. I cannot form an opinion; I have no material on which to form one. Up to 1885 I knew all the facts, but since that year I have not had the information, and I feel absolutely unable to form an opinion as to what are the conditions of a satisfactory settlement. So much for the metropolitan police. And, with regard to the provincial police, it is exactly the same thing. In my opinion, you cannot have different terms for the metropolitan and provincial police. I have received a communication from the police in my own town of Derby, in which they naturally express the desire to have as good terms as anybody else. You will find that will be the feeling of Police Forces throughout the country. In considering this question we have to look at the circumstances of the labour market, to the demands of other classes, and to all the circumstances surrounding the subject; and I am bound to say that I am absolutely unable, in the absence of information, to form an opinion of what would be a proper settlement of the question. I am very willing to receive information and instruction from the Government as to the circumstances of the time with which we have to deal. I want to know what measures the Government have taken to learn the conditions and the wishes of the Police Forces in London and the provinces, and what consultations they have had with the Local Authorities throughout the country. These are the things which should govern us in dealing with the principles of this Bill. As to the Second Reading, and as to the question whether there ought to be superannuation, I think the Bill ought to be passed as rapidly as possible for the benefit of the metropolitan and provincial police. Of that I have no doubt whatever, and I heartily support the Second Reading.

(7.25.) MR. BURDETT - COUTTS (Westminster): I congratulate Her Majesty's Government on bringing forward this Bill.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Will the hon. Member allow me to correct an omission? In deprecating a Committee I spoke only of the present Bill, and not of the Scotch Bill, which stands on a different footing, because it introduces a new system in Scotland, and one that has not been inquired into before.

MR. BURDETT - COUTTS: I was about to say that I congratulate the Government on bringing forward this Bill, and upon their determination to pass it into law. It is a tardy recognition of the claims of an important and deserving body of men, claims which have been constantly set forth and as constantly deferred, at the cost of dissatisfaction among the police. The police have certainly not in any way been disloyal. If dissatisfied, they have not allowed the neglect of Parliament to interfere with the performance of their duty to the public. Something has been said with regard to a promise made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby some nine years ago. It was at a meeting in connection with the Police Orphanage. I happened to be present. I do not remember the exact words of the promise, but I recollect that they caused visible manifestations of satisfaction, and elicited ringing cheers. During the four or five years following Bills were brought forward, but none passed this House. I am sorry this question was not settled then, or, at any rate, before now, because I believe the long delay has led to grave and new demands upon the public purse. I think it is necessary that there should be a certain continuity in the treatment of the police, and that what has been justly and reasonably done by one Home Secretary should be continued by his successor. I venture to notice that so far as harmony and mutual good understanding are concerned, this continuity of relations between the Home Office and Scotland Yard has not been entirely preserved since the right hon. Gentleman took office, as is evidenced by the retirement of two Chief Commissioners, after holding their appointments for an unusually short space of time, and as is evidenced by the dissatisfaction and disaffection which, I think, any one at all conversant with the views of the police will allow now prevails in the country. But I recognise that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, in bringing forward this Bill, has taken up the thread of the unfulfilled promise of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and I submit that the present measure should be so framed as to really fulfil that promise, and place the police in an infinitely better position as regards pensions than they were in before it was made.

(7.31.) SIR W. HARCOURT: The hon. Member has spoken of the promise I made, and has said that it was unfulfilled. I would point out to the hon. Member that I regarded my promise as fulfilled by the introduction of the Bill.

Mr. Burdett-Coutts

(7.31.) MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: But the Bill was not passed, notwithstanding that the right hon. Gentleman's Party had a majority. It is true the right hon. Gentleman was not in the position of leader of the Party to which he belonged; but I must say I think if he had been ardently in favour of a settlement of the question, he would have been able to persuade the Party to pass the Bill.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): How about the Publicans' Compensation Bill?

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: I cordially join with the right hon. Gentleman opposite in deprecating the proposal to send the Bill to a Select Committee, as it would undoubtedly delay the Bill at least until next Session. Moreover, a Committee is not wanted, as there is already plenty of evidence on the subject before the House. We have the exhaustive Reports of the Committees of 1875 and 1877; we have had various discussions on the subject; we have the Returns on Police Superannuation, and the Report of the Committee on the City Police Bill in July last year, and if this is not enough—which it surely is—there was, I believe, a Departmental Committee last year, which took a mass of evidence on the subject, and broke up without a Report. I should like very much to see that evidence, and, later on, if I am in order, I will move for it. I believe it will throw a great deal of light on the nature and justice of the claims of the police. Surely the better course would be to leave the Bill to a Grand Committee, by means of which it could be got through and reported to the House in a very short space of time. The chief claim I have to put forward on behalf of the police is that which the Home Secretary spent a long time in contesting, namely, the claim to a pension of two-thirds of their pay after 25 years' service, without condition of age or medical certificate. In making this claim I cannot but regret that the Metropolitan Police have not been dealt with in a separate Bill, considering the indisputable differences that exist between them and the Provincial Police. Such a course might have cleared the Bill of the awkward and confusing feature of maximum and minimum limits, and have made the whole thing very much clearer and have been much simpler from all points of view. It is quite true that the Home Secretary has expressed his determination, and given us an assurance, that the age limit will not be applied in the case of the Metropolitan Police, and that the maximum scale will always be taken; but I say that the long delay in making that announcement has already led to agitation amongst the police; and the fact that there is nothing in the Bill to bind future Home Secretaries will lead to further dissatisfaction amongst the police, because it will leave them uncertain on these two very important points. One great point in favour of a two-thirds pension is that it represents an improvement on the previous scale. I have started with the assurance that whether it was promised in so many words or not, the police gathered from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman opposite an assurance that their position with regard to pensions would be improved. It is quite true that the Bill gives an absolute right to pensions to the police; but they had that right by custom before, and no sane man will argue that that would ever be taken from them. The Bill gives pensions for between 15 and 25 years' service on the scale of fiftieths, but that the police had before. This was the point, so far as pensions were concerned, on which Mr. Monro resigned. He has stated publicly that in their draft Bill the Government reduced the pensions for between 15 and 20 years' service to the scale of sixtieths of the pay, but this has been improved in the Bill now before us in favour of the police. I believe the draft Bill also contained this very thing I am asking for, namely, a pension of two-thirds of the pay after 25 years' service. But I suppose the right hon. Gentleman has not been able to obtain the consent of his colleagues to that. To my mind, it is the crux of the whole Bill; and if we can persuade the House or the Committee to grant that very slight additional boon it will be placing only a small burden on the ratepayer, and will be satisfying the desires of the Force. It is true that the medical certificate has been taken out of this Bill, after 25 years, but that is no very great gain, because the police know full well that in the opinion of the authorities this medical certificate is a pernicious system, that it encourages malingering and induces men to build up a "sick record." So there is very little gain for the police in this Bill unless we give them what they ardently desire, the two-thirds [pension after 25 years' service. Considering the small number of policemen who ever reach 25 years' service, it is surely a very small thing to ask for, and it will be the smallest possible burden upon the ratepayers, but it will be some gain for the police. I need not enlarge on the importance of the duties of the police and the admirable way in which they perform them. They have charge of the capital of a great Empire, a city covering 700 square miles and of 5,000,000 of population, and are responsible for the safety, security, and contentment of that great population. They, moreover, have to regulate the traffic which is a very difficult and very vexatious duty, through thousands of miles of streets, and this they do as admirably as the condition of the streets will allow. They have to deal with a vast mass of crime which requires not only constant attention and watchfulness, but also great courage and determination. The increased use of deadly weapons by a certain class of criminals of late years has brought out the courage of the police in brilliant colours, and in legislating for them [we must not forget the dangers to which all members of the Force are at some time or other liable. We must certainly remember these things in fixing the reward we offer. There is one point which has been mentioned this evening upon which I wish to lay particular stress, with regard to the amount of this pension after 25 years' service. It points clearly to the difference between the claims of the police and the claims of other classes of public servants with whom they may be compared. It is contained in the evidence given by Sir James Fraser last year on the City Police Bill. He said—

"The fact is, that after a man has served 25 years in the streets he is fit for very little work afterwards. It takes it out of him tremendously. I think that is the opinion of almost every head of the Police Force in the country. If you get 25 years work out of a man you get as much as you are ever likely to get of useful work."

He was further asked—

"Do you consider that the wear and tear of a constable in the crowded thoroughfares of London is greater than that of a constable in a rural district or in a small country town?"

He answered—

"I have no doubt of it; in fact, the climate of London is against a man, and the constant tramp, day and night."

If that is the case in the City, where there is hardly any crime or disorder, and few of those processions and meetings which have become chronic in the West of London, how much stronger is the case of the Metropolitan Police! A conclusive answer to the argument that the Metropolitan Police ought not to have two-thirds pension because the City Police had only two-fifths is to be found in a comparison of the pay of the two forces. The Metropolitan Police receive as first, second, or third-class constables respectively 2s. 1d., 1s. 6d., and 1s. 5d. per week less pay than the City Police. Surely, Sir, if we are not going to raise the pay of the Metropolitan Police this is a strong argument in making it up to them in some slight degree by way of pension. I do not say that I should be opposed to raising their pay—far from it. But we must take things as they are, and if they are worse paid than the City Police they deserve to be better pensioned. I submit then, Sir, that this claim for a two-thirds pension is a fair and just one, on account of the reasons stated. I cannot but think that if we owe the police much on account of the important duties they perform, and of the manner in which they perform them, and of the delay which has attended this question, we owe them something also on account of the retirement of their late Chief Commissioner. I will make clear what I mean. I know that every member of the force is possessed with the conviction that Mr. Monro was sacrificed for insistence upon demands on their behalf, which I think will, upon examination, be found to be just, and many of which are granted in this very Bill. Mr. Monro was a man whom they respected as a disciplinarian, whom they trusted as a representative, and whom, as a friend and commander, they held in most affectionate esteem. They regard him as one who has fought for them and fallen for them. Several of the points for which he held out, such as the appointment of Mr. Howard as Assistant Commissioner—his desire for which appointment led to his resignation—and the question of the clothing contract, have been conceded. I do not wish to lay undue stress on these points; but I do say that some of the chief grounds on which Mr. Monro resigned have been granted in this Bill now before the House, and that fact cannot fail to make some impression upon the minds of the police. I should like, whatever they may think about Mr. Monro's retirement, to be assured that this House is going to treat them in a liberal spirit. I should like also to be assured in the future that the relations between the Home Office and Scotland Yard may be carried on in a somewhat more considerate and conciliatory manner. I should like to be assured that the police will always look upon every Home Secretary as one to whom, when they have just grievances to be redressed, they can turn with confidence to redress them, and to whom, when they have a just claim to put forward, they can look to do his utmost to satisfy those claims. I would earnestly press on the House to allow the police this two-thirds pension. The addition to the cost will be very slight, but the matter is one of great importance. I think the police have made more of the point than it is worth; but, at any rate, it is a matter on which they feel very strongly. I would earnestly appeal to the House not to delay the Bill by submitting it to a Select Committee.

* (7.40.) SIR J. GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): I have only two or three words to say on matters which I think the hon. Member who has just sat down has not mentioned. I found, on calling on a number of the officers and men, that they felt as I feel, that the question of their pensions should depend on the question of their pay. I believe that they would not stand out for the two-thirds pension if their claim for increased pay was duly and thoroughly considered. I cannot help remarking that the constables of the Metropolitan Police must feel in a somewhat disgusted frame of mind when they notice that in every class of the Service the City policeman is paid on a higher scale than the scale on which they themselves are paid, and all the more so when the fact is remembered to which the hon. Gentleman has just referred, namely, that the Metropolitan Police have more arduous duties to perform, and often have to serve for longer hours than the City Police. If, as I think it can, a case can be made out for increasing the pay of the Metropolitan Police, I cannot help believing the men would be satisfied with the scale proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, for it would then be on all fours with the examples he quoted. So far as I can find out, that feeling is general throughout the country, and the matter is one which will have to be considered by the Select Committee, if the Bill is referred to a Committee. I find also that the men have some feeling as to the time at which the pension, after 25 years' service, should begin to run. The practice has hitherto been not to give a pension—unless a man is invalided or certified by the medical officer to be unfit for service—until the age of 60 is reached, no matter the age at which the man enlisted. Now, it is admitted on all hands that 60 years is an absurd age at which to fix the limit, and that, therefore, another plan should be adopted. The plan suggested is that 25 years' service should be the limit; but the Metropolitan Police say that the pension ought to date from the entry into the Service, and not from the age of 21. That point could easily be met by providing that no man should be recruited before the age of 21. That would be a provision that many would support; but even if the House adopted it, it could only be applied to future cases. It is admitted on all sides that a case has been made out for liberal superannuation treatment to the police, and that that treatment should, to a great extent, depend on the amount of pay given to the men. I believe the police and the ratepayers would rather see an increase made in the pay and the rate of pensions the right hon. Gentleman proposes adopted than that there should be no change in the pay and the higher rate of superannuation that the men are themselves demanding. I do not think the Members who know what the duties of the Metropolitan Police are can for a moment imagine that the work of the country policeman is as hard and arduous as the work of the London policeman, and it is for that reason that in London the highest scale of pension should be given. But I do not think we should leave this question of the comparative treatment of the Metropolitan and Provincial Police to the promise of the right hon. Gentleman. I trust that the right hon. Gentleman or the Under Secretary will undertake to insert a clause in the Bill to make the matter thoroughly clear.

(7.57.) SIR H. SELWIN-IBBETSON (Essex, Epping): I do not propose to go into the question of whether the late Chief Commissioner was justified in his attitude. On the contrary; but I should like to say a few words on the earnest desire I have that at last a solution of this question should be arrived at. I have taken some interest in the question, as the House knows, for many years. I myself, as late as 1887, had a Bill before the House for the superannuation of the police, but the Government asked me to withdraw it in view of the measure they themselves had promised. I mention this, as it shows that the question has been considered at a later date than has been suggested. I think the time has come now when the whole House must concur in the attempt to settle the question which affects so large a body of men who have so much to do with the happiness and history of this country. I believe we have now sufficient information as to the wants of the police and the opinions of the localities on this subject. At all events, I am sure we have quite as much of the opinions of the localities before us as we ever had. I cannot say I remember that such representations came very generally from the localities. I can say for my own locality that no such representations were solicited. I do not, however, attach much importance to that, because from the time of the Report of the Committee down to the present we have had opinions expressed by the localities as to the necessity of some measure of the kind. The question has been raised whether a difference should be made as between the Police Force of the Metropolis and the Police Force generally throughout the country. I venture to say I do not think there ought to be any difference as between superannuation in one district and another. Practically, the superannuation would be governed by the rate of pay in the different Forces; and the rate of pay in the Metropolis, being in excess of the pay in other districts, would produce a scale of pension which must be in excess of pensions elsewhere. It is very important that policemen should be able to demand a pension at a fixed period of service. If a fair pension were insured to a policeman at a time when he became practically unfit to perform the work for which he had been enlisted, you would do much to bring into the Force a better class of men, because the pension is a consideration in addition to his wages which he could not obtain in other services. I attach great importance to giving fixity of tenure, if I may so call it, in the matter of pensions to men of the different Forces throughout the country. When this Bill comes to be considered afterwards, I hope it may be amended in some particulars, which I think are of importance. I confess, myself, I believe the two-thirds scale of pension is one which the police have a fair right to demand. I believe that scale will not practically press unfairly on the rate-payers, because I believe they will get an equivalent in good men and good service for it, and I am sure its adoption will be a settlement of the question which will satisfy the different Police Forces throughout the country and will keep in those Forces the men whom we should be very anxious to retain in the Service. I would remind the House that a policeman is a very expensive article to form, and, therefore, you should do your best to keep him in the Force. A large sum of money is expended on the training of a policeman, and unless he is induced to remain in the Force that money is thrown away. These points, I think, should induce us not to be niggardly now that we are trying to settle a question which has been left unsettled far too long. There are other points which, I think, when the Bill reaches Committee may be fairly considered. I confess I do not like the attempt made in the Bill to allow localities to fix the scale. I should prefer that there should be a maximum and a minimum, between which the localities might elect to pension men themselves, and that would give an opportunity to the localities of discriminating between men who had faults which were not sufficiently serious to lead to their discharge, but which rendered them less efficient servants than some of their colleagues, and men, as it were, with a clean bill of health. I think, however, with that exception, that the scales of pay should be uniform throughout the country. The question of the form of the Committee to which the Bill shall be referred has been mooted. There are advantages in favour of its being sent to a Standing Committee, and I strongly deprecate its being sent to a Select Committee, as that would practically result in its being hung up until next Session. I hope that this attempt on the part of the Government, following on the numerous attempts that have been made to satisfy a legitimate want of the Forces throughout the country, will result in the House putting aside Party feeling on the subject and uniting to pass much-needed reforms. (8.8.)

*(8.40.) Mr. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I understand some of my hon. Friends, who sit on this side of the House, intend to vote against the Second Reading of this Bill, because they are opposed to the principle of superannuation, but, for myself, I do not think, on the present occasion at all events, that superannuation is an open question. Committee after Committee of this House have reported in favour of giving superannuation allowances to public servants, and the case for the police is a particularly strong one. In the first place, because the system is actually in existence, and, in the second place, Administration after Administration has publicly pledged itself by legislative action to sanction, to consolidate, to methodise that system. The principle, then, I regard as settled, but, at the same time, I think it would be difficult perhaps to exaggerate the gravity of the issue this Bill raises, because, practically, we have now before the House embodied in this Bill a system of pensions more extended and on a more liberal scale than exists at the present time in reference to any class of public servants. It is quite true that for the moment we are dealing only with the police, but it is impossible, I think, for any reasonable man to blind himself to the fact that we are setting up a new standard, and it may be that other classes of public servants in the country will look to that standard as their own ultimate goal. Admitting, then, that experience has shown it is inexpedient for the State to throw on the world, unprovided for, its public servants after a number of years' service, at the same time I think it behoves the House, on the present occasion, very carefully to consider the scale of pensions proposed, and the relations between pay and pension, and particularly to determine whether it may not be better to increase the pay than to raise the scale of pensions, always bearing in mind two things; in the first place, that the chief burden of an inflated system of pensions will fall, not upon us, but upon those who come after us; and bearing also in mind that, from the very nature of the case, the chief advantage of pensions will accrue rather to the upper ranks of the Service than to the lower grades, with whom I confess my interest and sympathies are most concerned. I listened attentively to the speech delivered by the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Burdett-Coutts), and the bulk of that speech was occupied with an advocacy of the two-thirds as against the three-fifths system of the Government Bill. I venture to think the hon. Member attached too great weight to that particular point. I know that a Memorandum has been issued by the superintendents of the Metropolitan Police representing that as the crux of the whole situation, and if I may say so without offence the hon. Member for Westminster seems to have swallowed that Memorandum holus-bolus. Now, I wish to emphasise, and insist upon this as an essential point, that it is not in the interest of the rank and file of the Metropolitan Police—and I have reason to think the men are of the same opinion—to insist on an inflated scale of pensions, because the establishment of such a scale will prejudice their claims in respect to pay, claims they regard, and reasonably regard, as more important than the question of superannuation. By way of illustrating what I mean, I take the case of a first-class constable, he is neither at the top or the bottom of the scale, he is a member of the class in which, as I have said, I feel special interest. I consider the case of this first-class constable with reference to the particular issue which the hon. Member for Westminster seemed to regard as the whole case, as between a two-thirds and a three-fifths pension. The wage of a first-class constable is £1 10s. a week, and his pension, according to the Government plan of three-fifths, would be 18s., and if the scale were raised, as the hon. Member for Westminster desires, then the pension would be £1. But now suppose this Metropolitan constable of the first-class were put upon the same footing with the first-class in the City Police Force, and he has a just claim to be so treated, he would then, on the three-fifths scale—his pay being 32s. 3d.—receive a pension of 19s. 4d., or only 8d. less than he would receive on the scale for which the hon. Member for Westminster contends. The conclusion I come to is, that it will be better that a constable should have 32s. pay and a three-fifths pension, than 30s. pay and a two-thirds pension, for his pension would be only eight-pence a week less in the first case, while he would receive 2s. a week more during the years of active service. This brings me to the contrast between the Bill and the Act passed last Session, in regard to which I took some part, for regulating pensions in the City Police. I venture to think the Memorandum the right hon. Gentleman has issued is rather misleading in what it states in the way of comparison between the two Forces. The Memorandum contains the statement that the scale of ordinary pensions on medical certificate is the same in the Bill with the scale of the City Police, but that statement is misleading for this reason: in the City Police the pension is reckoned on actual pay at the time of the pensioner's retirement; whereas by the Bill pensions will be reckoned upon the average pay for the previous three years. I do not wish to lay undue stress upon this, but the House will see at once there is a material advantage to the City policeman. There is something more to which I would call attention, which the Home Secretary has not mentioned in his Memorandum, which he did not allude to in his speech, and which may have escaped his notice altogether. The point is this: by the Bill, the grant of a gratuity before the completion of 15 years' service is a subject of discretion for the Police Authorities, but if the Home Secretary will refer to the Act we passed last year with reference to the City Police, he will find it is provided that in the corresponding case in that Force the constable is entitled to a gratuity. Here, there are two points in which the City policeman has material advantages over the metropolitan policeman. Then, again, in the Metropolitan Force, a man's service before he is 21 years of age is not to count for pension, but there is no such limitation in the City Police.

MR. MATTHEWS: But he cannot retire until he is 50.

*MR. PICKERSGILL: I am perfectly correct in saying that service begins to count for pension in the City as soon as a man becomes a member of the Force, but, on the other hand, I was going to mention that in instituting the comparison you have to put in the other scale that the City constable is not entitled to retire on pension until he reaches the age of 50. Contrasting the two plans the City policeman has material advantages, and when we remember his better position as regards pay, I think a case has been made out for serious re-consideration by the right hon. Gentleman. I submit, in respect to remuneration, the Metropolitan Police are entitled to special consideration. I rather differ on this point from what was said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt). If I followed him rightly he said if we give a high rate of pay to the Metropolitan Police then the police throughout the country will agitate for a similar rise. But I do not think such a claim would be well founded. In the first place no one can possibly deny that the duties of a metropolitan policeman are both more arduous and more dangerous than those of an average policeman in the country, but I do not rest my case so much on this particular aspect of the question; but, as everybody knows, the remuneration for labour in London is higher than that for corresponding labour in the country, and necessarily so, because the cost of living, and especially house rent, is very much higher in London. It is only reasonable that the Metropolitan Police should share in the advantage which labour generally in the Metropolis receives. Then I say that in respect to control the Metropolitan Police Force occupies an exceptional position. It is perfectly true that nominally the right hon. Gentleman opposite is the chief authority for the Metropolitan Force, but substantially and really this House is the authority for the Metropolitan Police, the House must recognise and cannot escape the responsibility. I noticed the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby said it would be a danger, at least, so I understood him, for this House to appoint a Committee to consider the case of the Metropolitan Police. Well, that may be so, but I think the danger is not so much in the mere appointment of a Committee; the danger is in allowing a system to continue which places this Force under the control of the House instead of it being, as other local forces are, under the control of representative Local Bodies, and, so long as that condition of things exists, the House must recognise its responsibility and act up to it. As regards the further stages of this Bill, I think the intention is to refer it to a Select Committee, but with what object is this course proposed? So far as I can see, it is useless to refer the Bill to a Select Committee except for the purpose of taking evidence. I should like the Home Secretary to tell us whether he does intend the Select Committee to take evidence or not; that is an important point upon which we have not, I think, up to the present time been enlightened. Looking at the matter from the point of view of a Metropolitan Member, I am in favour of the appointment of a Select Committee, because I want to give the rank and file of the Metropolitan Police the opportunity, which up to the present time they have not had, of fairly presenting their case. Unfortunately the metropolitan question is associated in this Bill with the general police question throughout the country, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has urged with considerable force that if you appoint a Select Committee, Local Bodies in the country, and not only Local Bodies, but local police in the country will claim the same opportunity of giving evidence which you are ex hypothesi going to offer to the metropolitan police, and this, of course, will open the door for a good deal of delay. If you are going to have evidence offered on the scale indicated in the speech of the right hon. Member for Derby, then I am afraid this Bill will run the risk of being hung up for another year, and a result of that kind is much to be deprecated. I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman in this conjuncture that he has two alternatives. He might himself consider the case as regards pay and other matters affecting the rank and file of the Metropolitan Force, he might constitute himself a Committee, as it were, and give them a full opportunity of presenting their case, and that is the course I would very earnestly press him to take, but if he declines that responsibility, then, it seems to me, the only alternative is to put the responsibility upon a Committee. It is, in my opinion, important that the police should have the opportunity of presenting their case either to himself, and this I should prefer because he has executive control, or to a Select Committee, if he prefers that, and, in this way, the case of the country would be separated from the case of the Metropolis, and I think I have shown that the cases are wholly distinct. Of one thing I am certain, namely, that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Matthews) will not be relieved of the difficulty with regard to the Force by the mere settlement of the question of pensions, even if he were to give the two-thirds claimed after 25 years' service, which I myself should much deprecate. Having regard to the interests of the ratepayers, I do not think he ought to modify his Bill in that sense. One word with regard to a general provision of this Bill. By Clause 8 it is provided that when a pension has been granted it shall be forfeited in certain contingencies. In Committee on the Bill I shall propose to make a clean sweep of those cases in which it is proposed to forfeit a pension. The first instance of this is upon conviction for an indictable offence; but I object most strongly to attach the condition of forfeiture to a conviction. It is improper on all grounds, and it is particularly objectionable under present circumstances, because this Government has introduced, or perhaps I should say revived, the practice of employing the Criminal Law against its political opponents. Just consider, for a moment, how this clause might operate. Take a particular case. To take part in an unlawful meeting is an indictable offence. But some of the best and most public-spirited citizens of this country have been convicted of taking part in such a meeting. It is, therefore, preposterous to say that, during a time, perhaps, of political excitement, a person convicted of this offence shall lose the pension which he has earned by long years of service. Moreover, I have frequently noticed in criminal cases that conditions of forfeiture of this kind introduce a very disturbing element into the administration of justice. If a man is convicted of an indictable offence, let him be adequately punished; but it seems to me preposterous to take away from him that which his own past service has earned.

*(9.4.) MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I desire to say only a very few words after the exceedingly lucid speech of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. I am glad to hear the determination which is expressed on both sides of the House, that the question shall be dealt with this Session. The Select Committee, presided over by my right hon. Friend the Member for Essex (Sir H. Selwin-Ibbetson) went into this question of Police Superannuation in 1877. It took a great deal of actuarial and other evidence from all parts of the country, and issued a very valuable and thorough Report. I heard, with great regret, the Leader of the House say yesterday that it was his intention again to refer the matter to a Select Committee. I regretted it not because of any doubt that the police would thoroughly substantiate their case, if necessary, before a Select Committee, but because there is very great danger, at this period of the Session, in referring a Bill of this importance to a Select Committee, as, from a variety of causes, it might be hung up to a distant future. I hope that some method may be devised of dealing with the question other than that suggested. It is incumbent on the House to fulfil the long-standing promises of successive Administrations to deal with this question. The police have waited for nearly 20 years for this subject to be dealt with. They have shown the greatest patience. They have not agitated violently, but have thought only of their public duty, and I think it behoves us to see that the Bill shall be passed into law during the present Session. With reference to the non-counting of Service towards pension under 21 years of age, I would point out that there are exceedingly few policemen who join the service under this age. I have no doubt, however, that the services of a constable between 20 and 21 are more valuable to the public than between the age for example, of 49 to 50. It would be therefore exceedingly unfair not to allow this period to be counted in the policeman's service. Then as to the provision which provides that an officer shall not retire on the pay of his rank unless he has served in that rank for upwards of three years. I think when we reach the Committee stage I shall be able to bring forward conclusive evidence showing that such a provision will cause hardship. A provision of great importance in the Bill of 1885, omitted from the present measure, is that which enabled the Police Authority in counties and boroughs in calculating the pension of the Chief Officer of Police to add a certain number of years to his service not exceeding seven. Chief Constables are usually required by the terms of their appointment to have had military or other experience, and they usually join the Force between the ages of 35 and 40. If the authority be not empowered, therefore, to add a certain number of years towards the pension of the Chief Officer, he will be an old man before he is entitled to any pension at all. I am not going to mix up the questions of pay and pension. I think it most important in the interests of the police at large that they should be kept entirely distinct. It is the question of pension which the police throughout the entire country wish to see settled. Mention has been made of the important matter of two-thirds and three-fifths. The police are most anxious to have a two-thirds pension. Although it is not a very important question for the ratepayer, it is a question to which the police attach the greatest importance. The difference in the individual pension is, as the right hon. Gentleman admitted, exceedingly small—only £7 a year on a salary of £100, or, on the salary of a first-class constable, something less than 3½d. a day on his pension. I cannot quite follow the figures of my right hon. Friend. He said if the two-thirds were conceded by the Government it would mean an immediate difference of £45,000—

MR. MATTHEWS: No, not an immediate but an ultimate charge—many years hence.

*MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I think the immediate difference would only be something under £1,000. In 1889 there were only 329 men in the Metropolitan Police Force who had completed a service of 25 years, and there is the most conclusive evidence to show that this length of service in the Metropolis, including the City of London, according to the evidence of Sir James Fraser—whose retirement from the Force I am sure every Member of the House will regret—is the maximum which a constable can perform with efficiency. Mr. Bond, a man of great experience in dealing with police sickness, puts the maximum as low as 24 years. I am sure that in drawing up the Memorandum which has been forwarded to Members the superintendents had only the idea of furthering the interests of the Force at large, and I believe the opinions they express are the opinions of the great majority of the Force. The Superannuation Committee, which was formed many years ago to keep alive the question of superannuation of Constabulary Forces, has passed a resolution that it would be exceedingly desirable that instead of being called upon to adopt a fixed scale of pension, irrespective of merit, the Police Authorities throughout the country should be empowered to grant pensions between the maximum and minimum scale as a stimulus to good conduct, and the Committee is strongly of opinion that the limit of age should not be higher than 55 years. I am sorry that the Memorandum given to us by the right hon. Gentleman was not issued with the Bill, as it would have been of great advantage to the Metropolitan Members, and also to the police, who have found a great deal of difficulty in wading through the provisions of the Bill. I would point out that the metropolitan policeman, before he can obtain the maximum pension, has one year more to serve than he has to serve at present.

MR. MATTHEWS: That is a matter of detail.

*MR. HOWARD VINCENT: The Bill confers, however, very substantial advantages in many ways, not only upon the Metropolitan Police, but upon the Constabulary at large. I hope that, if possible, the Government will consider this little matter of two-thirds. I believe the Bill is a conscientious attempt to do what can be fairly done for the police. The only matter I regret is that, in his conscientious desire to obtain the best terms for his subordinates, my friend Mr. Monro has resigned, and I only hope that the Public Service will not be long deprived of the services of so able, zealous, and conscientious an administrator.

(9.19.) MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): Anyone who has heard the right hon. Gentleman explain the Bill must be convinced that he has bestowed great pains in rendering it comprehensible to Members of the House; but, at the same time, a measure of such complexity and magnitude is extremely difficult to be dealt with in a Second Reading Debate. I am bound to say that from the most careful study I have been able to give to the Bill I have been obliged to come to the conclusion that it is a very great departure from the lines of the Bill introduced in 1885 by my right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler.) The measure proposes to provide for the Police Force of this country on a scale of liberality of which I cannot help thinking the right hon. Gentleman himself must be somewhat ashamed. His observations throughout his speech were in the direction of deprecating any hostility to the measure on the ground that it was too liberal. I am not one of those Members who are in the habit of making wild and wholesale accusations against the Police Force of the Metropolis. I recognise the value of the Force and the competence of its members; but I am at a loss to understand upon what principle a different scale of pensions should be conceded to one branch of the Civil Service to that which is conceded to other branches thereof. I know no precedent which equals or at all approaches the lavishness of the scale of compensation it is now proposed to award to the Police Force. At present a member of the Force is not entitled to any compensation, unless he retires through ill-health or injury sustained in the Service, until he has reached the age of 60. The Bill of the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) proposed to alter that scale and to award compensation to a policeman who had reached the age of 55. The proposed scale would fix upon the Metropolis, and the various sources from which the pensions are to be drawn, a burden of between £200,000 and £300,000 per annum. That is an immense increase upon the amount which obtained a few years ago. On the basis of the new scale a sergeant receiving £100 per annum will, when he reaches the age of 45 or 46, be entitled to a pension of no less than nearly £70 a year. In other branches of the Civil Service, which perform as arduous duties as the police, a man who has served for 30 years at £100 a year is entitled to a pension of between £50 and £60. I want to know, on what principle of justice or consistency can this difference of treatment be justified? Further, a policeman is paid very high wages compared with other branches of industry throughout the country. The best test is this—are you able to get a sufficient number of proper candidates for the Service? I have the authority of the late Commissioner of Police for saying that there is not the smallest difficulty in getting recruits for the Service at the present time. We are now face to face with a very serious agitation for an increase of wages in the Police Force—an agitation which certainly is founded on no just cause. What I altogether protest against is that such a heavy burden should be laid on the already heavily burdened ratepayers of the country as the outrageously large pensions that are now suggested. A man 46 years of age is still competent to earn his livelihood; yet a police sergeant will be able to retire with an income of something like £70 at 45 or 46 years of age. We have been told by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Matthews) that pensioned policemen are able to get situations. I find that the number of retired police officers who are in indigent circumstances, after having served for any reasonable number of years in the Police Force, is perfectly inappreciable, and I cannot understand why a police sergeant in the prime of life should be awarded a pension of such an extravagant amount as that proposed in the Bill. If I am the only Member, and I hope I am not, who is found resisting the passage of this measure, I shall do so. I very much regret that Radical Members—I think it is an unhappy effect of giving the franchise to the police—should come forward and champion this gross and excessive expenditure. I will only say, in conclusion, that if we are to have this excessive scale of pensions do not let it be confined to the London Police. It might equally be extended to other branches of the Civil Service. I am sure I shall have the sympathy of my hon. Friend the Member for Lanarkshire when I say that the scale, with equal show of reason, could be applied to the dock labourers. For these reasons I shall resist this Bill, and I do hope that I am not the only Provincial Member who will do so.

*(9.31.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY, Hallam, Sheffield): The hon. Member who has just sat down has said that he recognised no difference between one class of public servants and another. Has he reflected on the peculiar nature of the duties of the police, who are subject to long-continued exposure, to cold, to the night air, to physical fatigue, and to personal danger—all of which renders a policeman after 25 years' service of very little use for the purposes of police duty? These considerations, I hope, will dispose of the argument that this Bill ought to be resisted because it gives a higher scale of pensions to the police than to the Civil servants. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby asked certain questions of the Government as to what consultations have been made with the localities with regard to this Bill. It seemed to me that the right hon. Gentleman entirely over-stated both his own practice in introducing his own Bills, and the statements of my right hon. Friend in the Memorandum. I do not believe that the right hon. Gentlemen opposite, in presenting their Bills, had anything like the general concurrence of the Local Authorities. It is true the Memorandum states that certain communications did pass, and, indeed, the Bill itself was a communication to the

Mr. Atherley-Jones

Local Authorities. I believe I am safe in saying that there is no evidence at the Home Office that there was anything like a general consent of the Local Authorities on the introduction of these Bills. I was in the House when they were introduced, and opposition was offered to them by the Representatives of the ratepayers in all parts of the House. The evidence, therefore, was that the Bills had not received the general concurrence of the Local Authorities. In the present instance, we conceived that to have invited discussions from the Local Authorities would have been to cause delay such as would be experienced were this Bill referred to a Select Committee. It is contended that we should have had separate Bills for the Metropolis and Provinces. It may be that there is a difference between the circumstances of the two, but anyone who knows what the Parliamentary necessities are will agree that it would have been bad tactics to introduce separate Bills. As to the argument of the hon. Baronet the Member for Sussex that there should be a discretion vested in the Local Authority to vary the scale of pensions as between individual members of the Force, we do not consider that the Local Authority should have that power. The hon. Member for Sheffield, in advancing his views, represented not the whole of the Police Force down to the lowest rank, but only the chief officers, who, I suspect, spoke in the interests of discipline. These officers wished to have control over the amount of the pensions in order to use them as a means of enforcing discipline. We have rejected these views, believing that there should be one scale of pensions applicable to the entire Force; though where a constable is guilty of misconduct, in that case it should be in the discretion of the Local Authority to reduce the pension. As regards the service below 21 years of age, by a sub-section of Clause 29 of the Bill, any existing constable will be entitled to count for the purposes of pension years of service before the age of 21 years. As regards future constables, provision could be made against enlistment before the age of 21 years. The average age of enlistment at the present time is somewhere about 22 years. As regards the two-thirds pension—the maximum amount—it is true that the officers and members of the Metropolitan Force do consider that they ought to reach their maximum after 25 years' service. I submit that that is a point to be argued in Committee, and not upon the Second Reading. My hon. Friend the Member for the Abbey Division of Westminster asked whether the Select Committee would be allowed to see the information gathered by the Departmental Committee. I believe it will not be long before that information is in the hands of Members. The hon. Member for Bethnal Green complained that this Bill contained provisions as to the forfeiture of pensions. There is much to be said in favour of the principle that misconduct during active service should be punished at once and for all, and that it should not be complicated by considerations of the future withdrawals of pensions. Different considerations, however, apply to the case of misconduct after the grant of pensions. Some hon. Members have insisted upon mixing up the scale of pensions with the demand for increased pay. Some hon. Members have gone so far as to say that the present force would prefer an immediate increase of pay and not an increase of pensions. Constables who now receive 24s., 27s., and 30s. a week, I believe, demand 27s., 30s., and 35s. a week, with corresponding increases among the upper ranks. From such calculations as I have been able to obtain, that would entail an immediate additional burden of £130,000 a year on the ratepayers, and an ultimate increase, when the system of promotion, with accompanying higher pay, has reached its full effect, would mean an increase on the rate per £ of no less than 1½d., and that increase would be exclusive of the consequent increase of the future pension charge. I mention these figures in order, as I hope, to steady opinion in this House. Let me say one word on the Committee to which the Bill is to be taken. Here I cannot help remarking that it is well that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby concluded his speech by saying that he wished this Bill to pass the Second Reading, because I noticed that what else he did say about the Bill was in favour of doubts, of hesitation and delay. I was glad to hear his declaration that he does not agree with the demand made yesterday by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton, that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee. It was only in response to that demand, very strenuously but very recklessly put forward, that it should be referred to a Select Committee that the formal Motion for so referring it was put down in the name of the Home Secretary. I am glad to find that there seems to prevail to-night a general opinion that the demand was hastily made last night, and that, on greater reflection, it need not be treated as being an essential condition of the acceptance of this Bill. I trust that the support this measure has received from both sides of the House this evening may be taken as evidence that the Bill, which accords to the police a moderate provision after a full length of service, is a measure which will do substantial justice as between the members of the Police Force on the one hand, and the purists in matters of economy on the other, and in that spirit I trust it will receive the general acceptance of the House.

*MR. STOREY: I have placed a notice on the Paper of an Amendment directed against the principle of this Bill. I intended to have moved this Amendment as soon as I could obtain an opportunity after the Home Secretary had sat down, but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby who is practically the author of the main features of this Bill, was extremely desirous that he should be allowed to make his observations immediately after those of the Home Secretary, and in deference to his views I gave way and left the House. I am now, however, extremely desirous of having the opportunity of directing the attention of the House, not to the enormous amount of petty details which have disfigured the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman on the opposite Benches, but to the essential principle which underlies this Bill, a principle against which I must now, as ever, express my extreme dissent. Now, Sir, the Amendment I have put upon the Paper is as follows, namely:—

“To leave out all the words after the word ‘That,’ in order to insert the words ‘this House is of opinion that the superannuation of the police is altogether a matter for the Local Authorities, and that the only sound principle on which to carry out a scheme is to pay the men adequate wages so as to enable them, by means of existing benefit societies or of a fund administered and controlled by themselves, to make suitable provision for their own future."

I am well aware, of course, that in moving an Amendment containing principles of utter antagonism to the main principles of this Bill, I necessarily labour under a grievous disadvantage from the fact that the occupants of the two front Benches have laid their heads together and agreed to adopt a particular course. Under such circumstances, an independent Member like myself has no possible chance of securing the support of the House; but it has always been the custom of the House on such occasions to permit a man having the courage of his convictions to state with brevity the grounds on which he holds them, and, for my part, I will endeavour to repay the House for this consideration by being as brief as possible in the observations I have to make. It must be apparent to the Home Secretary that the extreme difficulty of discussing this Bill lies in the fact that we are dealing with the subject from entirely different positions. On the one hand, we have the Metropolitan Police, who are the undoubted servants of Parliament and the country, and who are managed by this House and the Home Secretary. On the other hand, we have the great body of County and Borough Police who are not the direct servants of this House, but the servants of the Municipal Authorities. This being so, it must be understood that in what I am about to say I cannot deal with the London police and the country police on the same level. It must be evident to any one that if the London police are under the control of this House and the Home Secretary it is the duty of the House to make such provision for their pay and superannuation as the House may think fit. But the point I desire to put is this, that with regard to the great body of the country police they are not, and never have been, the direct servants of the State, and the great objection I make to the proposal of the Government, so far as it relates to them, is that now, for the first time in the history of this question of superannuation, we are to make an entirely new departure. I have no doubt that even the Home Secretary fully realises this fact. This question of superannuation is a serious one to the country. Heretofore superannuation has almost entirely been confined to the direct servants of the country.

*MR. MATTHEWS: Superannuation of the police has existed for upwards of 50 years.

*MR. STOREY: I will come to the point by and bye. What I say is that there has been no direct superannuation of the police, which has been affirmed and compelled by this House. I admit that there has been superannuation by the local authorities of their own free will, and I say that if there is to be superannuation at all in the future, the rule should be as in the past, the superannuation should depend on the free will and good will of the local authorities of the country. Will the House permit me to ask them to realise what this new departure is? I suppose we are all aware of the enormous amount of money we are already called upon to pay for superannuation purposes in this Kingdom. I have lately been engaged in taking out an enormous sum of figures on this subject, but it is not necessary for my case to enter into any great amount of detail on the subject. I may, however, state that in the year 1837, upwards of fifty years ago, the total amount paid in pensions and superannuations by the people of this country was £5,287,000; twenty years lately, namely in 1857, the total amount payable for such purposes had decreased to £4,340,000, so that during the interval there had been a grateful fall of nearly a million sterling. But in 1877, after the lapse of another period of twenty years, the pension and superannuation list had risen to £5,148,000, while in 1887, ten years later, and only three years ago, this pension list had increased to £6,784,000 per annum. I ask the House to contemplate this fact. I have made a deduction from the return we get from India and other sources, and I assert that the net pension list of this country at the present moment, without taking into consideration the local pensions granted to the local police, amounts to the enormous total of nearly seven millions sterling per annum. Now it is estimated that a penny in the pound on the Income-Tax produces about two millions sterling, so that we are absolutely paying something like a 3d. Income-Tax, in order to pension and superannuate persons who may have served the State. Some of them doubtless have served the State and others have not, but at any rate we have an enormous number of persons receiving this money, and doing no service whatever for the State. I submit that this is an extremely serious state of things. Still, hitherto these pensions have been paid to the direct servants of the State, and we have not advanced beyond that principle. Now let us examine what it is the right hon. Gentleman wants to do. He not only proposes to compel the payment of pensions to the Metropolitan Police who are in the service of the State, and against which I cannot on my own principle say anything, but he intends also to compel every county and borough authority throughout the country, whether they will or no, whether they think it right or wrong, to pay pensions and superannuations in due course to the members of other police establishments. Now these policemen are not the servants of the State, they are the servants of the municipalities, and therefore the right hon. Gentleman and his Government with their usual revolutionary instincts—because Conservatives as they call themselves, they have during the four years they have been in power proved to be the most revolutionary Government I have ever seen—are going to advance a stage further, and affirm the principle that it is the right and duty of the State, not only to pension its direct servants, but also to compel the payment of pensions to the servants of the municipalities. How much further will they carry this principle? Does the Tory Government think that when they had once given effect to this principle it will rest there? There are men on this side of the House of very different temper to that of the right hon. gentlemen, and they will probably in the future propose measures which I know will receive strong objection and antagonism from hon. gentlemen opposite. Just as right hon. and hon. gentlemen on those Benches are often able, when we are opposing their measures, to produce from Hansard an authority from our front Bench confirming the views they take, so hon. Members who now sit behind me will be able in the future, when they propose their Socialistic legislation to say that the first Government who ever laid down the principle asserted on this proposal was the Tory Government of Lord Salisbury. How much further, I ask, would the Home Secretary like to carry this principle? He is a man of logic. Suppose he succeeds in pensioning the policemen in the municipalities, on what principle could he object to the pensioning of the elementary school teachers? We know that those ladies and gentlemen have asked for pensions, and the demand is one on which I, for one, do not agree. I think it is an entire mistake on their part, but supposing we say that they are not the direct servants of the State they will at once reply, "Neither are the policemen, but you have assented to the principle of pensioning them, and consequently you cannot refuse to pension us." I cannot understand on what principle the Conservative Party can affirm such a method of dealing with the public money. Surely that Party must have drifted a long way from its old moorings and floated into very strange waters. How, I ask, would the right hon. Gentleman object to a demand for pensions when made by the servants of the Post Office, and the Telegraph Departments. He is, of course, aware that large sections of those two branches of the public service are not entitled to pensions, although certain sections are, and that is a fact which would make it the more difficult for the right hon. Gentleman to refuse the general demand. These people are all the servants of the State, and yet they are not pensioned. Well, there is another class to whom I ask the right hon. Gentleman's attention. I suppose he thinks there is something special in the case of the police because their work is arduous and their calling dangerous. In fact, I quite agree with the words of the popular opera, "The policeman's lot is not a happy one," and I certainly don't object to their being adequately paid. In my part of the country you will not find a policeman who will deny that I have always been anxious to treat the police force most liberally, but I want the right hon. Gentleman to look at the case of the enormous army of sanitary officers now under the control of the local authorities. What about their pensions? Why, in my own county, when raging fevers and filthier diseases have taken place, I have known the sanitary officers to wrap people up in blankets and carry them to the hospital, then return and fumigate the places at the risk of their lives. When these men have asked for pensions, as far as I am concerned, I have been compelled, on principle, to return the only answer I ever give to such appeals: "If you receive too little pay, say so, and we will pay you better, but whilst you are earning wages you must make provision for your old age." If policemen are to be pensioned, why not the enormous army of persons who are under the control of our sanitary authorities? If pensions are to be provided for those who are not servants of the State, what answer will be given when a demand is made that there shall be a complete system, under which every workman shall be guaranteed against the dangers of his calling and the weakness and poverty of old age? The Conservative Party will have no answer. It will live as the Conservative party of old Rome lived, by appealing to the cupidity of the working classes, and in the end a sad fate will overtake it. In opposition to this unfair, unworthy, and unjust principle, I lay down the principle that you should consider the whole circumstances of these men in a fair and generous spirit. If you choose to err, err on the side of extravagance, but in the name of all that is good in this country do not commit yourselves to this fatal principle. Pay your policemen well; put them in the position in which your shopkeepers and working men are; in the position I myself occupy. Give to your employes as adequate, as fair, as generous a salary as you can afford, and leave it to their common sense and their thrift to provide for themselves. I am appealing to the Conservative party, for in this matter I give up the Liberal Party and its leaders, but not the Radical Party, for there are many good Radicals who would be willing to agree with the Conservative position on this and many other points. Two years ago the Ministry was in favour of decentralisation, and yet now, instead of decentralising, it is going to centralise. How is it the Tory Party has departed from its old principle? I wish the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been in his place, for he is a person one likes to quote. It is always possible to quote a short passage from a speech he made two years ago to show that his opinion formerly was different to what it is now. In 1888 the right hon. Gentleman said "My view is strongly in favour of decentralisation. The whole object of the Government was to decentralise as soon as they could." How are you carrying that out? Instead of decentralising you are going to centralise. Up to two years ago you induced us in the country by the offer of money—first one-third and then one-half—to submit ourselves to your control. You gradually obtained a very substantial control over the whole police forces of the country by offering to the municipal authorities what you knew they would not refuse. You admitted the principle was wrong, however, and you said you would put an end to it. You said you were going to establish in the counties authorities similar to those in the towns, and that when you had created them you were going to trust your own children. How are you fulfilling that high ideal of Conservative statesmanship? You are proposing to restore local grants in another form, and with the grants to restore central control. Under Clause 17 the local police authority is not to receive a grant unless it obtains a certificate from the Home Office inspector, a provision which will necessitate the keeping up of the present army of inspectors.

MR. MATTHEWS: We have three inspectors.

*MR. STOREY: Well, three is an army sometimes, on the stage. Why does the Bill touch counties and boroughs at all? Admitting for the sake of argument that a case can be made out for London, what is the necessity for dealing with the counties and boroughs? Which of them had asked for the Bill? Can he point to a single one that has done so? The Home Secretary does not answer; then I may take it that, as a matter of fact, not a single country authority, nor a single borough authority has asked for the Bill. Does that not demonstrate the truth of my contention? The right hon. Gentleman does not trust the county and borough authorities, and will interfere in a matter that belongs essentially to them. I warn him that he will meddle and muddle. The borough authorities will not, without a protest, permit the right hon. Gentleman to restore the old system of centralisation, though out of deference to the case of London they will not make all the opposition they could at this stage. I warn him that he will have to contend with a great many municipal authorities and a great deal of municipal feeling. The right hon. Gentleman cannot be making his proposal because the funds in the counties and boroughs are deficient. He flourished before the House the fact that there was a large deficiency. I think he said it was a quarter of a million of money. The total deficiency in all the counties of England last year was £28,000, and that was in 17 out of the 44 county divisions. In the county of Durham this year there is no county rate owing to the subventions received, and as the police rate is only 2d there would have been no hardship in the county making up the deficiency in the police superannuation fund. The Borough of Sunderland has a superannuation fund, and has money invested, and it does not want to be troubled by the Home Secretary with either his money or his control. His personal presence, of course, we should welcome amongst us, but if he attempts to interfere with us and treat us as if we were little children, instead of municipal authorities, who quite understand our own districts, and are quite prepared to defray the cost of their management. I warn him that he will make a great mistake. What is the deficiency of the boroughs? The deficiency in the boroughs last year was £153,000. But on looking at the list it will be found that one of the boroughs is London, and that London is responsible for £139,000 of the deficiency, while the other 163 boroughs which possess superannuation funds are only responsible for a total deficiency of £14,000. I submit, therefore, that there is nothing in the financial necessities of the case to require this Bill to be extended either to the counties or boroughs. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary is introducing an evil principle which, by and by, will be bettered by hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House. I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name on the Paper.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to insert the words "this House is of opinion that the superannuation of the Police is altogether a matter for the Local Authorities, and that the only sound principle on which to carry out a scheme is to pay the men adequate wages, so as to enable them, by means of existing benefit societies or of a fund administered and controlled by themselves, to make suitable provision for their own future."—(Mr. Storey.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

*(10.18.) MR. WHARTON (York, W. R. Ripon): I am glad to be able to follow the hon. Member, as he has made allusion to the county of Durham. It may be satisfactory to him to know that Durham stands in a better position with regard to superannuation than any county in England. But the county of Durham, together with other counties, has for some time past been breaking the law, and this of itself is sufficient justification for the Bill before the House. The hon. Member for Sunderland objects to pensions, and so indeed did I; but when a system of pensioning has been going on for years it would be very difficult to abolish it. You have to deal with things as you find them, and if you attempt to do away with the system of pensions the present disaffection, as it is called, would soon, I am afraid, become actual revolt.

*MR. STOREY: I should have limited myself. I don't at all propose that there should be any change in the present system as applied to existing policemen. I would do away with pensions in the case of future enlistments.

*MR. WHARTON: It seems to me it would be difficult, if not altogether impossible, to maintain a force half of which could look forward to pensions and half of which could not. The hon. Member contends that pensions, if given to the police, ought to be equally given to every other class of public servants; but the peculiarly arduous, difficult, and dangerous duties of policemen place them on a different footing entirely. It is on that ground that I feel the superannuation of policemen is more justifiable than the superannuation of any other class of public servants.

*MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): No; the gas stokers.

*MR. WHARTON: I do not imagine that they are public servants. They are the servants of either private individuals or companies and cannot in any way be compared to policemen. My hon. Friend said this was a revolutionary scheme of a revolutionary Government; but I fear he could not have been in the House when the right hon. Member for Derby acknowledged that this measure was on all fours with one introduced by himself, and also by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton. I believe the present Bill to be an excellent one, and I therefore give those right hon. Gentlemen credit for it as the Home Secretary did in the course of his speech. If, therefore, there be revolution in the Bill, the blame attaches to both sides of the House. So much for the speech of the hon. Member opposite. With regard to the Bill itself, let me say that I welcome it most sincerely, having had much to do with the police for many years, and I hope that it will prove the final settlement of a question which has been deferred too long. I do not blame any individual or any Government for not settling it, for we know pretty well what difficulty there is in bringing these matters to a final and satisfactory conclusion. But I do hope and trust that in this matter which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has most truly said is in no way to be regarded as a party matter, the House will bestow its attention upon this Bill so as to perfect it and make it a real and final settlement, satisfactory to the ratepayers and to the police in the counties and boroughs as well as in the metropolis. As to what should happen if the Bill passes the second reading to-night, I myself deprecate delay. I agree with what fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, that the Bill will pass with greater celerity and satisfaction if it is dealt with in the ordinary way by a Committee of the Whole House than if it is sent either to a Grand Committee or a Select Committee. I am sure from the way the Bill has been received in the House, the hon. Gentlemen who take an interest in the matter will give it their careful attention, and will not unduly prolong their speeches, and that being so, it seems to me that it will be more satisfactory to the police if the details are considered in Committee of the Whole House. As to the police force itself, I believe some hon. Members hold that the policemen are a very highly-paid class of men; but I would point out that although they are not skilled they have two special qualifications—they must be men of good physique, and of a reliable character. For such a man we must be prepared to pay a good price. No one could have heard the figures given to the House by the Home Secretary in introducing the Bill without feeling that the policeman's life is indeed a hard one, because, though we know that his life is a somewhat surer one, so far as health is concerned, than it used to be, we know that so arduous is his work that after 25 years he generally ceases to be fit for active duty. The police stand on a different footing to other classes of working men, and it is with that in view that I say that they have a right to be treated differently in the matter of pensions.

(10.29.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I listened with the greatest interest to the speech of the hon. Member for Sunderland, and appreciated the distinction he drew between the police of the metropolis and the police of the rest of the country. In regard to the metropolis, the responsibility for the police, both as to pay and pensions, rests on this House. The House cannot shirk the responsibility by saying that it is a matter for the Home Secretary. The Home Secretary for the time being no doubt is the responsible Minister, or Chief Executive Officer, but the House itself is the Watch Committee for London, and the House must bear the whole responsibility. We have had inducements held out to London police with regard to superannuation, and naturally the men have looked forward to the time when a Bill would be brought in that would give them the superannuation promised to them. I think with the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) that the first step you should take should be to deal not so much with the question of superannuation as with that of wages. I say distinctly that you cannot divorce the question of the pay of the Metropolitan Police from that of their superannuation. I quite endorse the remark made by the hon. Gentleman the Under-Secretary for the Home Department in his criticism of the speech of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Howard Vincent), namely, that the hon. Member was not dealing with the question from the point of view of a man in the ranks, but was simply holding a brief for the superior officers in the Metropolitan Police force, whose remuneration is very fair indeed under the present scale.

*MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg pardon, but I am not holding a brief for anybody.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: I withdraw the word "brief," but I will say that the whole of the hon. Member's argument was that which was given in the memorandum sent to us by the superintendents, and that which from our personal knowledge we know to be used by them. Well, I say you cannot shirk the question whether you are prepared to place the men in a better position with regard to wages. If the question be considered outside the scope of debate, I would ask the Home Secretary why it is that in the memorandum, in which the details of the Bill are so explicitly stated, the pay of the members of the Metropolitan force is given and compared with the rate of pay in the City of London force. If that is not put there as part of the subject, why is it presented with the memorandum? We have been told that some enormous figures would be necessary to meet any increased remuneration. Last week the Government were asked what was to become of the £149,000 now charged for superannuation, when in place of it they are going to get £150,000 out of local taxation. They were asked whether the £150,000 would be absorbed by the thousand additional men added to the force, and I hope the representatives of the Home Office will give us some information on that point. I have been given to understand that what the vast majority of the members of the force are most anxious about is the question of remuneration. They think, and there is a great deal of argument on their side, that they who are outside the City are entitled to the same remuneration as the men inside the City get. They are more concerned on this point than on receiving two-thirds or three-fifths of their pay in the shape of superannuation. The argument advanced by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Durham (Mr. Wharton) came with very bad taste from the representative of a democratic constituency, or a constituency in which the vast majority of the men are trade unionists. The hon. and learned member told us that the police of London were engaging in an agitation for which there was no just or sufficient cause, and he added that some one connected with the force had told him that as many men could be got as were required for the service. He concluded, I suppose, that because plenty of men could be got the wages paid are sufficiently good. I appeal to my hon. friends who have had to do with labour agitations as to whether, whenever they have engaged in agitation, they have not been told, "If you don't like to take the wages offered, we can get plenty of men to do the work." But what I wish to emphasise is that we London Members support the Bill because you have promised the police a system of superannuation. But, at the same time, we think that the question of a proper remuneration is more important than superannuation. We think a great deal more good would be done to the men by inquiring into their grievances with regard to wages, and making superannuation a secondary consideration.

(10.40.) MR. ISAACSON: I listened to the clear and explicit exposition of the Bill by the Home Secretary with a great deal of pleasure, and I was also pleased to listen to the very interesting speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt). It appeared to me that the only fault the right-hon. Gentleman found with the Government was that they have not taken sufficient pains to get proper information from the country as to whether they liked the Bill or not. Now I think the Government are very much indebted to three hon. Gentlemen sitting opposite—the hon. Member for Bethnal Green (Mr. Pickersgill), the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey), and the hon. and learned Member for Durham (Mr. Atherley-Jones). All those hon. Gentlemen have advocated an increase of wage instead of superannuation. The hon. Member for Bethnal Green pointed out that the pension which the Government proposed to give to the police would only make a difference of 8d. per week in the men's wages, and in the same breath he pointed out that if the Government would only listen to advice and increase the wages, the police would receive 2s. 3d. per week extra. The hon. Members for Sunderland and Durham pointed out that the Government should increase the wages of the men in preference to giving them superannuation. These hon. Gentlemen have certainly proved themselves good friends of the Government. Hon. Gentlemen are always preaching economy, yet they advise increase of pay instead of superannuation. It is quite clear that superannuation will do more to keep down the rates than increase of pay. It has been said that the wear and tear of the London police is much greater than that of the police of the City or in the counties. I feel convinced that if the Home Secretary would only alter the time of entering the Service from 18 and 19 to 21 years of age, much good would result. It is difficult to get the class of men required for the Metropolitan Police. There are many applicants, but we must bear in mind that there are many openings in our colonies and elsewhere where good men can find employment even better than in the Metropolitan Police Force. I admire the Metropolitan Police as a body more than any body of men in the country. I remember asking a few years ago a German statesman what struck him most in London, and his reply was, "Your magnificent police." I really think that when we have such a fine body of men we should not begrudge them the small sum necessary to provide them with superannuation. I feel certain that no inhabitant of London will object to pay the very slight increase in the rate which will be necessary in order to find the money for this superannuation. I only hope that the Bill will be satisfactory to the police and to the country, that the police will settle down to their old form of obedience, and that we shall hear nothing more of meetings of inspectors or sergeants or any other portion of the force.

(1048.) MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, West): I do not intend to enter into the details of the Bill, but as a London Member I must express some regret that the idea of referring this Bill to a Select Committee has been abandoned. I wish to see a peaceful settlement of this question, and I feel that as regards London such a settlement would have been brought about more certainly if the police had an opportunity of themselves stating their case before a Select Committee of the House. The hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) has shown very clearly and forcibly that the Metropolitan Police and the country Police are entirely distinct. Unfortunately in London we have no control over our police, and if this Bill is not to be referred to a Select Committee, I appeal to the Home Secretary to use his influence with the authorities to see that the police have an opportunity of meeting together in their own districts and discussing the details of the Measure, and of placing their views before their representatives and the country. During the last few days the idea has prevailed that under the new Commissioner of Police, the voices of the men had been stifled. I hope that will not be the case. I am sure it would be against the interests of the police and the people of London if such a state of things prevailed. I am glad that the question of superannuation is to be put before the police in a more satisfactory form than it was thought a few days ago it would be put, but I repeat what I said the other night that I do not see why the Metropolitan Police should not be as well paid as the City Police.

*(1052.) MR. S. HOARE (Norwich): I think some inconvenience has arisen in this Debate from the fact that of necessity the question of the condition of the Police Force in London has occupied a very prominent position. As the representative of a large borough, I think it is only my duty to express my thanks to the Home Secretary for the introduction of this Bill. Praise has been given to the Metropolitan Police, and I think they most richly deserve it; but at the same time it is only right we should give some praise to our great police forces in our counties and boroughs. I am perfectly conscious of the arduous work which the Metropolitan Police do, but I cannot admit that the work which our County and Borough Police do is necessarily of an easy kind. They have night work in lonely lanes, they have heavy work in our towns, and they perform their duties satisfactorily and well. I therefore hope nothing will be done to alter the position of the police in the country as compared with that of the Metropolitan Police. Our County and Borough Police would feel it very much if they were treated in this House in a less considerate way to the Metropolitan Police. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) asked the Home Secretary if he had made sufficient inquiries in the various localities before the introduction of the Bill. I may say that I at once forwarded copies of the Bill to my constituency. I forwarded copies to the corporation, the chief constable, and to the constables of Norwich, and I have every reason to believe they welcome the introduction of the measure. Let me add one word as to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Essex (Sir H. Selwin-Ibbetson), who seemed to suggest that it is desirable to have a varying scale according to merits of the officers in the various places. I trust we shall have a fixed scale. What the police want is to know, when they enter the force, exactly what their position is. They wish that their pension should be fixed; and if it is desirable for them to know how they stand, it is desirable that the County Councils, to one of which I have the honour to belong, should not have these questions ever coming up before them. I hope the pension will not only be fixed, and I should be glad if the Home Secretary could bring it up to two-thirds. In some districts it is already two-thirds, and it will be a great disappointment to the police officers in many places to find that the pensions they are to receive under the Bill will be less than their predecessors have received.

*(11.0) MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I notice just that difference of opinion among hon. Members opposite that makes the life of debate. The hon. Member for Stepney (Mr. Isaacson) has assured us that the Bill will be of the greatest possible use in relieving metropolitan rates, whereas the Home Secretary, who, I presume, understands the scope of the Government Bill better than his followers behind him, assured us, with equal earnestness, he was afraid that the Bill would ultimately put upon the rates a charge of £200,000. However, that may be ultimately or presently, I take leave to congratulate the Government on their novel position. With a substantial majority behind them, at last they have found a Bill which there seems to be some possibility of their being able to pass into law. The very novelty of the position must strike the House with great force in face of two remarkable examples of infructuous legislation. As to the Bill itself, I have to congratulate the police upon their case being taken up at last. Superannuation has long been in the air, but it is somewhat remarkable that this great consensus of opinion, as I suppose we must call it, should manifest itself concurrently with the agitation and dissatisfaction which have recently appeared among members of the force. I notice a remarkable change has "come over the spirit of the dream" of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite. Whereas last week, in discussion upon police matters, hon. Members one after another rose to deny the fact that any such thing as dissatisfaction existed among the police, to-night we have assurances repeated that this most reasonable measure of the Government is produced in order to satisfy the legitimate aspirations of the Metropolitan police force. Now, I do thoroughly like a good contradiction, especially when it comes on the heels of an opinion expressed with such force a short time ago. It must show the country the extreme steadiness of opinion that prevails in this legislative chamber. However, I do not think we should have heard much of the Bill but for two circumstances. One circumstance is the fact of dissatisfaction, amounting almost to revolt, being observed among the Metropolitan Police force. It is a very serious thing when you have the police force of a large city in a state of semi-insurrection—though I do not believe disaffection had gone so far as that in this city—but the very remarkable development of opinion on all sides in the House is due largely to the fact that members are aware that doctrines are becoming extensively spread among classes of the population that we who assume to legislate for them live on their labour and exploit them, and that being so, it is much more convenient and satisfactory to have a well-affected and contented police force to suppress the meetings and other constitutional rights of the working classes, than to be obliged to resort, as most Foreign Governments are, to that power upon which our civilisation is based, the Maxim gun and military force. Another circumstance that has largely assisted to bring this question to the front is the dissatisfaction undoubtedly existing among the superior officers of the Metropolitan Police force. I do not hold the opinion, and I do not think many sensible men do, that a policeman is worn out after twenty-five years' service. There are large sections of men among the working classes who work far harder all their lives. The hon. Member whom I ventured to interrupt, I hope not with discourtesy, during his speech drew our attention to the fact that the occupation of gas-stokers is a far more arduous one than that of police-constables in London, and hitherto, so far as I am aware, there has been no proposition that Government gas-stokers shall participate in any pension scheme whatever. What, therefore, does this point to? To the fact that among the superior officers of the Metropolitan Police force undoubtedly pensions are far more valuable than any rise in the rate of pay is likely to be, because the sympathy of many members is far more with the officers than with the rank and file of the Metropolitan Police force that this question has been pressed to the front. We have had from the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) a speech, so admirable, that if I had not totally disagreed with it from beginning to end I should have been forced to say it was one of the best speeches I have ever listened to in this House. I know he will allow me to thank him while criticising that speech in a courteous spirit for the very able argument he has laid down for us who are called Socialists, who are a much larger body in the country than in the House of Commons, and for our lines of procedure on future occasions. I do not think any argument advanced by the hon. Member for Sunderland would be rejected by those of us who hold more advanced opinions than he does of me, were I in a position to propose a pension scheme for men engaged in far more arduous occupations than police constables. There was a remark or two that fell from the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. Atherley-Jones) which I feel, in duty to myself and my constituents, I cannot allow to pass without a word. That hon. Member represents a constituency composed almost entirely of Trade Unionists, men occupied in the most arduous labour, and yet knowing that he represents men who hold opinions the very opposite to those he has expressed here, the hon. Member has had the audacity—I can use no other word—to lay down a theory which, if carried out in legislative sanction, would reduce his constituents to a condition very little better than absolute slavery. It is, I regret, too true that the Government could find thousands of men at any moment to replace the Metropolitan Police force; but this is because wages are so low generally, and I therefore hail with considerable satisfaction the proposition of the Government, which will undoubtedly tend to one thing, that is, to raise the social condition, the rate of wages, the condition of life of the Metropolitan Police. Personally, while not attaching so much importance to a scheme of superannuation as to the question of an increase in wages, I shall cordially support the proposal of the Government, because I think it opens a door, if only to a small extent, whereby the police force, as working men, may participate in the undoubtedly improved prospects enjoyed by the rest of the working-classes in the Kingdom.

(11.10.)* MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I think that with the exception of the right hon. Gentlemen the Member for Derby and the hon. Member for Durham, we agree that the claims of the Metropolitan Police should be treated separately from those of the provincial police. Nothing in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) astonished me more than that, with his experience, he should claim for the rural ogbery Dr the same treatment as for the Metropolitan Police. The duties are very different; there is no analogy in the conditions of service. As a Metropolitan Member, I thank the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) for excepting the Metropolitan Police from the scope of his objections to the Bill. Now as to the question what is to be done with the Bill when it passes second reading, there seem to be three courses open: to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, or a Grand Committee, or to discuss it in Committee of the whole House. There is much to be said for a Select Committee, and it would enable the police to state their own case. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir W. Harcourt) says we ought to take our information from the Government, but I am not quite sure that the Government on this subject is anything else than a conduit-pipe for the views of the superior officers of the police. I am afraid in this matter the Government represent the opinion, not of the rank and file of the force, but of the superior officers, and if only as giving the rank and file the opportunity of expressing their views there is much to be said in favour of a Select Committee. But there is an insuperable objection, I think, to a Select Committee that quite outweighs the advantages, it being agreed that expedition is desirable; if the Bill is referred to a Select Committee it has afterwards to pass through a Committee of the whole House, two Committee stages, in fact, and, to my mind, this is an insuperable objection. Then the Bill might be referred to a Grand Committee, but I would point out that the Grand Committee sits only twice a week from twelve o'clock to three, that it does not continue while the House is sitting. So on the whole, and with the view of expediting the Bill, quite the best thing we can do is to pass the Bill through Committee of the whole House. With regard to the scale of pensions, the two-thirds rate or three-fifths rate, those of us who represent London constituencies are in rather a tight place; we are "between the devil and the deep sea," between the ratepayers on the one hand and an army of 15,000 gentlemen in blue on the other. We could be happy with either "were t'other fair charmer away," but it requires some diplomacy to be happy with both. So far as I can see, the feeling of the ratepayers is, "The police are guardians of our homes and property, therefore let the police be contented and well paid, even though the heavens should fall or the rates rise." I think the ordinary ratepayer would rather spend a little more in securing the contentment and happiness of the Police Force, and a little less in ministering to the reckless ambition of the School Board and County Council. It is quite true that a Select Committee sat in 1877, and reported distinctly against the two-thirds scale of pensions after 25 years' service, and in favour of the three-fifths scale proposed in the Bill, but I think it ought not to be forgotten that the conditions of 1877 were very different to those of 1890. 1887 was the pre-procession era. Since 1877 we have had the growth of these monster demonstrations and processions, which have added enormously to the work of the police. I hope it may be possible in Committee to arrange a scale that will give the men two-thirds pensions after 25 years' service. I know it is a matter of some difficulty, but I think it may be arranged in Committee, and I hope it may be done. I quite agree that party capital should not be attempted to be made out of the condition of a great branch of the Public Service, and I am happy to observe that no one has attempted it, for it is a dangerous practice. I trust we shall do our best to see justice done to the police,—a body of men whom it is superfluous to praise, but whom it is necessary to pay with reference to the rising scale of wages in other occupations.

(11.18). SIR G. CAMPBELL: I never liked the Bill, and after hearing the speeches of the Home Secretary and the Under Secretary I hate it. The Secretary of State made a strong case in favour of the Bill, but still as if he did not like it; the Under Secretary spoke, con amore, as if he did like it. I have heard the provisions of the Bill ably discussed, but I think the principle is objectionable, and I mean to vote against it. At the same time, I cannot agree with the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey), and I do think it desirable in the interest of the public service that there should be a just and reasonable system for establishing a superannuation fund, but on a fair principle, not the principle upon which this Bill is founded. The Times the other day quoted me as having said at the end of the debate that "the Home Secretary, of all people in the world, had entered on a mad career of excessive and extravagant superannuation." Now, I did not mean that as a mere figure of speech; I meant it sincerely, and my impression has been confirmed. The right hon. Gentleman has told us he has reason to believe that the superannuation of the Metropolitan Police will mount up to £400,000, and in Scotland to £120,000. That means 40 per cent. of the cost of the pay of the efficient police, the cost of the police in Scotland being £500,000, and I say this is a grossly extravagant proposal to force upon the country. The Home Secretary has not repeated the figures he gave us the other night; perhaps he does not want to alarm us, and waits to get the Bill passed; but he did, in vague and indefinite terms, give vent to an alarming prediction, although he did not give us the actual figures. We had the figures put before us the other night to show that in counties and boroughs in England, where we have police superannuation in existence managed by local authorities, there is nothing like this extravagant expenditure. If these local bodies have been enabled to manage their affairs without objection at a moderate cost, why should the Home Secretary, by this compulsory Bill, impose upon them this enormously excessive scheme? I object to the principle which appears in the very first words of the Bill, that every constable shall be entitled to this advantage even though he does not provide a medical certificate and though local authorities do submit it. This is the principle in the preamble, and this I oppose. It seems to me the Bill has for its object the creation of that great evil, a vested interest, a right of every policeman to a pension. I think that a pension ought to be a reward for services willingly given by local authorities to their servants, and not a vested interest to be enforced by courts of law. We have heard much of vested interests lately, and the Government have been forced to give up their project for creating a vested interest for another class. There are policemen who have never paid into a superannuation fund, have never contracted for it in their conditions of service, and have no right to it, and yet, the day after this Bill passes, they will have a right to to enforce their vested interest in the system created. We are somewhat sensitive on this subject in Scotland, we have had examples of the evil of creating vested interests, we had an example in the vested rights of schoolmasters, and I appeal to any Scotch Member whether this system of vested rights does not stick in the nostrils of every Scotch Member, and, I may say, every Scotchman. Under this Bill a local authority can get rid of a non-efficient policeman only by the payment of an exorbitant pension. The Bill goes so far as to declare that if a policeman is dismissed for the gravest fault, or for drunkenness and non-efficiency, forthwith he may claim a large pension. I totally object to these rights. In my view the object of a superannuation fund should not be to confer vested rights, but that old servants should not be turned adrift without provision, that the authorities may get rid of an old servant in the public interest, but that he should not be turned out to starve. I protest against going beyond that with a system that gives a man not exhausted, not invalidated, but in the prime of life, the right to leave the service with a large pension. It would not be so bad if there were a high limit of age, but here is an entirely new departure, and no age limit being fixed, a man may retire in the prime of his powers. Employers of labour, of course, will be glad to get such men, and there will be many such, for, as we have heard that under the régime of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby very young men entered the service. I know I am an instance of one who retired from active service after twenty-five years, with an annuity, but that was service in India, and, under then existing circumstances, service a good deal harder than any in the Metropolitan Police. It was among the conditions offered to induce men to serve in India, but even then I admit it is injurious to the service to permit men to retire at a comparatively early age. I remember once being in conversation with an eminent native counsel, and he said, "I can understand your administration in India is wise and good, but one thing I cannot understand, and that is when men have arrived at a period of service when their experience is most valuable you pension them off at a comparatively early age." What proved an inconvenience in India will, no doubt, become an abuse in London, and the result will be that you will get rid of the cream of your Force and be left with the dross. You will have a bad bargain; you will have an emasculated Police Force. Possibly, if this new arrangement were to be applied to the men only, there might be something said in its favour, for no doubt many of the constables are pretty well done for after they have served 25 years; but, unfortunately, it will equally apply to the officers, who are combining to extort from the Government and the country these excessive pensions. I think they should be strenuously resisted. The Home Secretary not only proposes to concede as much as the City Police get, but a great deal more, for the City pensions are given upon the average pay of the whole period of service, and that is a different thing to a pension given on the highest pay drawn. This is a most extravagant proposal. Again, the officers are not the men who get worn out with night duty and by exposure to all kinds of inclement weather. These proposed pensions are greatly in excess of what are paid to other classes of civil servants. I am in favour of giving the police more liberal rates of payment; they should be paid rather over than under market rates, and then it would suffice to have a moderate superannuation fund for disabled men. But you are creating for the police extravagant vested interests which will make them your masters instead of your servants. I dislike the compulsory power of this Bill; I object to the local authorities being forced to superannuate their police on a given scale whether they like it or not. I hope the Bill be largely modified in Committee.

*(11.37.) MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): I do not wish to interpose many minutes between the House and the division, but I think it desirable that some member of the Government should get up and tell us frankly to what committee it is intended to refer this Bill when the second reading has been obtained. The right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Derby, has strongly urged them to reconsider the decision to refer it to a Select Committee, and to send it before a Committee of the whole House, seeing it is of vital importance. It is a complete innovation of Parliamentary practice, because it proposes to pension or superannuate workmen not directly in the employ of the State. That is a very dangerous principle indeed, but now that it has been made by the Constitutional party I suppose it is the proper thing to do. The Government are sowing the wind, and they will reap the whirlwind. I cannot forget that there is another Bill before the House in charge of a private Member which extends the same principle in the direction of giving pensions to miners in Scotland, but this indicates the nature of the proposals in the wind at the present time. I think the importance of this proposal is so great that we should have some expression of opinion from the Government as to what kind of Committee they are going to have.

*(11.40.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I have no hesitation in replying to the challenge of the hon. Member. The Government believed that the proposal to refer the Bill to a Select Committee was desired by all parties in the House, as it had been urged from the opposite bench, and by hon. Members interested in the question. All that the Government desire is that the question shall be carefully and thoroughly examined. The debate has shown that on the whole it would not be desirable to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. The Government therefore propose to place the Committee on Tuesday, and consider whether it will be better that the Committee should be taken in the whole House, or whether there should be a reference to a Standing Committee. The House will have an opportunity of considering that question. The Government have not decided it in their own mind, and leave it open. I hope now that the House will be prepared to give a verdict on the motion of the hon. Member for Sunderland and allow the Bill to be read a second time. I believe that the matter is one which ought to be dealt with in the words of the right hon. gentleman opposite as rapidly as is consistent with full consideration of all the important questions involved in it.

(11.42.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I hope that the House will allow the Bill to be read a second time. With all respect to the hon. Member for Sunderland, there is a general feeling that there should be a measure of superannuation, and if that is so I think the sooner we can get into Committee the better. I agree with the hon. Member for Ripon that a Committee of the whole House would be much better than a Standing Committee. I hope that the Government will come to that conclusion, and I am glad that they have abandoned the idea for a Select Committee. I think that there should be discussion in Committee as to how far latitude is to be given to the Local Authorities in the provinces as to this question of pensions.

Main Question again proposed.

(11.58.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I rise, Mr. Speaker, to say—

MR. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question, "That the Question be now put," put, and agreed to.

Main Question put accordingly, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and Committed for Tuesday next.

POLICE (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 353.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): Before a day is fixed for the Committee stage of this Bill I think the House ought to have from the Government some information as to the total cost of the scheme and the liability of the rates of Scotland under it. I speak as one of those who just now voted with the Government, and I hope the Government will deem it right to lay on the Table an explanatory statement, as was done in the case of the English Police Bill, showing how the question stands in the respects I have mentioned.

MR. W. H. SMITH: In answer to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Lanark, I have only to say that the Government do not think it desirable at the present moment to furnish a full explanation on the points referred to. They think it will be far better that the information desired by the hon. Gentleman should be obtained by means of the Select Committee, to whom the Bill will be referred than that it should be now communicated to the House.

Second reading deferred till Monday next.

CUSTOMS CONSOLIDATION ACT (1876), AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 247.)

Read the third time, and passed.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE (PROCEDURE BILL).—(No. 245.)

Bill considered in Committee, and reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next.

PARLIAMENTARY VOTERS (REGISTRATION) BILL.—(No. .)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I am about to move that the Order for the Second Reading of this Bill be discharged and the Bill withdrawn, but in doing so I wish to say that many hon. Members on this side of the House, and I believe on the other side also, think that the Government ought to take this question into consideration, as it seriously affects every Member of this House. I now beg to move that the Order for the Second Reading of the Bill be discharged, and the Bill withdrawn.

Order for Second Reading of Bill discharged.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 30th June, 1890.

CLERGY DISCIPLINE (IMMORALITY)
BILL.—(No. 134.)

*THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, I had hoped until lately that a place might be found for a Clergy Discipline Bill, affecting cases of immorality only, and I believed it was right not to lose the least chance of legislating on the subject, partly because the clergy themselves, in their Convocation, as well as other authorities, have long asked for fresh legislation. I, therefore, asked your Lordships to give a First Reading to a Bill upon the subject; but it is now clear that, through press of business, there is no hope of passing the Bill, nor would it be right, in the present condition of business, to ask for facilities to be given in another place. The scope of the Bill, my Lords, is the same as of that which passed your Lordships' House upon a former occasion without a Division; but since that time it has had the further advantage of being further revised by some eminent Members of your Lordships' House and other persons, with a view to improving it, and meeting objections which have been made to it in this House, upon certain points of procedure, and also to remove anything which might bear upon any other subject than that of immoral conduct. I must say that I greatly regret the opportunity has passed of passing legislation for much-needed reforms; but, for reasons which I hope will commend themselves to your Lordships, it is thought better not to proceed in this House with the Bill at a time when it is certain not to go forward or make any progress in the other House, because that would put your Lordships to the inconvenience, after having read and, I hope, passed the Bill a second time, of having it brought before your Lordships yet a third time. So, by your Lordships' leave, I will move at once to withdraw the Bill. At the same time I am very glad it is in your Lordships' hands, and open to criticism; and, with your Lordships' permission, I should like to state that I hope to bring it in at the very earliest opportunity next Session.

Bill (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 152.)

Read 1^a, and to be printed.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES.

Moved, that the Lord Foxford (E. Limerick) do take the Chair in the absence of the Earl of Morley (The Marquess of Salisbury); agreed to.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (BOROUGH OF BELFAST BILL.—(No. 91.)

House in Committee (according to order): An Amendment made: The Report thereof to be received To-morrow.

ANGLESEY ASSIZES AND QUARTER SESSIONS BILL.—(No. 125.)

House in Committee (according to order); Bill reported without Amendment); and to be read 3^a To-morrow.

TRUSTEES APPOINTMENT BILL.
(No. 84.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Bill read 3^a (according to order).

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, my attention has been called by my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack to the fact that some exception has been taken by the Charity Commissioners to the form in which the Bill at present stands, so far as it extends to persons associated together for religious purposes. I propose, in order to meet that objection, to leave out in the first clause, at line 10, the words "or for the promotion of education." It will not affect the substance or framework of the Bill at all.

Amendment made.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

THE CESSION OF HELIGOLAND.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY, in rising to ask (1.) If Her Majesty's Government will be prepared, in the event of the cession of Heligoland being carried out, to give facilities to such of the natives as may wish to remain subjects of the British Crown to settle in other portions of the British Empire (2.) whether it be true, as reported in a recent telegram, that the right of fortifying the island is to be subjected to restrictions, said: My Lords, I do not wish to add many remarks to the question which is on the Paper, and, indeed, the second of the questions has been, I think, answered in another place since I gave notice of them; but to the first question I attach rather more importance than the noble Marquess, I think, is inclined to do. When I asked him the other day as to whether the wishes of the people of Heligoland had been at all consulted in reference to this cession of territory, the noble Marquess replied that the plébiscite was rather alien to the customs of this country. But the cession of territory is also alien to the customs of this country, and I confess I think it a grave matter that we should absolutely hand over a population which seems, as far as we can judge, perfectly loyal to the British Crown, without at least giving them the option of settling in some other parts of Her Majesty's dominions; of course, I mean at the public expense. There is, I believe, a large sum of money of Imperial taxation for which Her Majesty's Government are now endeavouring to find employment; and the consideration might possibly enter among the alternative schemes whether it might not be an advisable method of treatment for that sum to apply it in aiding the Heligolandians to settle elsewhere. I do not know whether they have destined that sum to a different employment; but, whether that be so or not, I do hope that Her Majesty's Government will consider carefully the wishes of these people. They are said to tend only in one direction, and I think it would be a slur upon the diplomacy of the noble Marquess if he found that he had handed over a reluctant population to a foreign sway. My Lords, may I say one more word with regard to the system of putting Questions in this House, which I am obliged to pursue, in order to obtain information in this matter? I have urged upon the noble Marquess very strongly the importance of making a full statement to the House in reference to these negotiations. The

The Earl of Rosebery

Questions I ask are asked in no hostile spirit. They are asked simply for information, and I must say that at this moment we stand greatly in want of it, as to the nature of this Agreement. I am not in the least disposed to impugn it. I have always considered that the person who is in charge of the Foreign Office must necessarily know much more of the considerations which lead him to his policy than can possibly be known to the world outside. But with all that conceded, I think there is something gained by taking Parliament, as far as possible, into your confidence, in a matter of so much importance. I must say that my Questions have elucidated certain points, and the most important of them is this. The noble Marquess's Despatch speaks of the Sultanate of Zanzibar as being part of the consideration which we are to receive for the cession of Heligoland. It is the Sultanate of Zanzibar that is to be received; but we have ascertained that it is not the Sultanate of Zanzibar as we left it when we went out of office in 1886. It is the Sultanate of Zanzibar as partitioned out by the Agreement of October, 1886, after the noble Marquess came into office. Therefore, the Sultanate of Zanzibar is not now as we left it, a group of islands with one principal island, with a long stretch of coast on the mainland opposite to it; it is simply the Island of Zanzibar and the Island of Pemba, without any additional islands and without any of the mainland opposite to that island. Well, that is light thrown on the Agreement; and I am afraid that until the noble Marquess sees his way to promise us either Papers, or to make a fuller statement on the subject, we must persevere, by the tiresome, detailed process of interrogation, in endeavours to obtain information as to the exact nature of the Agreement he has made.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, I will first answer the Questions of the noble Earl. I am not aware that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has any funds to dispose of for the purpose of settling Heligolandians in various parts of the Empire. I have received no intimation from the island, or from the people, that such a measure would be in conformity with their wishes. I have received no intimation that there is any discontent on their part with what is being done; and I believe that every effort which it is possible to make will be made by the German Government, and that every security will be taken in the Convention for the protection of their interests. We have done our best to ascertain what their wishes were, though not by the method of a plébiscite, which seems to commend itself so much to the mind of the noble Earl.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: It was the noble Marquess who mentioned the plébiscite, not I.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: It may, perhaps, have occurred to the noble Earl that a plébiscite might be an awkward precedent as applied to other parts of the Empire. With respect to the other question, I think the noble Earl is aware that it answers itself—of course, we have never suggested any limitation to the power of the German Government to fortify the island if they please. I quite recognise that the noble Earl and his friends have acted with great consideration in reference to all these affairs, and I am also willing to concede that full information is due to them; but I think it is a rule that has always been observed in the Foreign Office, and a very valuable rule, that discussions should not take place until negotiations of this kind are concluded. We thought it desirable to issue a Despatch for the purpose of stating what our general intentions were; because such matters as these become subjects of discussion and of public comment, and strange and distorted accounts of them are apt to get before the public eye. Undoubtedly, as soon as the Convention is signed it will be our duty to lay it upon the Table; and it will be our duty to introduce a Bill for the purpose of giving effect to its provisions, and of dissipating any doubts there may be as to the power of the Crown in respect to Heligoland. Upon that occasion I will do my best to give all the information to the House I have in my power to communicate, and to explain at length the whole of the motives that have guided our policy. The noble Earl interjected some statements into his comments which I can hardly pass without something of a protest. It is not true that the Sultanate of Zanzibar on the mainland was unimpaired when the noble Earl left office in 1886. Very large slices, indeed, had been taken out of it before that date; and although it is perfectly true that the last Agreement defining the spheres of influence was signed by Lord Iddesleigh about six weeks after he came into office, I do not think that on examination it will be found that any diminution of the prestige or the power of the Sultan of Zanzibar can be laid at our door. When we left office, as far as my impression goes, it was acknowledged that the actual extent of those dominions of the Sultan of Zanzibar was limited to 10 miles stretch of coast. That 10 miles stretch of coast remains with the Sultan of Zanzibar, though he has a tenant for it in the shape of the German Empire, and that tenant, perhaps, stands in relations to him which are more according to the fashion and custom in the Sister Isle than in England. But, as the noble Earl will have noticed, it is agreed that we are to press upon the Sultan of Zanzibar that we are to take the course which I believe is the only sensible plan, that is, to turn this nominal occupation into real dominion, the Sultan taking an equitable consideration for the revenues which he sacrifices. That, however, is a matter for the future. For the present the answer which I have to give to the noble Lord is that I have great hopes that the Convention will be signed in a few days; and as soon as that is done we shall lose no time in laying it on the Table, and introducing a Bill, so as to enable the House to thoroughly discuss all its provisions.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, after what has been stated by the noble Marquess I certainly do not rise to inaugurate a premature discussion upon this important question, further than to say with regard to that answer that we reserve to ourselves full liberty to discuss the question in all its bearings, when the Bill to which he has referred comes before your Lordships' House. The only thing I think I may be allowed to say at present is that I do not think the answer to the first Question put by the noble Earl was perfectly satisfactory. The noble Marquess stated that he has ascertained the opinions of the population, but he did not tell us in what way.

He also argued—based rather on the technical ground that this small population with no organisation whatever had made no specific representations to him—that they were satisfied with what was about to be done. I do not think that answer is satisfactory. There is a very strong feeling existing that the population of Heligoland are averse to this cession; and I think it would be well if the noble Marquess, when the Bill is introduced, is able to show that he has really taken every pains to ascertain what the opinion of the population is.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: Would the noble Marquess object to state what the means were which he took to ascertain the feeling of the population?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Obviously they were means of a confidential character, and, therefore, it is not possible for me to discuss them.

EARL GRANVILLE: Confidential with the population, does the noble Marquess mean?

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 30th June, 1890.

QUESTIONS.

IRELAND—"SHADOWING."

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he can state the number of persons "shadowed" and the number "watched" in Ireland for each or any of the three weeks ending 21st June?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): In answer to the question, I have to say that the number of persons in Ireland who are now permanently watched by the police in the manner which I presume is indicated by the word "shadowed" is, in all, 12. This applies to the whole of Ireland, and I must respectfully decline to give information with reference to any particular locality. As regards those who may be so watched on particular occasions or at particular times and places, it would be difficult and, on the whole, inexpedient in the public interests to attempt to make any detailed statement.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Is there a category of persons casually "shadowed"?

MR. MADDEN: The hon. Member must know that certain persons are observed by the police at particular times and places.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): Are there not more than 12 persons who are being "shadowed" in Tipperary alone?

MR. MADDEN: No, Sir; not permanently watched.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): Will the right hon. Gentleman give the names of those who are "shadowed"?

MR. MADDEN: No, Sir. That would defeat the object for which the observation is carried on.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether any instructions have been issued to the Royal Irish Constabulary during the past 12 months respecting their action in relation to public meetings, evictions, the watching or "shadowing" of persons, and boycotting; and, if so, whether he will lay copies of such instructions upon the Table?

MR. MADDEN: Instructions of the nature in question have been issued. But it would be contrary to the invariable practice of every Government to lay copies of them upon the Table or otherwise publish them. Such a course would be highly inexpedient in the public interest.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. John Cullinan, of Bansha, County Tipperary, was summoned by Sheriff's order to attend as a juror at the Quarter Sessions held at Clonmel on the 23rd instant, and, on attending, was followed all day by Constable Gurry, who went into the Court when Mr. Cullinan entered it, and left it when he left, and travelled back by the same train, always keeping him under surveillance; and whether, inasmuch as Mr. Cullinan was obliged to answer the summons as a juror under a penalty of £50, he will explain how it happened that he was shadowed by the police while obeying the summons of a Court of Justice?

*MR. MADDEN: The circumstances under which Mr. Cullinan went to Clonmel were not known.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: As Clonmel is more than 20 miles from Tipperary, where Mr. Cullinan was charged with boycotting, was it necessary to persecute him while he was engaged in the performance of his duty?

*MR. MADDEN: I have stated that the Police Authorities were not aware that Mr. Cullinan went to Clonmel in order to act as a juror.

MR. SEXTON: Is this one of the 12 persons who are permanently shadowed wherever they go and whatever they do?

*MR. MADDEN: The only further information in my possession as to Mr. Cullinan is that in 1881 he was imprisoned under the Protection of Person and Property Act; in July, 1888, he was imprisoned for unlawfully inciting to crime, and last year he was imprisoned in default of bail.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Is it not the fact that on the last occasion the Magistrates declared that they could not find Mr. Cullinan guilty of the charge made against him?

*MR. MADDEN: I am not aware.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): Does the Chief Secretary propose to shadow everybody who was imprisoned in 1881?

No reply was made.

DOG LICENCES.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether, on the 20th of May last, Mr. T. W. French, R.M., sitting at Tullock Petty Sessions, fined Mr. Joseph Riley for having a dog without a licence, and compelled him to take out a licence; whether it has since been proved to the satisfaction of the police that the dog belonged to a Mr. M'Aloon, and was licensed; and if the expenses incurred by Mr. Riley will be refunded to him?

MR. MADDEN: I am informed that Mr. Joseph Riley was fined 1s. and ordered to take out a licence for the dog. He produced no evidence in Court to the effect that the dog belonged to Mr.

M'Aloon, and was licensed at the time; nor has anything since transpired to lead the police to believe that his contention is well-founded.

ATTACK UPON AN IRISH LADY

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he has seen a paragraph in the Scotsman of the 25th instant, in which the following passage occurs:—

"One day, recently, Miss Holmes, daughter of Rev. Mr. Holmes, Presbyterian minister, at Tipperary, was returning home to the manse after doing some shopping, when she was attacked by a brutal crowd and horribly cut about the head"; and whether the police have made any Report on the matter?

MR. MADDEN: The Constabulary Authorities report that the daughter of the rev. gentleman mentioned was, while on her way home, after purchasing some goods at a boycotted shop at Tipperary, attacked by some people, and stones thrown at her, striking her on the back. So far as the police are aware, her head was not injured.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Did the molestation consist of this: that on returning from a boycotted shop, this lady was remonstrated with by two girls for having dealt at that shop; that when the young lady threatened them with the police, the girls stated that they did not care; that next day, when she was accompanied by policemen, some children and girls attacked the police, when it was stated that the attack might be misinterpreted; and that since that time Mr. Holmes and his daughter had walked the streets of Tipperary every day without molestation or interference?

MR. MADDEN: My information does not bear out the information laid before the hon. Member.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I will repeat the question.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: May I ask whether, in view of this practice of remonstrating with people who have a right to purchase where they like, adequate protection will be given to persons like Miss Holmes?

MR. MADDEN: Certainly.

THE CRIMES ACT.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to a case which came on appeal before County Court Judge Richards at Swinford, County Mayo, on 16th June, in which the County Court Judge is reported to have stated that—"It was purely a decree for shop goods; and I do not find that there is any disposition on the part of the jurors of this country to refuse to convict for rescue if a proper case be established. On the contrary, as many of the jurors are shopkeepers, they would rather be inclined to go against a person charged with rescue than in his favour. Under these circumstances, why the Constitutional Law is not resorted to I find it really impossible to make out;"

and to the statement of Mr. Mannion, solicitor for defendants, in reply—

"That the District Inspector intended to take proceedings under the ordinary law; but I understand that, by instructions from headquarters, he was directed to proceed under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act;" who is the person at headquarters responsible for this conduct; and under what head will this case appear in the Returns?

MR. MADDEN: I am informed that the statements in the question as to what occurred before the learned County Court Judge are correct. The statement, however, attributed to the solicitor for the defendants, is not correct. The prosecution was instituted by direction of the Divisional Commissioner, and not in consequence of instructions from headquarters. In answer to the last paragraph of the question, I have to say that the case will not appear in the Returns referred to.

CASE OF MR. J. LYONS AND OTHERS.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that, in the case of Mr. John Lyons, a merchant of Portumna, and three other men, who are at present undergoing a sentence of two months' imprisonment with hard labour, on the charge of intimidating James Mitchel, Mitchel, when produced as a witness by the Crown, swore that he did not know any of the defendants, that they had never intimidated him, or attempted to do so, and that they had never, in any way, attempted to induce him not to buy Dillon's hay; and if he will consider the advisability of releasing them from prison?

*MR. MADDEN: I must refer the hon. Member to the answer already given by my right hon. Friend the Chief

Mr. J. F. X. O'Brien

Secretary. The case did not depend on the evidence of any single witness, and it was fully re-heard on appeal when the conviction was affirmed by the County Court Judge. It is, of course, open to the prisoners or any person on their behalf to petition the Lord Lieutenant for their release, but the Chief Secretary sees no reason to suggest such a course.

MR. ROCHE: As the question is practically unanswered I beg to give notice that I will repeat it.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether the sums entered as "Allowances" under Sub-head D of Vote 19, Class III., Civil Service Estimates, are in addition to the salaries entered under "Pay," under Sub-head C of the same Vote, to the County and District Inspectors of the Royal Irish Constabulary?

*MR. MADDEN: Yes, Sir.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland in what manner (whether by examination, length of service, or any other method), appointments are made to the positions in the Royal Irish Constabulary of County Inspectors, District Inspectors of each class, head constables and sergeants; and whether there are any maximum or minimum limits of age in each of these ranks; and, if so, what are they?

*MR. MADDEN: I beg to refer the hon. Member to my reply to a similar question put by the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division of Nottingham (Mr. J. E. Ellis), on the 25th July last, which will be found fully reported in Hansard.

CASE OF SERGEANT LORD.

MR. PATRICK JOSEPH O'BRIEN (Tipperary, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland, with reference to allegations relative to the charges of forgery and fraud made against Sergeant Lord, of Lorrha, County Tipperary, he will state what action is to be taken in the matter; whether, in addition to the presumptive evidence afforded as to the money being due to the complainant Maher by the offer of payment to him by Mr. Doolan, J.P., there is evidence that Lord himself subsequently came to Maher begging to have the charge withdrawn, and tendering payment, and also sent Constable Edwards, of Carrigahorig, to the complainant with the same object, he will take into account that a fraud has been committed on the Police Authorities, and money obtained by the presentation of a forged voucher; and whether, in the interests of justice, the Government will direct the Attorney General to consider the case?

*MR. MADDEN: There was no presumptive evidence in this case except a statement which, having regard to former proceedings, cannot be accepted as trustworthy. The police have been engaged in prosecuting an inquiry, but they have as yet found nothing to bring under the notice of the Government.

MR. SEXTON: Is there any objection to put to Maher the simple question, whether he signed the voucher or not?

*MR. MADDEN: I am sure that the Constabulary Authorities will take every proper step.

CHARGE AGAINST SERGEANT JERVIS.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether any report has been made by the police officer of Gorey district to the Police Authorities in Dublin Castle against Police Sergeant Jervis, of Gorey, for drunkenness in the public streets in January last; if so, what action has been taken by the authorities in reference to the charge?

*MR. MADDEN: The Constabulary Authorities, assuming that this question relates to the case of Sergeant Ferris, report that, in accordance with the rule in such cases, he received an unfavourable record.

CONDUCT OF POLICE.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he is aware that a police constable from Courtown, County Wexford, recently left with Mr. William Bolyer, tailor, of Gorey, material for a suit of plain clothes, for which he was measured; whether, subsequently, this constable was ordered by Head Constable M'Cormack, his superior officer, to cancel the order and take away the stuff; and, if so, what was the reason for the head constable giving such an order; and whether the sub-constable has cancelled the contract?

*MR. MADDEN: The Constabulary Authorities report that the head constable never gave any such order as that alleged in the question, and that he has not cancelled his contract with the tailor who has the cloth in his possession.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he is aware that on Friday, 20th June, James Redmond, victualler, and two other men were about entering the Gorey Railway Station, when a police constable named Harper ran to the entrance and knocked Redmond down, and that Redmond sustained such severe injuries that he was unable to transact business next day; if he can state what excuse the constable gives for the attack; and whether it is true that the constable has served Redmond and his companions with a summons for assault?

*MR. MADDEN: I am informed that the facts are not as stated in the first paragraph; but as the circumstances will be judicially investigated at the hearing of the summonses against Redmond and another, I must ask to be excused from making any detailed statement at present.

MR. W. REDMOND: Is it not the fact that this man was attacked simply and solely because he is a strong Nationalist?

*MR. MADDEN: My information does not enable me to answer that question.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that a flagstaff with a large green flag floating from it has been erected at the head of William O'Brien Street, Tipperary, in the same place where two flags have been recently successively torn down by the police; and why, if the police thought it wrong that the former flags should be placed there, do they permit the present flag to remain?

*MR. MADDEN: The Constabulary Authorities report that it is not the case that the flagstaff has been erected in the same place where those recently removed had been. The present staff has been erected in a field which is private property, and no obstruction to the public way has been created. It has, accordingly, not been interfered with.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that on the 19th instant, Nicholas Delany, Street Inspector of the town of Tipperary was pushed off the footpath by Sub-Constable Earl, who said, in reply to Delany's remonstrance, "I do not give a damn what you are," and afterwards, when Delany stopped to make some notes in his book, came up to him saying, "I told you before to leave the flags," when Delany was obliged to go on to the roadway; and that three hours afterwards an acting sergeant removed Delany from the street, and subsequently arrested him; whether any charge has been brought against Delany since; and have any difficulties been thrown in the way of his obtaining the name of the policeman who arrested him, with a view of a prosecution?

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): Can a policeman order any man to move on if he is not causing an obstruction or interfering with the due and proper use of the street? Suppose that I am the only person on a footpath, is a policeman at liberty to order me to move on? Have I not the right to remain there if I please?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Is it not the fact that groups of persons are in the habit of surrounding particular shops in order to boycott persons who desire to go into them?

*MR. MADDEN: No policeman has a right to interfere with any man in the street unless he is causing an obstruction; but in this case I am informed that the footpath was obstructed, and the persons obstructing it were, therefore, asked to move on.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: May I ask if there is any justification for the insinuation conveyed in the question of the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell); is it not a common practice for labourers to stand about the streets awaiting hire; and if three or four of such labourers were on the wide footpath would it constitute an obstruction in the estimation of the police and of the authorities?

*MR. MADDEN: The amount of obstruction must be judged by the Police Authorities according to the circumstances. In this case I have no information as to the amount of obstruction.

MR. STOREY: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman satisfied that in this case there was obstruction?

Mr. J. O'Connor

*MR. MADDEN: I have no means of satisfying myself as to this matter of fact. The police were in the belief that there was obstruction.

FERMANAGH DRAINAGE.

MR. W. REDMOND: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the resolutions passed at a public meeting held in Derrygonnelly, County Fermanagh, in which, after stating,

"That the occupiers of land in the valley of the Sillies River, in County Fermanagh, suffer serious loss from sudden floods year after year. That they are willing and anxious to contribute according to their means to the cost of such works of arterial drainage as would remove, or substantially diminish, the evils to which they are exposed," complaint is made of the cost of the preliminary expenses imposed on promoters and disproportionate liabilities on landlords, and the attention of Her Majesty's Government is drawn to the necessity for a general measure for promoting and assisting arterial drainage in Ireland; and whether the Government will take any steps in the direction indicated by these resolutions?

*MR. MADDEN: I am not in a position to answer the question, but inquiry will be made.

MR. JASPER TULLY.

DR. FITZGERALD (Longford, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland, in reference to the removal of Mr. Jasper Tully, editor of the Roscommon Herald, from Sligo Gaol to Tullamore Gaol, if he can state what is the usual custom in regard to the removal of a prisoner from one gaol to another; and what was the reason for the removal of Mr. Tully in this case?

*MR. MADDEN: I am informed that the usual custom is that in any case where a prisoner's connections or associations with a district are such as, in the opinion of the General Prisons Board, to be calculated to interfere with the due maintenance of discipline in the local prison, his transfer to another prison is made. On this general principle the transfer of Mr. Jasper Tully from Sligo to Tullamore was carried out.

MR. DILLON: This question about the conduct of Magistrates in inflicting short sentences in order to deny to the prisoner the right of appeal has been frequently raised, and I would ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether, as responsible head of the administration of the law in Ireland, he will express an opinion to the Magistrates that they ought not, in cases of a political complexion, to deprive prisoners of the right of appeal?

*MR. MADDEN: I should be going entirely beyond my duty if I expressed such an opinion.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the applications for increases of sentences are usually opposed by the Crown?

*MR. MADDEN: No, I am not aware of any such usual course.

MR. MAC NEILL: Then I am.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Act was obtained on the express understanding that an appeal should be allowed in every case?

*MR. MADDEN: No.

GLENHEST.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if in April last he received a largely signed Memorial from the inhabitants of Glenhest, Newport, County Mayo, asking that a post office should be established in that district; stating that as many as 160 families would be benefited by the proposed post office, the nearest existing one at present being at Newport, which is five miles away from Glenhest; and if the Postmaster General can now say if he has favourably considered the Memorial addressed to him?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The subject to which the hon. Member refers has been carefully considered, but it appears that there are only eight or nine letters a day for Glenhest and the neighbourhood, and I regret that the establishment of a post office, as desired, would entail expense quite disproportionate to the Revenue from these letters. Indeed, the postal service to Newport, where the Glenhest letters are called for, already exceeds the entire Revenue.

BELFAST POST OFFICE.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General, with reference to his assurance that length of service would be considered in promotions in the Telegraph Department of the Belfast Post Office, what were the actual periods of service of the officials recently promoted; how many clerks were senior to the promoted clerks in point of service; can he state whether they had satisfactorily discharged their duties, what are their respective periods of service, and why they were passed over; and whether their length of service will constitute an effective claim in case of future promotions in the Department?

*MR. RAIKES: The service of the telegraphists recently promoted at Belfast ranges from eight to 20 years. For promotion from the first class of telegraphists to the class of clerks the number passed over was three; and for promotion from the second to the first class of telegraphists the number passed over was seven. Speaking generally, they had discharged their duties satisfactorily; but these duties were not the duties which they would have had to discharge if promoted, and I was assured that for any higher duties they are not qualified. It was on this account that I felt constrained to pass them over. Their service ranges from 11 to 33 years. Length of service, great as is the weight I attach to it, is not alone a sufficient reason for promotion where the necessary qualifications are wanting. All, therefore, that I can say is that if the officers who have now been passed over should qualify themselves for the higher duties, it will give me great pleasure to promote them as opportunity offers.

POSTAL ACCOMMODATION AT BERKHAMPTSTEAD.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to the want of post office accommodation at Berkhampstead; and whether he will take the necessary steps to meet the growing requirements of that town?

*MR. RAIKES: My attention has been called to the need for a better post office at Berkhampstead, and, the postmaster-ship being vacant, inquiries are now being made with a view to the appointment of some suitable person who is in a position to provide adequate and convenient accommodation for the duties.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES' CIRCULARS.

MR. FELL PEASE (York, N.R., Cleveland): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if Friendly Societies' circulars to their members, reminding them of arrears of subscriptions, which must necessarily vary as to the amounts therein stated as due, are properly considered as being of "the nature of a letter," and consequently liable to 1d. postage; and, if so, will he propose an alteration in the regulations, which will enable such circulars to go for one $\frac{1}{2}$ d. through the post?

*MR. RAIKES: This question has been repeatedly asked and answered during the present Parliament. All circulars are letters, but they are letters which, being sent in identical terms to a number of persons at the same time, are permitted to pass at the book rate of postage. Alterations in the existing regulations have been suggested which would meet the case of the Friendly Societies' notices, and I am at the present time in correspondence with the Treasury upon the subject.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): Will the alteration apply to Trade Societies as well as to Friendly Societies?

*MR. RAIKES: I do not think I ought to anticipate any particulars of a statement I may have to make. But I hope I may be able to do so in a few days.

BETTING TELEGRAMS.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, although by virtue of the 37 Vic. c. 15, the sending of a telegram with the view of obtaining information or advice with respect to any event or contingency of, or relating to, any horse race, or other race, for the purpose of any bet or wager, is an offence punishable by imprisonment with hard labour for any term not exceeding two calendar months, many such telegrams, the illegal character of which is apparent on the face of them, are daily sent through the Post Office; and whether he will give directions that such illegal telegrams should be stopped?

*MR. RAIKES: The Act 37 Vic. c. 15, does not make punishable the sending of a telegram with a view of obtaining information or advice with respect to a horse race for the purpose of a bet or wager. What it makes punishable is a telegram published with intent to induce any person to apply to a person or to a house or place with a view of obtaining information or advice for the purpose of a bet or wager, or with respect to a horse race or similar contingency. The illegality consists practically in the invitation to bet, or to apply for information with a view to betting, not in the seeking of information or in the betting itself. I am referring, of course, to Section 3 of the 37th Vic. c. 15.

LUNACY.

MR. RANKIN (Hereford, Leominster): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is usual that near relatives of persons found lunatic by inquisition should be appointed acting Committees, whose reversionary interest in the lunatic's property may give rise to antagonistic motives and family differences prejudicially affecting the recovery and welfare of the lunatic and his chance of procuring a super-seedeas; and whether a Return of the numbers of any such cases at present existing under the control of the Lunacy Commissioners can be made to this House?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the Lord Chancellor that it is frequently the case that near relatives of persons found lunatic by inquisition are appointed acting Committees; they are in most cases the best appointments that can be made, and not seldom the only possible Committees. The Masters in Lunacy, and the Judges who exercise jurisdiction in such matters, are well aware of the difficulties naturally inherent in the selection of these Committees, and they are most careful in making the appointments. It would not be desirable, having regard to the delicate personal considerations involved in these cases, to make such a Return as is proposed, but if any particular case should give occasion to doubts in the mind of my hon. Friend as to the welfare of any particular person, full inquiry will at once be made.

PRISON CLERKS.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY (London-derry): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Commissioners of Prisons have made known to the clerks serving in Her Majesty's prisons the Report of the Departmental Committee appointed to inquire into their complaints?

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.) also asked whether the Departmental Committee have recommended that the prison clerks, having paid an examination fee of £3 under the Order in Council of 12th March, 1879, shall be placed upon the scale of pay carrying the maximum provided by that Order in Council?

*MR. MATTHEWS: I will answer this question and that of the hon. Member for St. Pancras at the same time. As soon as a decision has been arrived at upon the Report of the Departmental Committee, that decision will be made known to the clerks. The matter has been delayed because complicated and difficult questions arise in connection with any alteration of the status of this particular class of prison officials; but, I hope, with the concurrence of the Treasury, to arrive at a satisfactory solution. The Committee have not made any recommendation to the effect stated by the hon. Member for St. Pancras.

SENTENCES AT THE LONDON COUNTY SESSIONS.

MR. CRILLY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has seen the report in the Daily News, of the 24th instant, of the case of a man named Jones, who was tried before Mr. Warry, Q.C., at the London County Sessions, sitting at Clerkenwell, charged with stealing a purse containing 2s. 4d., and, on conviction, was sentenced by Mr. Warry to 10 years' penal servitude, and from which it appears that the prosecution failed to prove that Jones was seen to take the purse or ever had it in his possession; whether he is aware that the same Magistrate on the following day sentenced another man to 10 years' penal servitude for having stolen an overcoat; and if he will consider the advisability of remitting some portion of this sentence?

*MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Deputy Chairman that the evidence showed that there were three men engaged in the robbery, the third escaping doubtless with the purse, which has not been recovered. The woman who was robbed swore most positively that Jones and a man named Arnold were the men who stole her purse, and the Jury, without hesitation, found both prisoners guilty. The record of previous convictions showed that the prisoner Jones had for the last 18 years been an habitual thief. There were four very experienced Magistrates on the bench, and they unanimously agreed with the Chairman in thinking that 10 years' penal servitude was the proper punishment to inflict, and I see no reason for advising any interference with that decision. The Chairman has not yet placed me in possession of the facts in the case of the man who stole the overcoat. I will in due course acquaint the hon. Member with my decision in that case.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): Would the right hon. Gentleman kindly inform the House how much this man is convicted of having stolen in the course of his career, and how long he has been in prison?

*MR. MATTHEWS: He began in 1869 with eight years' penal servitude for stealing a purse. Then followed a number of other convictions, but I have not all the cases with me.

THE WEST HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS COMMISSION.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Invernesshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that much dissatisfaction has arisen, not only from the short and imperfect notices received by the people interested of the visits of the members of the West Highlands and Islands Commission during their recent inspections, but also on account of the flippant manner and hostile cross-examination indulged in when the people appeared to give evidence, or offered to do so; whether it is the fact that large public meetings, particularly in Barra and Harris, have condemned these proceedings of the Commissioners; whether any written instructions were issued to them prior to their visits; and whether he will lay a copy upon the Table of the House?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I am informed by the Commissioners that in every case they sent due notice of their visit to the places which they visited. Dependent, as they necessarily were some extent, on the weather, they could not always make their definite notices long; and in one or two cases, through the delay of postal communication, the notices did not arrive as soon as they had expected. The Commissioners, however, are not aware of any case in which this prevented their obtaining full information as to the requirements of the locality. They deny that their examination of those who came before them was conducted in either a flippant or hostile manner; but it was of course necessary, in order to arrive at the facts, to test the accuracy of the statements made. I am informed that a meeting was held in Harris, with the result stated, but I have no information as to Barra. Written instructions were given to the Commissioners on their appointment; and there is no objection to laying on the Table a copy of the instructions issued to the Commission.

SCOTCH POLICE SUPERANNUATION BILL.

MR. DONALD CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he will circulate a Memorandum explanatory of the Police Superannuation Bill for Scotland before the Second Reading is taken, as was done in the case of the English Bill, with special reference to the estimated cost of the scheme, and the probable amount of the burden on the rates?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The Bill is down for Second Reading to-night, but it will not be taken after 11 o'clock.

MALTA.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government have received any information as to the views entertained by the inhabitants of Malta with regard to the proceedings and negotiations of Sir Lintorn Simmonds at the Vatican; whether he is aware that these proceedings and negotiations have excited much angry feeling in the Island, where the proposed project of law is regarded with the greatest disfavour; and whether the proposed measure will be laid before Parliament before it is submitted to the Legislative Council of Malta?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Malta enjoys an elected Legislature, where the feelings of its inhabitants are constitutionally expressed. Her Majesty's Government are not aware that the agreement with the Vatican has excited angry feeling in the Island; but if it is not approved of by the majority it may be presumed that the Legislature will not pass the Bill, by which effect will be given to certain Articles. It would be inconsistent with the principle of responsible Colonial Government that the Imperial Parliament should review measures about to be submitted to Colonial Assemblies.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES COMMITTEE.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury what has been the cause of the delay in printing the Report of the Departmental Committee which inquired into the organisation of the office of Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies, and when the Report will be printed?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I cannot recall that any promise has been made to produce the Report of the Departmental Committee, which is receiving the careful consideration of Her Majesty's Government, and any action taken on it would come under the review of Parliament.

LOCAL TAXATION BILL.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in the appropriation of the Scottish share of the fund under the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill, he will endeavour to meet the views of the large majority of Scottish Members of all parties, and reserve a sufficient sum to free all the standards in the State-aided Schools in Scotland?

MR. SEXTON: I have also to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Government, having regard to the evidence of Irish opinion afforded by the introduction of the Agricultural Labourers (Ireland) Bill now before the House, and the proceedings upon that measure, will appropriate the unallotted balance of Ireland's share of the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties, in aid of the provision of dwellings for Irish agricultural labourers, upon the principles indicated in the Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I can only repeat that the Government are considering the whole subject; but I am not yet in a position to give any pledges.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to give notice that if any attempt is made to use Ireland's share of the money, not for local purposes, but for ordinary Imperial purposes, the proposal will be opposed.

MR. STOREY: May I ask whether among the projects of the Government is included the project of putting an end to the enhanced duty on beer and spirits?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The suggestions which the Government have received on the subject are almost as numerous as those received by the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he was about to bring in his Budget. All the suggestions are receiving the consideration of the Government. I am not able to say when I shall be able to announce the decision of the Government.

MR. SEXTON: When may I put a further question?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am unable to say at present.

INDIAN COUNCILS BILL.

MR. BRADLAUGH: To what day does the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury propose to postpone the Indian Councils Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Monday next.

SILVER COINAGE.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many silver coins there are in the Bank of England ready for circulation in addition to the 3,660,000 shillings and 3,000,000 sixpences stated to be there; if any more are being coined; whether any officials in the Mint have a pecuniary interest in the Birmingham Mint; and whether the recent Colonial order for silver and bronze was executed at Birmingham; and, if so, can he explain why?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Apart from the large number of shillings and sixpences, there is at the Bank of England at this moment not less than £178,000 worth of silver coins ready for issue, and the number of pieces cannot be less than 1,500,000, while the coinage of silver is still proceeding at the Mint. As regards the execution of Colonial orders by a private company at Birmingham, the Deputy-Master of the Mint is always most anxious that the Mint should be able to cope with any demands that may be made upon it; but the continued and excessive requirement for Imperial coin has recently obliged the Mint to refer two Colonial orders to Birmingham. Colonial orders are only placed in the hands of this private company when it is absolutely impossible for the Royal Mint to undertake them. I have heard to-day with much regret a fact which was unknown to the Deputy-Master before, that two officials of the Mint hold some shares in the Birmingham company. This ought certainly not to be.

CUSTOMS' CLERKS.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether there are retained in the Statistical Office of Her Majesty's Customs clerks of nearly 40 years' service, and between 50 and 60 years of age, who are willing to retire on the usual compensation terms; and whether, in view of the fact that the retirement of these clerks would give facilities for the promotion of meritorious redundant clerks in that office who have been waiting nearly 10 years for their promotion, and that the revision of the office has been pending for three years, during which time all promotion has been stopped, the Treasury will facilitate such a settlement of the office by consenting to the pensioning off, on suitable superannuation allowances, of those who may be willing to retire?

MR. JENNINGS (Stockport): Is it not the fact that a Royal Commission has absolutely condemned the further payment of compensation or "abolition" terms for retirement in order to secure preferment, and has urged that in future promotion should wait until vacancies occur?

MR. GOSCHEN: To the second question put by the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Jennings) I have to reply in the affirmative. In answer to the hon.

Member for Wandsworth, I may say that there are several clerks of long service and between 50 and 60 years of age in the Department, two of whom have applied for permission to retire on "compensation" terms. If the suggestion of the hon. Member that such officers should be pensioned off "on suitable superannuation terms" means the grant of "compensation" or "abolition" terms, I can only refer him to the answer I gave the other day explaining that the House had decided against "abolition" terms, and that the Royal Commission on Civil Establishments had taken the same view. The Government can, of course, only carry out this decision.

STATISTICAL DEPARTMENTS OF THE CUSTOMS.

MR. JOHN KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will state the date at which the final Report of the Board of Customs upon the impending re-organisation of the Statistical Department was received by the Treasury; whether any further progress towards a final settlement of the matter has been made since that date; and whether he will state if the scheme will be completed and put into operation before the end of the present Session?

MR. GOSCHEN: The Report of the Board of Customs on the re-organisation of the Statistical Department was sent to the Treasury on May 8. The scheme involves a reduction of staff, and I am not able to pledge myself to any date when it will be in full operation; but this and several other questions relating to the Customs Department are, as the hon. Member knows, being considered at the Treasury.

SAVINGS BANKS BILL.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, before or when moving the Second Reading of the Savings Banks Bill, he will give the names of the persons to be appointed under the First Schedule of the Bill?

MR. GOSCHEN: The position of the matter is as follows: I propose to appoint three gentlemen who would represent the Trustee Savings Banks and officers, and three others, probably Members of this House, together with a seventh gentleman, who will be a Government accountant. I am rather reluctant to ask hon. Members to serve until I know that the Second Reading of the Bill will be accepted by the House. I am willing to show the hon. Member the lines on which I propose to proceed.

MR. HOWELL: When will the Bill be taken?

MR. GOSCHEN: I am unable to answer that question.

LAND PURCHASE (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. SEXTON: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), or the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen), with reference to Section 7 of the Land Purchase Bill, which proposes to provide £40,000 for Ireland, what steps he proposes to take in order to secure that Ireland shall have, this year, a sum proportionate to that given to England and Scotland?

MR. GOSCHEN: Will the hon. Gentleman give notice of the question for tomorrow?

ADULTERATED FOREIGN BUTTER.

MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Customs officers have taken any steps to detect the importation of adulterated foreign butter; and, if so, at what ports, and with what results?

A LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. MAXWELL, Wigton): I understand that no samples of butter have been taken by the Commissioners of Customs for analysis, no specific information having been received by them as to the importation of adulterated butter fraudulently marked. I have, however, brought the question before the Commissioners, and they will be prepared to have samples taken if they have sufficient reason to suppose that adulterated butter is being imported under fraudulent marks.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES.

MR. HOWELL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can state to the House the total number of Friendly Societies in the United Kingdom, the number registered and the estimated number unregistered, the total number of members, the aggregate amount of the funds, and the estimated amount expended in benefits in the year 1888, and the total income and total expenditure for that year?

SIR H. MAXWELL: As regards registered Friendly Societies, I am informed by the Chief Registrar, with whom I have been in communication, that it would be impossible without very great labour and expense to supply particulars for 1888 as to the total number of members, the aggregate amount of the funds, and the estimated amount expended in benefits. The Registrar has no means of ascertaining or estimating the number of unregistered Societies, still less any other figures respecting them.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to give notice that I will call attention to this question on the Estimates.

DUBLIN DEEDS OFFICE.

MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury why it is that deeds cannot now be registered as heretofore on the day they are presented at the Registry of Deeds Office, Dublin, but must be left in the comparing room and called for next day, and then produced in the Registration Office; and as this entails an additional attendance on solicitors, and encumbrancers and purchasers are liable to lose priority owing to this new procedure, he would explain to the House what was the reason for its adoption?

SIR H. MAXWELL: I am informed by the Registrar that there has been no change of practice or regulation. Deeds are now, as heretofore, registered on the day they are presented to the Registrar, but they cannot be presented to him until they have been duly compared as the law requires. Where deeds are brought to the Office late in the day, it is sometimes impossible to complete the work of comparison before the Office is closed, but in such cases the deeds left over have precedence the next day, and if they are found to be correct they are presented to the Registrar and registered on the same day.

CONVICTION FOR COMMON ASSAULT.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Attorney General whether he can now say whether, in the case of the conviction for common assault at Dewsbury, on 9th June, the prosecution was against a man arrested by a policeman on the charge of indecently assaulting two mill girls; whether the girls were directed by the police to pay, and did pay, in addition to the Magistrate's Clerk's fees of 17s., a further sum of 5s., for the attendance of a witness; whether, in proceedings for such offences, the law provides for compensation to prosecutors; and whether there is any enactment making prosecutors in such a case liable for Justice Clerk's fees and compensation to witnesses?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): In answer to the hon. Member, I am informed that, when arrested, the man in question was charged with indecent assault, but that, at the hearing before the Justices, he was convicted of a common assault only. The prosecution was not undertaken by the police, except in so far as they were acting for and at the request of the girls themselves. The girls were liable for the fees of the Justice's Clerk, and they paid them, and also the expenses of one witness, which amounted to 5s. No objection was made by them to such payment. In the case of a common assault, when the defendant is summarily dealt with and not committed for trial the law does not allow the costs of the prosecution to be paid out of the rates, as in the case of felony. The liability to pay the fees of the Justice's Clerk rests on the authority of decided cases, and upon the information before me I am of opinion there was also the liability to pay the expenses of the witness.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: The arrest having been made on a charge of indecent assault, how is it that the police gave an intimation that unless the girls were prepared to pay the costs of the prosecution the case would not go on?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I am not responsible for the existing state of the law. If a prosecutor, in these circumstances, insists on going on he is responsible for the costs. I am informed that the girls in this case expressed their intention to prosecute.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: In consequence of the answer I have received, I beg to give notice that I will direct attention to the matter on the Estimates.

KING JA JA.

MR. W. REDMOND: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government will consider the advisability of allowing King Ja Ja to return to Opobo?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The question is now under consideration.

MR. W. REDMOND: When is it likely that a decision will be arrived at?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am unable to say more than that the question is under the consideration of the Colonial Authorities and the Authorities upon the Coast.

THE ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT.

MR. MUNROFERGUSON (Leith, &c.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, under the arrangement with Germany, and in the event of the Damaraland Protectorate being extended further north than is shown upon the map, the German sphere of influence can spread eastwards across the Leeba or Zambesi River?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The German sphere of influence fixed by the Agreement gives access to the Zambesi, but does not extend beyond that river.

ANTI-SLAVERY CONFERENCE.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs when further Papers in reference to the proceedings of the Anti-Slavery Conference will be laid upon the Table; what action the Government propose to take to carry out the recommendations agreed on by the Conference; and whether the House will have the opportunity of discussing them?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Papers will be laid before the House as soon after the conclusion of the Conference as possible. The measures requisite to carry out the recommendations of the Conference have not yet been decided upon, but will receive early consideration. There will, no doubt, be opportunities for discussion when the Papers have been laid.

LIME AND ANIMAL MANURE.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether it is necessary to mix lime with the manure of animals landed in Essex, which destroys its fertilising properties, when by inspection the animals have been found before and after slaughter to have been perfectly healthy; and where the manure of animals found to be diseased is at present destroyed?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): In reply to the last paragraph of the question, I am informed that the usual method of disposing of the manure of diseased animal at the ports has been to carry it out to sea and throw it overboard. With regard to the manure of animals landed at foreign animals' wharves—i.e., where they are slaughtered—it is very desirable to have it thoroughly disinfected. In the case, however, of animals landed at foreign animals' landing places, whence the animals are allowed to pass into the country, the hon. Member's question, I think, deserves consideration; and while I will not pledge myself to any alteration in the present system, I have directed inquiries to be made as to the necessity of disinfecting the manure in such cases for the future.

SALE OF INTOXICATING DRINK IN INDIA.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to a proposal on the part of the Indian Government to establish an outstill for the sale of intoxicating drink on a tea plantation in the Western Doonars; whether he has read the protest of the owners of the plantation, Messrs. Octavius Steel & Co., dated Calcutta, 30th April, 1890, in which they state—

"That nothing has so retarded the progress of the district as the spendthrift and degraded habits directly due, as we believe, to the facilities forced on the people for the obtaining of liquor from Government stills;"

whether, despite this protest, a requisition has been made from the Revenue Department for a piece of ground measuring about six acres, "for the purpose of an outstill and a Government market;" and whether, considering the vote of censure passed by the House of Commons last year on the Government of India for stimulating drunkenness by developing the outstill system, the Secretary of State for India will intimate his disapproval of this fresh attempt to force outstill on a reluctant population?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The attention of the Secretary of State was called to the subject some time ago by the Foreign Missions Committee of the Church of Scotland, and he has since been furnished by the hon. Member with a copy of the letter of protest. The Secretary of State is not aware whether a still has been, or will be, established. The matter has been referred to the Government of India for Report.

EDUCATION OF BLIND AND DEAF MUTES.

MR. WOODALL (Hanley): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education when the promised Bill for the Education of the Blind and Deaf Mutes in England and Wales will be introduced?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The Bill will shortly be introduced in another place; but its progress this Session will depend upon the state of business, and whether its provisions prove generally acceptable.

INDEPENDENT CHAPEL CHARITIES, TIVERTON.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the hon. Member for Penrith (Mr. J. W. Lowther) whether the Charity Commissioners have yet come to any decision in the matter of the appointment of new Trustees to the Independent Chapel Charities, Tiverton, or if he can state the cause of the delay?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): An appointment of new Trustees purported to have been made under the provisions of 13 and 14 Vict. c. 28 (Peto's Act); but the matter appeared to be of so contentious a character that it was doubtful whether the powers of the Commissioners would enable them to deal with it effectually. If, however, a sufficient application should be made for an appointment under the Charitable Trusts Acts the Commissioners would use their best endeavours to settle the questions at issue between the contending parties.

THE DEFENCES OF THE AUSTRALASIAN COLONIES.

SIR JOHN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether there is any objection to furnishing the House with the Report of General Edwards on the Defences of the Australian Colonies, and the reply thereto from the War Office?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The Report referred to will be presented to Parliament; but it will first be necessary to communicate with the Governments of the Australian Colonies on the subject.

CRIMEAN AND INDIAN VETERANS.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): I had intended to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the necessitous circumstances of many of the veterans who served in the Crimean War and Indian Mutiny; and whether he can now promise any measures for their relief? but, at the request of the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to postpone the question until Monday next.

THE ZAMBESI RIVER.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, considering the great importance of the Zambesi River as a means of opening out the trade in the eastern portion of South Africa, he will take immediate steps to have all the mouths of that river thoroughly surveyed by one of Her Majesty's ships?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): One of Her Majesty's surveying ships is now on her way to the Zambesi, with orders to survey the mouths of the river.

SOMERSET DOCK, MALTA.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, with the exception of the cost of the plans and designs, any money had been spent upon the Somerset Dock at Malta before the correspondence and plans relating thereto were presented to Parliament; and, if not, whether he will follow this precedent, and give the House, in the case of the proposed Graving Dock at Gibraltar, an assurance that no money will be spent upon it until the Papers and plans relating to it have been placed in the Library, or have been laid upon the Table of the House?

LORD G. HAMILTON: My answer to the first question is in the negative. In reply to the second, I cannot give an assurance of the character the hon. Gentleman requires, though I should not propose to commence the works without the assent of Parliament.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN NAVIES.

ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, before the discussion on the Shipbuilding Vote, he will inform the House what, if any, changes have taken place in the shipbuilding programme of other European Powers since the number of vessels of all classes required to make the British Navy equal to that of any two Foreign Powers was decided on; and, if so, whether provision is being made to maintain that proportionate superiority?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The projected additions to Foreign Navies do not disturb the calculations on which the shipbuilding programme embodied in the Naval Defence Act was framed, namely, that in 1894 the British Navy in fighting power will be equal to a combination of any two Navies abroad.

ADMIRAL MAYNE: Will the noble Lord give the figures on which he bases his statements?

LORD G. HAMILTON: In the French and Russian Navies the following vessels have been commenced since the passing of the Naval Defence Act: in France, four coast defence ironclads, two armoured second-class cruisers, and one torpedo cruiser; in Russia, two ironclad battleships. On the other hand, in France the construction of one first-class ironclad projected last year has been abandoned; and in Russia two armoured cruisers and two sloops which were originally projected have disappeared from the programme.

Sir John Swinburne

THE COURSE OF BUSINESS.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I would like to ask whether the House may anticipate from the First Lord of the Treasury some statement on the course of business to-morrow, or on some early day?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope to make a statement on Thursday next.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

James Rochfort Maguire, esquire, for County of Donegal (North Donegal Division).

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES.)

Sir JOHN MOWBRAY reported from the Committee of Selection: That they had discharged Sir Edward Harland from the Standing Committee on Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure, in respect of the Housing of the Working Classes Acts Consolidation Bill, and Housing of the Working Classes (Amendment) Bill, and had appointed in substitution: Sir James Corry.

Report to lie upon the Table.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have passed a Bill, intituled "An Act to further improve the Administration of Justice in the Court of Chancery of the county palatine of Lancaster." [Court of Chancery of Lancaster Bill [Lords.]

And, also, a Bill, intituled "An Act to extend the provisions of 'The Factors Act, 1889,' to Scotland." [Factors (Scotland) (No. 2) Bill [Lords.]

INLAND REVENUE REGULATION (RE-COMMITTED) BILL.—(No. 255.)

Bill considered in Committee, and reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

BARRACKS BILL.—(No. 234.)

Bill, as amended, considered.

(4.43.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I have already expressed my views on this subject in Committee, and should not have done so again if it had not been for the fact that this matter came on at the dinner-hour in Committee, and that this clause—which is a very important one—was called on directly after the Chairman had returned from tea, there were not half-a-dozen Members in the House, and though a count was moved, a special and somewhat unusual circumstance prevented the House being counted. A little discussion took place between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and myself, and, though I was supported by a large number of Members on a Division, I think it only right now to give other hon. Members who were not present an opportunity of discussing this important subject, if they are inclined to do so. I am inclined to think that this Bill is the most important one Her Majesty's Government are likely to pass this Session. It involves a large amount of money, and settles the policy of the country as to localisation of the Forces; but the Government have tried to slip it through with very little discussion. The Second Reading was taken on a Friday night before the holidays; and it was brought forward in Committee at the dinner-hour, and on Friday last Her Majesty's Government tried to take it without Debate, after 12 o'clock, which was not allowed. I trust that to-day the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton and several other Members will avail themselves of the opportunity of making some observations. The Bill enables Her Majesty's Government to borrow £4,000,000, not this year but in years to come, so that the matter is to be taken out of the control of Parliament. I will not raise the question as to how the money is to be disposed of, as I did in Committee.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I rise to order. I wish to ask if the hon. Member is speaking to the question, which is Clause 6.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I am only submitting to the House why I will not raise again the questions I raised under Clauses 4 and 5. Clause 6 is a clause which enables the Government to borrow money in future years, if they should require it. This year they are to spend £300,000 out of the surplus of the year. I have no objection to this being spent on barracks, and if it is employed in taking up land at Aldershot for the purpose of establishing camps of exercise it will be beneficial; but I object to power being given to the Government to borrow money, not because they do require it, but because they "may" require it. That seems to me an altogether unconstitutional proceeding, which has been condemned in former years—a system of cooking the accounts for the purpose of making them look better than they are. I beg to move the omission of this clause, in order that if other hon. and right hon. Gentlemen choose to take note of the matter, they may have an opportunity of doing so.

Amendment proposed, "To leave out Clause 6."—(Sir George Campbell.)

(4.52.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): This affords an opportunity of raising a protest against the policy of borrowing £4,100,000, at a time when a much larger sum is being paid off for reduction of debt.

(4.52.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman has fallen into the same error as the hon. Member who preceded him. This year we are not borrowing at all. When the hon. Member says we are borrowing, and at the same time paying off debt, he forgets that that does not apply to the present year, and that it is only a hypothesis as to coming years.

(4.53.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: It does not apply in the present year; but that only strengthens my argument as to future years, because you propose this year, when you are paying £400,000 for barracks out of the surplus, to borrow money for use in future years.

MR. GOSCHEN: Take power to borrow.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Yes; and that altogether irrespective of the amount of debt paid off during the year, or of the amount of the Revenue. I called attention in the Budget Debates to the expenditure in the present year as compared with the amount provided in the Estimates for the Army and Navy, but I received no answer from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It seems to me he cannot be aware of the figures I called his attention to. A Return which was given to the House a short time ago, on my Motion, shows that no less than £6,800,000 will be expended in the present year over and above the Army and Navy Estimates, making a total expenditure for the year of £38,321,000, a larger sum than has ever been spent before in this country when the country was not actually at war. Of that £6,800,000, £4,570,000 is to be borrowed, and it, therefore, seems to me that at the time the Chancellor of the Exchequer came before the House and announced his surplus of £3,500,000, there really was no surplus at all, but a deficit of about of £1,500,000. I must protest altogether against this system of borrowing whilst you are paying off debt. It enables the Chancellor of the Exchequer to claim a surplus when there is practically no surplus at all. I believe the proposals in the clause to be thoroughly unsound finance. They disguise altogether the real expenditure of the country,' and I believe the true and the wisest course would have been to have provided for the expenditure within the year only, so that the House and the country might know what the real expenditure will be. I doubt whether the total sum of £4,100,000 will be expended in less than eight or nine years. We have to erect barracks over many parts of the world—at Bermuda, Gibraltar, Malta, Ireland, and other places, and I doubt whether the work will be finished in less than eight or nine years. It would be possible, by spreading the cost over such a period, to provide £300,000 or £400,000 a year to meet it without taking these borrowing powers.

Question put, and agreed to.

An Amendment made.

MR. E. STANHOPE: I do not know whether the House will allow this Bill to be read a third time. It is very desirable that the measure should pass as soon as possible.

*MR. SPEAKER: As it is a Money Bill it would not be proper to take the Third Reading on the same day as the Report stage.

Bill to be read the third time tomorrow.

ELECTIONS (SCOTLAND) (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES) BILL.—(No. 243.)

As amended considered.

A Clause (Prohibition of Disqualified persons from Voting.)—(The Lord Advocate),—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

(5.2.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): With regard to this Amendment, I wish simply to ask a question. According to Sub-section 3, if the Provost of a town or the Convener of a county is guilty of a corrupt practice he loses the office of Justice of the Peace. I wish to ask whether he will still remain Provost or Convener? If the offence is sufficient to justify his being removed from the Commission of the Peace, it surely should be sufficient to remove him from the position of Chief Magistrate or Convener.

(5.3.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): In the case of a Lord Provost, if he is unseated he ceases to be an Alderman or Councillor, and therefore vacates his seat as Provost. The same thing applies to the Convener of a county.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause added.

Clause (Hearing of person before he is found guilty of corrupt or illegal practice, and incapacity of person found guilty,)—The Lord Advocate,—brought up, and read the first and second time.

(5.5.) MR. CALDWELL: The Lord Advocate will notice that a person who is not a candidate may be Provost or Convener. That being so, if he is guilty of corrupt practices, he will be deprived of the Commission of the Peace, but will still remain Provost or Convener. I beg to move, in line 36, to leave out "by which" and insert "that." The clause as it stands provides that if it appears to the Election Court by which any licensed person is convicted of the offence of bribery or treating—

"That such offence was committed on his licensed premises, the Court shall direct such conviction to be entered in the proper register of licences."

This is taken from the English Act, and is quite proper from an English point of view; but in Scotland it is the individual who is licensed and not the premises. That being so, it is always a matter of inquiry on the part of the Justices what is the character of an applicant for a licence. If the applicant has been guilty, say, of an assault outside his premises, the Justices take that into consideration in reference to his application. In this particular case it can make no great difference whether the offence is committed on the licensed premises or not. If my Amendment be agreed to, I shall propose, subsequently, the omission of the words "that such offence was committed on his licensed premises." The effect of this would be that the fact of a man having been convicted of the offence of bribery would be entered upon his certificate and considered by the Justices when they came to deal with the question of his licence.

If a man has been guilty of bribery, whether on his premises or not, that fact ought surely to be made known to the Justices who have to deal with his licence. In Scotland licences are repeatedly refused on the ground that offences have been committed off the applicant's premises.

Amendment proposed, in line 36 of the Clause, to leave out the words "by which," and insert the word "that,"—(Mr. Caldwell,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'by which' stand part of the Clause."

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The common ground upon which hon. Gentlemen opposite and the Government have proceeded is to make this Bill simply an adaptation to municipal elections of the law of bribery and illegal practices which prevails as to Parliamentary elections. That is our definite object, and accordingly I must decline, even in a comparatively small matter, to enlarge the law or to introduce any new disqualification in the case of municipal elections, which does not apply to Parliamentary elections. I do so on the ground that the intention is to assimilate the law in the case of municipal with that of Parliamentary elections; and if I were to accept such an Amendment as this, it would make alterations in the law and open the door wide to all sorts of proposals which were not made in the Grand Committee, where it was explained that the sole desire was to assimilate the law.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause added.

Amendments made.

MR. CALDWELL: I beg to move, pro forma, the omission of "his," in Clause 10, page 5, line 15, and the insertion thereof of "the." Under Clause 10 there are two offences, which, unless they are committed with the knowledge of the candidate, shall not void the election; but by Clause 12 it is provided that, where an illegal practice has been committed by a candidate or his agent, the election is to be void. The two cases under Clause 10, in which the fault of the agent shall not cause the election to be void, are—

"If any person votes or induces or procures any person to vote at an election, knowing that he or such person is prohibited, whether by this or any other Act, from voting at such election, he shall be guilty of an illegal practice."

And then—

"Any person who, before or during an election, knowingly publishes a false statement of the withdrawal of a candidate at such election, for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of another candidate, shall be guilty of an illegal practice."

Then the clause goes on—

"Provided that a candidate shall not be liable, nor shall his election be voided, for any illegal practice under this section committed without his knowledge and consent."

I propose by this and the next Amendment to add after "consent," "of himself or of his agent." If you do not introduce these words, the effect will be that, under Clause 12, the election may be voided on minor illegal practices, whereas, under Clause 10, the election would only be voided if the major illegal practices were committed with the knowledge of the candidate.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 15, to leave out the word "his," and insert the word "the,"—(Mr. Caldwell),—instead thereof.

Question, "That the word 'his' stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Other Amendments made.

MR. CALDWELL: On Clause 20, I have an Amendment on the Paper to insert, after "premises," in line 5, the words—

"The premises of any public elementary school in receipt of an annual Parliamentary grant, or any part of such premises."

I do not wish to persevere with the Amendment, and will only say I think it is very important that the School Board should not have power to grant the use of a State-aided school for the purpose of a Committee Room of one political Party. If the Amendment I have placed on the Paper were adopted, public meetings could not be held in public schools. That, of course, is not my object; because, in many places, the public school is the only place where a meeting can be held. But it is one thing to hold a public meeting in a State-aided school and another thing to convert such a school into a private Committee Room. It would save a great deal of heart-burning if we declared that a school may be used for the purpose of public meetings at which all the ratepayers are present, and yet not used as the Committee Room of any particular candidate.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I will consider the point.

Amendment proposed,

In Clause 41, page 22, at the end of line 39, insert, "Provided that where the police assessment which can be levied in any burgh is limited, an addition to that assessment may be levied for the purpose of raising the sum required to pay such expenses."—(The Lord Advocate.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: This Bill has the support of both sides of the House, and, therefore, I beg to move that it be now read the third time.

Motion made, and Question, "That this Bill be read the third time,"—(The Lord Advocate),—put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

EDUCATION CODE (1890) BILL.

(No. 222.) COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

MR. RANKIN (Herefordshire, Leominster): I should like to impress on the Vice President of the Council the desirability of lowering the standard of exemption in evening classes. In Herefordshire we are making great efforts to bring about manual and technical instruction, and I should be sorry if so many scholars were left out as I fear they will be. If the Vice President cannot see his way to reduce the standard from the fifth to the fourth clause altogether, he might introduce a clause providing that it should be the standard of exemption of the particular school which should regulate the exemption of the child entering the evening school.

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): My hon. Friend and myself have together considered this point in one or two ways. I am not sorry he has raised the point, though it is impossible for me to accede to his wishes. If these proposals of ours are as successful as we hope they may be, very soon the schools to which the hon. Gentleman alludes will be able to get their children into so forward a state that they will easily attain Standard V. I promise that while we are trying this new venture, I will carefully keep in mind all my hon. Friend has said.

Clause 2.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I do not think any one wishes to oppose this clause, and I only rise to enter my caveat against the further infringement of the 17s. 6d. limit, which insists, in regard to voluntary schools, that there shall be a certain amount of voluntary subscription against the Government grant. We have some alarm on this subject, inasmuch as we are aware that the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. F. S. Powell), has withdrawn his Bill, and we understand that he withdrew it in consequence of satisfactory assurances he received from Her Majesty's Government. If these satisfactory assurances tend to the abolition of the 17s. 6d. limit it will be our duty to oppose such relaxation.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA CONSTITUTION (RE-COMMITTEE) BILL.—(No. 256.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 1.

(5.30.) SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I think we have been rather hardly used in respect to this Bill. We find it sometimes high, sometimes low, in its position on the Paper, and we have never known when it was really coming on. When the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) asks when the Indian Councils Bill is going to be taken he is promptly told when the Bill will not be taken, but this Western Australia Bill, which proposes to give away half a continent, after being set down continually at the tail of Government Bills, now comes on rather too early, and I doubt if many Members expected it. However, we must make the most of it. I have already proposed to postpone Clause 1, but the Government would not agree to that, and I was not allowed to discuss the merits of the clause on a Motion for postponement. I suppose now we shall have to pass the clause, but, at the same time, seeing that it has a very strong bearing upon the much more important Clause 3, I should like to make a few of those observations from which I was precluded on the Motion for postponement. This clause confers what is called responsible government on the Colony of Western Australia, and to understand the bearing of the clause a short recapitulation of the history of the origin of this Bill is necessary. Western Australia is, as colonies go, rather an old colony, but there have been no discoveries of gold there; a great part of the country is covered with forests, and the colony has made but slow progress, and at this time there are but 40,000 people occupying a territory equal to all Europe, excluding Russia, an area of 1,060,000 square miles. Most of the population are in one little spot of the country about Perth and Freemantle. It has self-government to some extent, an Elective Council, but with a Crown Executive. It is not a free Government as regards the disposal of land, the land rules are subject to the control of the Secretary of State, and so also are loans if the colony wishes to raise such. The late Governor is in favour of the change, but he gave evidence hardly in that direction, for he told us the existing Constitution had been extremely successful, upon which I am not prepared to express an opinion. Sir Napier Broome also told us it was in the nature of an oligarchy. But this was the subject of an Amendment moved a few days ago. The proposal now is to hand over vast territories, hitherto Crown property, to the unlimited control of a small clique in these two large villages of Perth and Freemantle. Until the last two or three years the people were content with the present system, a little short of free government; until the colonists of Perth had a quarrel with the Colonial Office, the Secretary of State having made some difficulty about some extravagant loan, and having refused to give the colonists powers to relax the land rules for a particular concession, as to which I may have to say more upon Clause 3. The result was that the Council who, until the other day, did not want responsible government, under the circumstances of this quarrel, petitioned Her Majesty for self government, and, though a large number of the population petitioned against it, we are now told that most of them have changed their minds. I do not know how this may be, but that all have not changed their minds is evident from the strong opinion of the late Attorney General, which the hon. Member for Northamptonshire has quoted, and the evidence of the Member for Albany, who was one of the delegates from the colony, shows that opinion is not unanimous, by any means. Albany is the south-west district, which contains some of the best land, though Albany still is a small place. I have a letter from the late Member for Albany, in which he says though in the north the colonists are bent on securing responsible government, in the south they are not in favour of it in the shape represented in the Bill. I feel justified in saying that the Western Australians are not unanimous on the subject. A good many objections are suggested, besides that which was disposed of the other night. In the first place, government will be in the control of a small clique at Perth, who will use their power for raising loans for the benefit of Perth, and concessions over vast and almost unknown territories will be sold to companies formed for the purpose. I am somewhat suspicious about these enterprises. I was reading the other day, in an Australian newspaper, an article, in which the effect of this Bill was anticipated in the acquisition by the Government of the Midland Railway of Western Australia. So people are induced to invest in unsuccessful undertakings in the expectation that the new State will buy up the undertaking at a premium. We know how railways and canals in India have been forced upon the Government, a Government much stronger than this is likely to be. I am, therefore, somewhat apprehensive of a system of jobbery under this new Constitution, and inclined to the view of the late Attorney General, Mr. Hensman, that control will be exercised in the interests of a few squatters, not of the whole colony. This question arises more particularly in relation to the acquisition of Crown lands under Clause 3. Then comes the question of control over the natives. We could not get from witnesses any approximation of how many natives there are, because, the fact is, the country is unexplored. It is certain there are considerable numbers of them in the North-West. Many have been tamed, and in the course of examination of witnesses, I elicited the fact that at some of the stations the proportion of natives is 20 to every white man, and we may assume that there are large numbers of natives in the unsettled territory. It is a question how far we should give unlimited control over the native population to a small clique of people at Perth. We were told in Committee that the natives were not used badly, as had been the case in Queensland, because they were utilised; but I confess I have some apprehension that, when home control is removed, the scenes in Queensland may be repeated in West Australia. There are considerable reasons why we should hesitate in handing over control of enormous territory to a small number of people. Be it remembered the people of Perth will not have responsible Government unless they have complete control over the land, insisting upon a condition that is not recognised in the United States nor in Canada. When the Bill was projected in 1889, we know what a strong feeling was evoked against the Government rashly giving away enormous territory, and reservations of land were made for colonisation purposes. Then Delegates were sent over, an ex-Governor was induced to support the demand, and a heavy canvass was instituted and newspapers have been converted to approval or induced to maintain silence. The Colonial Office never can resist colonial demands, and so we have the Bill re-introduced without the reservations it originally embodied. On the Second Reading great diversity of opinion was expressed. Strong doubts were expressed as to the propriety of the proposal, and the Bill was sent to a Select Committee, and this Committee proved pro-colonial, and struck out the reservations the Government had inserted. The Under Secretary did not attempt to defend them; he surrendered with a light heart, and so we have the Bill granting, without reserve, entire control to a small knot of people at Perth. This clause, I suppose, is bound to pass; but I have still grave doubts if Clause 3 will be allowed to pass in its present shape. I hope the Committee will remember that the colonists have themselves said that the whole Bill is contingent upon the passing of Clause 3, upon which, I trust, there will be a thorough discussion.

(5.50.) MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): I hope the clause may speedily pass; but, while it is under discussion, I would ask the Under Secretary for some explanation in regard to what seems to me to be a somewhat important point which was raised in Committee. I do not think I need go into the question as a whole, but I may say I refer to the question of Import and Export Duties as affecting the West Coast. The matter was brought out in Committee, and, so far as I can judge, the position of the Colonial Office was that foreign vessels engaged in the fisheries would be subject to the same duties as vessels under the British flag. I have also heard it said that this contention has been withdrawn, and, at any rate, I do not think it is a position that can be maintained. Matters should continue as they are, and discrimination should be made between the British flag and foreign flags. Under the Federal Councils Bill power was granted and delegated in turn to Western Australia, and Western Australia has been allowed to extend her local Fishery Acts to waters beyond territorial limits. Now that we are dealing with Western Australia alone, I do not see why the colony should not accept what seems to be a fair contention that National and Colonial Maritime Law should follow on parallel lines. I shall be glad if the Under Secretary will give us some information on the point.

(5.52.) SIR R. FOWLER (London): I confess I have some sympathy with views expressed against granting unlimited control over the Crown lands to this small population; but, seeing the unanimity with which the other Australian colonies support the proposal to give Western Australia a free Constitution, it seems to me the House has only one course to pursue—to pass this Bill. Upon this ground I support the Bill.

*(5.53.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): I do not propose to follow the arguments of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, because I might almost say he has given us a third edition of this Second Reading speech. The Committee have heard the hon. Member's remarks repeated many times, and no doubt have weighed his words of wisdom. I have had the additional advantage of hearing his speech in the proceedings of the Committee over which I had the honour to preside. There are, however, one or two points that ought to be noticed. The hon. Member assumes that the Bill originated among a small clique of persons at Perth.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I said they had the Government in their hands.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: That is a mere assertion not sustained by any evidence. The Legislature of Western Australia passed this Bill, and I do not know in what way the hon. Member is justified in the assertion that the Bill is the result of the action of a small clique at Perth.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I said it was passed by a majority of the Council.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: And how should it be passed? I fail to see the logic of the hon. Gentleman's argument. Then the hon. Gentleman said this demand for responsible Government arose out of some dissatisfaction with the Colonial Office. That statement is utterly without foundation, and the hon. Member would never have made it if he had taken the trouble to read the Blue Books. I know he does read them sometimes, because he favours us with copious extracts. The movement originated many years back, and at the commencement it had no encouragement from the Colonial Office. It had no connection with the Colonial Office; it was a spontaneous movement in the colony to obtain that government which exists in the other Australian colonies. Then the hon. Member went into the old, the oft-repeated story that this demand does not come from the people of the colony, and he gave us what he thought a convincing piece of evidence—a letter from the ex-

Member for Albany. Well, that gentleman did not think his view of sufficient importance that he should come over and support it by evidence, and in that course I think he exercised a wise discretion. He wrote a letter to the hon. Member, in which he expressed a wish that the colony should be divided in a manner different from that proposed in the Bill, and that a new colony should be formed, and called Albania. Further, the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy said the hon. Member for Northamptonshire had brought forward strong evidence of opinion against the Bill, and quoted Mr. Hensman. I am not aware that Mr. Hensman is a great authority, but again I say, if he were the exponent of the views of a large number of people, they would have found means to send him here to give evidence.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I never said that he represented the opposition to the Bill. I said that he, with others, opposed it.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: But the hon. Member agrees with the hon. Member for Northamptonshire.

*MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I never said that Mr. Hensman opposed the Bill. I said Mr. Hensman wished to see the Bill carried; but he thought there were serious defects, which he pointed out to me while he was in England, and, afterwards, in a letter he urged me to represent these and protest against them. But I did not represent that he was opposed to the granting of a responsible Government.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I am glad to accept the hon. Member's explanation, against the evidence quoted by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, in support of his argument against this Bill. I place the views of the Western Australians, expressed through the mouths of their own Delegates, in favour of the Bill against the vague statements of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, and I am justified in saying that they absolutely refute them. I hope the hon. Member, having discharged what he considers his conscientious duty, will allow the Bill to proceed, and will not, until some point is reached connected with the question of land, again review the principle of responsible Government, which was affirmed when the House gave a Second Reading to the Bill. With regard to the question raised by the hon. Member for Leith respecting the pearl fisheries, the Act dealing with them is not an Act of Western Australia, but of the Federal Council, and, therefore, Western Australia has no power to rescind it or deal with it in any way whatever. I hope the hon. Member will accept that explanation as satisfactory.

(6.3.) MR. W. A. MCARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid. St. Austell): I cannot, for the life of me, see how anybody professing Radical opinions in this House, or who votes for Home Rule for Ireland, or desires the spread of Local Self-Government throughout the Empire, can continue to oppose this Bill in face of the unanimous feeling of the colony in favour of it. This Bill has been passed by a Representative Assembly, and proposes to give Home Rule to the Colony of Western Australia; it is backed up by all the other Australian Colonies; how, then, can hon. Members on this side justify their action in continuing to oppose it? If there are objectionable provisions in the Bill, these concern nobody but the people of Western Australia. We surely ought to keep our fingers out of their pie, and leave them to make the necessary alterations.

*(6.5.) MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I can assure the hon. Member who last spoke that there is no desire on the part of Radical Members criticising this Bill to oppose the extension of representative Government in Western Australia, but I contend there is mixed up with the Bill much that is not essential to the principle of self-government. The people of Western Australia ask not only for the management of their own affairs, but the control of a vast unpopulated territory. This is a Crown Colony with a certain admixture of representative Institutions.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The hon. Member is absolutely in error; it is not a Crown Colony at all, but has representative Government.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON: That statement is hardly borne out by the evidence of the witnesses as contained in the Blue Book.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I can only repeat that it is not a Crown Colony at all.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: There is a Crown Executive.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON: What, then, is the necessity for this Bill, if the colony has already full and complete representative Government? If the Bill simply proposed to make complete an incomplete system of representative Government, it would meet with no opposition from these Benches. But to transfer the Administration of the vast unpopulated territory I have referred to uncontrolled to the Local Legislature is to abandon Imperial interests.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The question of the control of the land is not before the Committee at the present stage.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON: Of course, I bow to your ruling. There is no objection to giving Local Government in itself, but the difficulty is the proposal to deprive the Imperial Government of that control over the land which we desire the Imperial Government to possess.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The second consequence does not attach to the first; one may be granted and not the other.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON: But we are told that the Bill will be practically defeated unless Clause 3, vesting the management and control of the waste lands in the Legislature of the colony, is passed. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle told us we must pass the Bill in its entirety, or reject it.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I was referring to the scheduled Bill.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON: That is not the view of the Delegates themselves. From their evidence I take it that it is quite within our competence to revise the arrangement. We have no desire to take up a hostile attitude towards the West Australians in dealing with this question. We want them to understand that our wish is to give them full self-government; but, at the same time to preserve our Imperial interests. The hon. Member for North Fermanagh expressed surprise that Metropolitan Members should venture to oppose the Bill, seeing that they are not interested in Western Australia.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I beg the hon. Member's pardon. I expressed surprise that he should have spoken of what was being done by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle in promoting this Bill as a manoeuvre.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON: I am glad to accept that explanation. I did not, of course, use the word as conveying the idea that it was anything discreditable. I referred to the modes in which this Bill was being got through Parliament as a Parliamentary manoeuvre, and I wished to convey that by the course adopted we were not having full Debate on the Imperial principle underlying the measure. The word "manoeuvre" was not used in any offensive or unpleasant sense, and I certainly should be sorry to accuse the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle of anything in the nature of a trick. If all the Australian colonies are backing up the claim of Western Australia, I suppose we are practically powerless; but I think we are justified in criticising the proposal and suggesting modifications which the good sense of the Australian Colonists sought to induce them to consider favourably. The Bill undoubtedly places in the hands of 44,000 people an enormous unoccupied territory which has hitherto been considered by the people of this country as a national domain, and surely these colonists cannot be surprised at our seriously considering such a proposal.

(6.17.) MR. J. MORLEY: Of course, I understood when my hon. Friend the Member for North St. Pancras used the word "manoeuvre," that he uttered it in its Party sense. However much inclined we may be to look at this question from a large Imperial point of view, we must, at the same time, regard the limits of our competence in dealing with the matter. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, on a recent occasion, read to the House a clause of the Statute of the 25th & 26th Vict., which he said imposed upon the Government of Western Australia the obligation of submitting constitutional changes to the final judgment of the House of Commons. The hon. Baronet read the 1st section of the Act, but he omitted to read the second, which specially exempts Western Australia from the operation of the first. Some hon. Members have pointed out that some of the restrictions in the scheduled Bill to which they object have been carried over the heads of a majority of the elected Members of the Council. That is quite true; but what has happened since? Mr. Parker, the leader of the Radicals in the Western Australia Council, was examined before the Select Committee, and what did he say? Did he say that he would like to defer the establishment of responsible Government in Western Australia, and to postpone this Bill until the franchise should be accurately adjusted to his ideas? On the contrary, he said—

“You will pardon me for saying that I do not think it is the province of a Committee of the House of Commons to alter the franchise and the property qualifications of Members. I have not the slightest doubt that as soon as we have this constitution, the property qualifications of Members will be altered, and that the franchise will be, at any rate, very much reduced, if we do not have actual manhood suffrage.”

The same witness also said explicitly of the people in the colony who are in favour of the removal of the restrictions, “They are quite satisfied with this form of responsible Government at present.” It is said sometimes that Mr. Parker and his friends do not represent the real opinions of their constituencies. To that argument the Members of the Opposition in this Committee ought not to attach much weight, for they know how little force the same argument has when applied, as it sometimes is, to hon. Members from Ireland. Although 86 Members for Ireland sit on these Benches, we are told that they do not represent real Irish opinion. We have heard a good deal about our “lofty Imperial connections.” Well, if we wish to preserve those connections you must grant Local Government. To withhold it will be the shortest way to destroy that lofty Empire by which hon. Members claim to set so much store. It has been suggested that the Bill should be delayed until the colony has assented to the restrictions which hon. Members wish to impose. But the Committee should remember that despatch in this case is vital. The Colonial Agents have represented to the First Lord of the Treasury that all business in Western Australia is suspended because the people do not know what constitution they are going to have. There has been a complete deadlock in the colony for months. Why? Because the House of Commons, overladen, overburdened as it is with work, has not had time to attend to the colony's affairs. Further delay would be most deplorable, and those who have Imperial interests at heart will not cause such delay.

(6.23.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): We are quite satisfied that the Vote should now be taken. We are not going to wreck the Bill because we cannot get what we want. A large number of us are strongly in favour of the principle of the Bill; but, at the same time, we think it rather hard that the colony should have thrust upon it by officials appointed by the Crown a bad franchise qualification, which will put the power in the hands of the land jobbers. As the House is against us, we will, as far as we can, assist in passing the Bill, although, personally, I believe that some of its provisions are adverse to the interests of the colony.

(6.25.) SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I hope that the Committee will pass the clauses of the Bill as quickly as possible. I regret to say that the Liberal Party have not too good a name in Australia; and if further opposition is shown to the Bill, they may fall into still greater disrepute. I trust that now no frivolous objections will be made to the measure. We must look at the principle underlying it. No doubt there are some provisions which we, as Radicals, cannot approve. Nevertheless, the Bill is an expression of the wishes of the colonists, and I think we are bound to accept it. We are told that we are making a great mistake in handing over the land to these 40,000 people. But who could be better qualified to deal with it than those who live in the country itself. A great amount of the capital of New South Wales and Queensland has already been invested in the land of Western Australia; and when the Bill has been passed, there will, I expect, be a large influx of population into the colony. We are also told that if we refuse the colony this power over the land, the people will not care about the rest of the Bill. I can easily understand that that would be the case, because the land is the main thing which concerns the colony. The only means by which it can prosper is through the development of the natural resources of the country, and, therefore, I, for one, am most anxious to give the inhabitants full control over the land. We are told we must preserve great Imperial interests in the colony. The best way to do that is to conciliate the sentiment of the people, and you can attain that end by giving them the form of government they desire. The Australian colonies unanimously desire that this Bill should be passed, and I think the House will be well advised to agree to it.

(6.30.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I do not wish to be misunderstood in regard to my position in this matter, and I desire, therefore, to say that my hon. Friends and myself do not wish to obstruct the Bill. On the contrary, I am strongly in favour of it; but I object to the interpretation that has been put upon our action. The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has spoken of our raising frivolous objections, and has accused us of being opposed to the principle of the Bill. I say we have not raised frivolous objections, and we are not opposed to the principle of the Bill. Indeed, rather than the Bill should be lost I would withdraw what further objections I have to it, and assent to its passage. What we strove to do on Thursday night was to ensure the amendment of the Bill, so as to bring the franchise more into conformity with the notions and wishes of the Australian people. We desire that every honest man working for his living in Western Australia, or who goes there with that intention, should have some share in the management of the colony and the distribution of its lands. My idea was, that we should arrange a kind of quid pro quo, and that in giving the West Australian people entire control of the land north of the 26th degree of latitude the colony would be only too anxious to strike out all qualifications as to elected members, in conformity with the wishes expressed in this House. Therefore, I strongly protest against anyone, even the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. Morley) or any other Member sitting above the Gangway, saying that our objections are frivolous, and that we are opposed to the principle of the Bill—a principle which I certainly hope to see adopted in all the colonies.

*(6.33.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I think it most desirable that this Bill should not be rushed through Committee; but, at the same time, I think that the grounds given for the position taken by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy are somewhat out of date. The position of affairs is this. We are at the present moment face to face with the fact that a strong Committee—one of the strongest ever appointed by this House—sat and heard witnesses, and presented a Report on this subject, while, on the other hand, we have from the whole of our Australian colonies expressions of opinion which seem to be unanimous in favour of a measure of this kind, whereas, if objections were to be taken to the placing of so large an area of land under the control of some 40,000 persons, they might have been expected to come more naturally from the Australian colonies than from this country. We have had a sort of discussion between the hon. Gentleman the Member for St. Pancras and the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies as to whether Western Australia is a Crown colony or not. I think that, after all, this is merely a matter of words. No doubt, in a strict legal sense, Western Australia is not a Crown colony; but, at the same time, there is so large a nominative element in the Constitution of the colony that it may be called a Crown colony compared with other colonies which are in the enjoyment of full responsible government. Therefore, it comes to this, that we must either keep Western Australia under its present form of government, or introduce such a system of government as will be in accordance with Australian ideas, and the express wishes of the great majority of the people of Australia. One point that has been raised has had regard to the expressions of opinion on the part of the majority of the electors of Western Australia in reference to the electoral franchise; but that has been fully dealt with in connection with the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire, and, with regard to other points in the Bill, I do not think it can be seriously contended that there is any strong body of opinion in Western Australia that is really opposed to the present measure. There are only two alternatives open to the House. One is that it should leave Western Australia to its present form of government, and the other is that it should introduce such a system of government as is in accordance with Australian ideas and the expressed wishes of the people of Western Australia. Now, for my part, it appears to me that those are the only two courses open to us, and although we might carry out the reservation of a certain proportion of the territory, so that it should not be placed under the control of what is at present the small population of Western Australia, yet in practice it would, I think, be found that the difficulties would be so serious as to render such a course undesirable, because it might bring about a state of things similar to that which now exists in Southern Africa. You might have a Government of Western Australia which would be a responsible and Constitutional Government, and yet at the same time might be—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is anticipating the discussion on Clause 3.

*MR. F. S. STEVENSON: I have no desire to anticipate the discussion on that clause. I was only endeavouring to answer the argument put forward by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, and endeavouring to show the desirability, if possible, of passing the Bill in its present form, because if any serious Amendments, such as that which he proposes, were introduced they might have the indirect effect of causing difficulties similar to those with which we have now to contend in South Africa. I would now simply urge on the Committee to do what it can to carry out the principle of governing Australia in accordance with Australian ideas. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy has referred to the question of railway policy, and has suggested that railways might be laid down and canals constructed for the purpose of being bought by the State, but if he entertains objections to State interference on these matters the same objection might be urged against the action of all the other colonies.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I do not object to the system.

*MR. F. S. STEVENSON: I am glad to hear that my hon. Friend does not object to that system, because it has hitherto been found to work well; although in the United States of America you have, undoubtedly, development of the railway system by means of companies and so forth, in Australia they have adopted the principle of State construction and purchase of railway property, and that system has been found so beneficial that there is no reason for resisting its further development. So far as the question of any refusal to carry out the provisions of this Bill is concerned, a similar refusal might have been suggested with regard to Queensland. No doubt the Queenslanders have committed great blunders, but will any hon. Member get up and say that those errors would have been committed if a responsible Government had been granted to Queensland. The question is one which ought to be regarded from a broad point of view, namely, in regard to the best interests of the people, whose wishes on this subject ought to be consulted.

(6.52.) MR. W. REDMOND: If I understood that the hon. Baronet the Member for Kirkcaldy did not intend to push this Amendment to a Division, there would be no necessity for any observations on my part, but I desire to offer a word or two on a point which I think may not be without some weight in this discussion. I was one of those who had an opportunity of observing the gentlemen who were sent over from Australia to give evidence with regard to this Bill. I heard that evidence, and assisted in the examination of the witnesses on the Colonisation Committee upstairs, and I remember that when those gentlemen were questioned as to the merits of Western Australia as a field for emigration, they were perfectly unanimous in the statement that the prospects of that part of the world as a field for emigration would be immensely improved by the passage of this Bill. In fact, when a question was raised as to why Western Australia was so backward in population, the opinion of those witnesses was almost completely in the direction that the small population of Western Australia was due to the fact that people would not go to a colony which did not enjoy responsible self-government. I do not think there is the slightest difference of opinion in regard to the principle of this Bill. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy compared the principles of this measure with the system at present existing in Western Australia. I do not propose to go into the question whether Western Australia is a Crown Colony in the sense in which we generally regard a Crown Colony, but I am certain there is no Member in this House, certainly not on the Liberal Benches, who will venture to say there is the slightest comparison in the system it is now proposed to confer on Western Australia with the system under which the people are living at the present time. There is, no doubt, a great deal of objection to the restricted franchise under this measure. There may be a certain amount of legitimate objection to placing vast areas of land under the control of the Western Australian Legislature. But on those two points, and on those points alone, is there any room for any material difference of opinion. We on this side all object to the restricted franchise, and there may be objections on our part to hand over the vast territory of Western Australia to the Western Australian Legislature; but neither of those points affects the question as to whether Western Australia is entitled to this measure, or as to whether the people would not be much better off under the proposed Constitution than under the existing system. I, for one, have not the slightest doubt that the restricted franchise would not long be maintained in Western Australia. Nor have I the slightest doubt as to the fact that there would be no jobbery in connection with the land of Western Australia. Why do I say this? Because I know that each of the Australian colonies is enthusiastically in favour of this measure. The Australian colonies are as democratic and as radical as any States in the world, and I am certain that the fact that all the colonies are in favour of this Bill may be taken as a proof that this is really, even with the restricted franchise, a democratic measure, and one which certainly ought to be acceptable to the Liberal Members of this House. I know that the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy himself would be, but for these ideas of a restrictive franchise, the last to object to a form of self-government in Western Australia over which the people had the sole command. If there were any real opposition to this Bill its opponents would have done something more than merely send a letter to an hon. Member, in order that he might read it to this House. Had the Member for Albany, whose letter has been read by the Member for Kirkcaldy, really represented any great body of public opinion in Western Australia, we may feel sure that, as a Member of the Legislative Council, he would have felt compelled to take much stronger action than he has taken in sending that letter to the hon. Baronet. I trust the Australian people may be gratified by the news to-morrow that this Bill has been passed by the British House of Commons.

*(6.45.) MR. CHANNING: Sir, I had not wished to take part in this Debate, and should not have done so but for what fell from my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall. I should wish to see the Bill passed. I have raised the special point in which I was interested, and the House has decided it. But my hon. Friend took upon himself to lecture the Radical Party, and to say that we opposed giving Home Rule to the colony. That, I think, was somewhat out of place. The action which I suggested on Thursday was with the view to giving real Home Rule to Western Australia—to give effect to their views as represented in the Blue Book. To say that this Bill represents the exact wishes of the people of Western Australia is simply to fly in the face of the facts contained in the Blue Book. I would point out that there is no reason for the attack on those Members who supported my Motion, and for saying that they desired to delay the Bill. This clause authorises Her Majesty's Government to issue an Order in Council to assent to the Schedule of the Bill. The proposal the other night was to delay this Order in Council—not to have the Bill re-introduced—until the wishes of the inhabitants of Western Australia were really carried out in the Bill. These could then have been registered in an amended form of the Scheduled Bill. I sincerely hope the discussions on this Bill will result in the people of Western Australia being encouraged to strive to get what is their wish, free from those restrictions which really prevent the people having the Government which they have decided upon by an immense majority.

*(6.48.) MR. A. M'ARTHUR (Leicester): I hope the result of this discussion will be to gain universal assent to this Bill. I recollect perfectly well a similar discussion which arose in the New South Wales Parliament, of which I was then a member, in reference to Queensland. Similar arguments were then used to those we have heard to-night. The matter was seriously considered, and after a long Debate it was decided that Queensland should be a separate colony. Ever since Queensland has increased rapidly, and it now occupies a very important position. I have no hesitation in saying that if Queensland had continued part of New South Wales, its development would not have been so rapid as it has been. I believe a similar result will follow the giving of a Constitution to Western Australia. I have no hesitation in saying also that I would freely give the Western Australians all they have asked for in this Bill. I would give them entire control of the land. It would be wise, too, that some provision should be made by which the funds to be raised for emigration from this country to Western Australia should be at the disposal of the Government of that colony. I make this suggestion because I know that in the colonies of New South Wales and Victoria immigration is opposed by the working classes, who are under the belief that an increased population means increased competition. The result has been that for years past it has been exceedingly difficult for the Governments of those Colonies to get any sum passed for the purposes of promoting immigration. I, therefore, think that the sum raised for the purpose should be at the disposal of the Western Australia Government, and with that condition I very heartily and cordially support the Bill.

(6.52.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I suppose we must accept this Bill in its entirety, or throw it out. It certainly does appear to me a very strange system that a Bill should be submitted to a Committee of this House with the object and intention that it should examine each particular clause, and that then we should be told that we cannot possibly make a single alteration in the Bill. We are told that this Bill bears the imprimatur and assent of the inhabitants of Western Australia, but, from what I can gather, it appears that it has in no sort of way received their assent. How can we know here what is the view of persons in the Antipodes, unless we hear what the elected representatives of the Western Australians say and think, both against the high qualification and the nominated Legislative Council? I do think that we ought to register a protest against the action of Her Majesty's Government in not having taken means to ascertain clearly the view of the Western Australians and laid it before this House. We ought to declare to the Western Australians that we only pass this Bill because, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle and others have said, if we do pass it the Government of the Colony will be so democratic that it will sweep away the nominated Legislative Council and the high qualification. Having these objections, we pass the Bill on the distinct understanding that the inhabitants of Western Australia must be made aware of them.

*(6.55.) MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S): Perhaps the House will allow me for a minute or two to trespass on its time. I am reminded by the proceedings of to-night of the Victoria Constitution Act, which formed, like this Bill, a Schedule to an Act of Parliament passed nearly 35 years ago. The Bill was passed in 1855, and in some respects it was a more liberal measure than the present, because it provided for an Elective Upper Chamber. In the colony there was, however, much controversy about the high qualification, and, having been one of those who had drafted the Bill, I wished that it had been in this respect more liberal; but I may remind the House that as soon as the Bill was passed and responsible Government was in full swing in the colony, in a few years the objectionable features of the enactment in this respect were removed. I would venture, therefore, to suggest that the Bill be passed as it stands, trusting to the Legislature formed under it that they will also, within a few years, make all the constitutional Amendments now proposed to us.

(6.58.) MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I am entirely in favour of passing the Bill. At the same time I think the right hon. Gentleman has supplied one of the strongest arguments in favour of our amending the Bill at once. It is true that in New South Wales and Victoria the provisions as to franchise contained in the Scheduled Bills were subsequently altered, but only after a struggle which, if it be an exaggeration to say it verged on civil war, was of the most suspicious and gravest possible character. We ought certainly, after such an experience, to sweep away from this Bill the causes of a similar agitation, for such agitations ought always to be avoided as far as possible. But it is an unfortunate fact that the results of the unfortunate features in the Bills for New South Wales and Victoria have not been entirely removed. Those who were elected under the high franchise sold to each other land at £1 and £2 an acre, which is now worth £20 and £30 an acre. It is one of the burning questions in the Legislatures of New South Wales and Victoria how to undo an evil which is the direct offspring of the unfortunate features of those Bills. The present Bill should avoid the evils experienced in New South Wales and Victoria. However, we have been defeated in the Divisions we have challenged, and, as we are told that it is not within the sphere of our power without doing further mischief to delay the passing of the Bill, I am in favour of passing it. I desire to give full power to Western Australia, and I only regret that it has not been in our power to give more power. I cannot agree with the hon. Member for Wexford that there will be no jobbery in the land question in the colony. Before the Radical Party there can remove this high franchise I believe that valuable lands will be handed over to the individuals who promote this Bill. In my experience and in my study of the Australian colonies there are three degrees of badness in regard to the administration of the lands. The worst is, when they are managed from the Colonial Office, the next worst is when they are managed by a nominated Council in Australia, or a Council elected on a high franchise, and the best of the three is when you have—as you have in Victoria and New South Wales—an honest Democratic Government, where the working men can make their voices heard. But as we cannot give to the colonists of Western Australia the powers which are enjoyed by the working classes of Victoria and New South Wales, and South Australia—powers which have turned these countries into perfect paradises for the working man—by all means let us, at least, lift them from their present condition, and put an end to the abominable system of managing these affairs from the Colonial Office, and give them that liberty which it is in our power to give. Aided by the experience of the southern colonies their agony may be less brief than it would otherwise be, and in the course of two or three years the people may win for themselves that wider franchise which it seems we are not to be able to give

*(7.5.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I object to this clause, because I object to the qualification of the Members of the Assembly. I am not so strongly against that as I am against the qualification of the electors, and the qualifying period. They have adopted in the Scheduled Act all the bad qualities of our own electoral franchise in this country, and which we are now trying to get rid of. We are told we cannot get this altered. I do not agree with that at all. The right hon. Member for Newcastle told us that they need not come to this House at all with regard to the Scheduled Act, but he went on a little further and told us why they had come to us, and it was, he said, because they wanted to get possession of the land. That is so, and I hold that when they came to us wanting something, we should make conditions. If we do not do it now we may not be able to do it at any other time. I cannot agree that time would be lost if we do not pass the Bill in its entirety at the present moment, because an Amendment has been suggested which will make it necessary to go back to the Legislative Council before the Bill can be passed. ["No, no!"] Then I do not understand what I have read. On page 1, line 10, the Bill says—

"That it is expedient that Her Majesty be authorised to assent to the said Bill, subject to an Amendment thereof as to the pension of the Attorney General."

So that they ask us to insist on an alteration in the scheduled Act before the Queen assents to it. I say, therefore, if we have to go back to the colony to consider one Amendment, surely we may ask them to consider other Amendments. I cannot concur in the view that by the attitude we are taking up we are not in favour of Home Rule. There is no one more strongly in favour of Home Rule than I am, and no one more strongly in favour of the policy laid down by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, which is to trust in the people; but I object to the principle laid down by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, that we should trust in one-half of the people. We have heard from the hon. Member for East Mayo as to the difficulties other Australian colonies have experienced in getting bad laws altered, and I can tell you of the difficulties that have been met elsewhere. A somewhat similar bad law was passed when you gave a Constitution to Upper and Lower Canada in 1840. The arrangements for the representation of the people went on all very well whilst Upper Canada had the smallest population, but by 1850 there was a larger population in that part of the Colony, and immediately there began an agitation to get this bad law altered. The Tories resisted the demand for alteration, and it was not until 1867, when the Federation Scheme was adopted, that a settlement was finally arrived at. Every one who has had any experience of colonial life—as I have—knows that when you commence with your Constitution you should do so fair and straight. Let your laws be as good as you can make them, and put the management of affairs into the hands of the people, and not into those of speculators and the monied classes. We can give the people of Western Australia the management of their own affairs now without any trouble whatever. I do not object to the colonists having the management of their lands; but let us see if we cannot induce the colonists to make such laws as would put the Government into the hands of the people.

*(7.12.) MR. WODEHOUSE (Bath): With regard to the anxiety expressed by the hon. Member for East Mayo, to save the colonists of Western Australia from those Constitutional struggles which other Australian colonies have gone through in endeavours to liberalise their Constitution, I would point out to him that the other Australian colonies are apparently satisfied with the Constitution contained in the scheduled

Mr. Morton

Bill. This fact ought to re-assure hon. Members, because it is admitted that the Governments and institutions of the other Australian colonies are thoroughly democratic. Indeed, I believe that if the Constitution contained in the scheduled Bill were altered by this House, it would be resented by those other colonies as an undue interference in work which properly belongs to Western Australia itself. I would also remind the hon. Member for East Mayo that at the time when the efforts of which he speaks were made to liberalise the Constitutions of the other colonies, Australia did not contain that great body and volume of democratic opinion which now prevails there; and we may depend upon it that as soon as this Bill conferring responsible Government on Western Australia comes into operation, that Colony will be more and more pervaded and governed by the general democratic sentiment and opinion of Australia. There is no reason, therefore, to fear that the democratic feeling of Western Australia will be checked and thwarted, either in regard to electoral rights and privileges or the disposal of waste lands.

(7.15.) MR. MUNRO FERGUSON: The question of fisheries is dealt with in Sub-section 15, and I should like to ask whether the colony of Western Australia has not the right to withdraw restrictions upon the fishing in waters outside the territorial waters? The right hon. Gentleman led us to infer that an Act of the Federal Council could not be withdrawn except by the Act of that Council. So far as I can make out from reading the measure, the Legislative Body of Western Australia would have power to allow these restrictions to lapse. This is a matter which affects the relations between the Mother Country and the colonies, and should therefore be raised in the House. The discussion seems to me to prove how entirely unfit the House of Commons is to control Australian affairs.

*(7.17.) BARON H. DE WORMS: As regards extra-territorial waters, Western Australia will have no power whatever to alter what has been done by the Federal Council. Of course, within territorial waters Western Australia will have such rights.

(7.17.) MR. HALDANE (Haddington): I should like to know whether the Federal Council has conferred powers upon Western Australia to legislate for extra-territorial waters?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: No; certainly not?

(7.18.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I should be sorry to put the House to the trouble of a Division, though I do not like the clause.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Clause 3.

(7.20.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: Though we could not alter a scheduled part of the Bill without withdrawing the section altogether we can alter Clause 3, and I hope the House will consent to do so. This clause is the real crux of the whole question. We desire the colony to have popular government, but we object to its governing people and territory which do not belong to it. We are asked to hand over to a handful of colonists 1,600,000 square miles of territory—a tract as large as the whole of Europe, with the exception of Russia. The Prime Minister has advised the people to study large maps. I wish people would take that advice. The Under Secretary for the Colonies is careful never to give large maps either to the House or to the Committee. He gave us a very small map indeed of Western Australia. [Cries of "No."] I should think his map of this enormous territory was about 20 inches square. The result is that people do not understand, and I do not think the right hon. Gentleman himself understands, what an enormous territory this is. The right hon. Gentleman talks of the southern portion of the reserve as the "South-Western corner" of Australia. I think I may give the House some notion of what that South-Western corner is when I say it equals the size of the United Kingdom, France, and Germany all put together. The question is, whether all the land in this great territory is to be given over to a small number of people? It is said it would not be possible to give the people self-government without giving them the land; but in all parts of America the States that got self-government did not get the land, and the control of the waste lands rests with the Central Government alone. Inasmuch, however, as it has been the custom to give the Australian Colonies the land, I should be willing to give Western Australia land enough to make a reasonable colony, but I do object to give them this enormous territory. I admit that the objections to the proposal are chiefly negative. Why should you be in such a hurry to give the land away? I admit that the great question of colonisation has exercised the minds of many people in this country. The Chairman of what is called the Colonisation Committee, the Earl of Meath, asked officially to be allowed to give evidence before the Committee upstairs.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: He did not ask that. He asked whether we wanted his evidence.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Well, he asked whether we wanted his evidence, and we refused it. There were one or two witnesses we did not have, and, at the instance of the Under Secretary, they were not called. The clause was rushed through the Committee. [Cries of "Oh!"] Well, I withdraw that. This question of colonisation is a very important question. I am one of those who believe the time has not come for exporting our people forcibly, or for spending very large sums upon emigration. But I believe the time is coming when the population of this country may very much press on our resources. Mr. Giffen and others have told us that not only this country but other countries, including the United States of America, are rapidly filling, and that there is a growing feeling in favour of protection of labour as well as of the protection of merchandise. It is well therefore to have colonies of our own to form an outlet for our people. Until we are quite satisfied that we may not want this great Continent for our own people I do not see why we should be in such a hurry to hand it over to this mere handful of 40,000 people sitting in "a corner" of Australia. I admit that if Australian Federation is brought about the Federal Government may well demand the control of Western Australia. But Australian Federation has not come yet. Those who have read the Blue Book will see that there are a great many influences tending the other way, and it is not certain that federation will be agreed to for a very long time. It is an entire mistake that all the colonies demand the whole of this great Continent. I believe that South Australia is the only colony which has expressed itself in favour of such a policy, and I fancy the others have expressed a diametrically opposite view.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I do not follow the hon. Gentleman.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: All I contend is, that the other Australian colonies have not asked that the whole of this land should be made over to Western Australia, but, on the contrary, the delegates of the most important colonies have suggested that it should be kept for a federated Australia. I would rather give it to 8,000,000 or 10,000,000 or 20,000,000 of people when the time comes than give it to these 40,000 people. The arguments are somewhat contradictory. There is some talk of developing the country for splendid enterprises, but there is a refusal to accept the view that free homesteads ought to be given to the emigrants. The Western Australians seem to prefer the system of large squatters. I should like this country to insist that if our emigrants desire to go to Western Australia they shall be entitled to insist on getting free homes. I suggest that there has been a good deal of company-mongering in this manner. We were told in the Committee that the land ought to be given to the people on the spot, and we asked who were the people on the spot, and what was the distance from the more distant parts of Western Australia to the capital. We found that there was communication, in some cases, once a month, and that it took longer to communicate between Perth and Northern Australia than between Perth and London. Under these circumstances, it seems to me absurd to talk of people on the spot. The evidence given before the Committee convinced me that what is called the South-Western corner of Australia is eminently fitted for colonisation. We are told that it has an excellent rainfall, and that there are no droughts. There are no considerable mountains, and the soil is good. There is a great forest growth; but that is a great source of wealth. We are proposing to give away this territory, with its splendid climate, I believe the healthiest in the world, and its capital soil to men who will simply job it away. The territory is eminently fitted for colonisation. It is admitted that in the South-West corner there are 20,000 square miles fitted for cultivation, and even that portion of the country is almost unoccupied. I find that only one-fourth of 1 per cent. of the district is occupied by the colonists. I have been dwelling on the temperate, well-watered, healthy, fertile South-West corner; but beyond that there is an enormous territory extending for many hundred thousands of square miles, which some people say is desert, but which we do not know whether it is desert or not. We have had glimpses of it which show that there are parts of the country which would turn out well. There is certainly the great possibility that the country is rich in minerals; at any rate, it is really no man's land, and it is questionable whether the British Crown should give it away. I greatly welcome the opposition to this clause which is offered by gentlemen who are called land nationalists. I am not a land nationaliser in this country, because I think it would be too expensive to buy up the land; but my experience of land nationalisation elsewhere has been very satisfactory. At any rate, there is no reason why we should give up this land to a small knot of people; we had better give it to some central authority, who would make proper use of it. We were told by some of the delegates that we need not fear that the small knot of people will job the land away; but I think we should remember what was said by the hon. Member for Mayo, namely, that throughout the Australian Colonies there is a great tendency for the land to fall in great blocks into the hands of great land kings. A Return submitted to the House shows that at this moment the land in Western Australia is occupied in enormous blocks—that there are millions of acres in the hands of a single individual or corporation. It is said the land is held under long leases; but we find that under the Regulations, controlled by the Colonial Office, the leases are not renewable. My belief is that if you give control of these great lands to a small knot of people, the leases will become property and the land will be jobbed away. Therefore, I want that we should hold our hand a little; that we should not release the ultimate control of the land. Then the question comes, if we are to retain any part of the land or to retain any rights over the land, what are we to retain? I agree that the original proposal of the Government that we should retain the Northern part of Western Australia for the benefit of the inhabitants of this country is nothing but a delusion and a snare; it is a red herring dragged across our path. The Northern part of the country is useless to the people of this country. The question is not whether we should keep the Northern tropical lands, but the temperate Southern lands. When in Committee we came, after a long discussion upon the tropical lands, to the question of the temperate land, the Chairman told us that the matter was practically settled by the Second Reading. No one listened to my proposal, and, as I said the other day, the discussion did not last more than 10 minutes. A great royal function was going on and I did not take a Division, because I saw it would be useless to do so.

MR. J. MORLEY: May I ask the hon. Gentleman if the charge he is now making is not the very charge he apologised in the House the other day for having made?

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I apologised for saying I did not think the Committee did their duty. I never withdrew the charge, which I make again now, that that part of the Bill was hurried through the Committee.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The hon. Gentleman said that when the part of the Bill to which he refers was reached the Members of the Committee commenced to pack up their papers and to leave the room in order that some might attend the Levée. As a matter of fact, only one hon. and gallant Member left for that purpose, and he entertained views directly antagonistic to the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: As a matter of fact, one very important Member of the Committee was obliged to leave. I have no doubt the Committee did their duty most conscientiously; but they felt and believed that, having disposed of Clause 4, the Southern territory had been settled by the Second Reading, as the Chairman stated. If evidence is wanted that the proposition which I submitted was not discussed and not listened to, that 10 minutes were not taken up upon it, I refer hon. Members to my hon. Friend (Mr. Wodehouse), than whom no one more thoroughly understands the question. My hon. Friend, who of all Members of the Committee best understood the question, told me the other day he never did understand what the question I submitted to the Committee was. I may be wrong in contending that we ought to reserve some of this temperate land, but I maintain it is not a question which ought to be settled in 10 minutes. My proposal is that we should retain about 50 per cent. of the South-West district, and give to the present Western Australians their own lands and certain grazing lands which I specified in my Amendment. In all I would give them a territory something like three times the size of the colony of Victoria and twice the size of the United Kingdom, and if that is not enough for 40,000 people I do not know what is. The rest of the temperate land I would keep, believing that some day or other we may colonise it. It may be rich in minerals, and within the next 10, 20, or 30 years we may have a great line of railway running through the territory. Some day we may have to hand it over to a United Australia, but do not let us be in a hurry; let us wait until such a demand is made. What I am at present desirous of doing is to move an Amendment which will unite the different Members who wish to save something out of that great territory, and, therefore, I beg to propose to omit the word "entire" in the first line of Clause 3. By adopting such an Amendment we should not give the present colonists the entire control of the whole territory. We have been told there might be a safeguard under Clause 6, which gives the power of dividing the colony; but what is the use when the lands are already given away, when loans are contracted on the security of these lands, and the fate of the colony pledged to arrangements which cannot be upset. No doubt the Government, with the powerful alliance of the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Morley), will insist on forcing Clause 3, and it will be passed, but let it be forced through in the light of day. Let it be understood by future Britons that when this great inheritance was given away in 1890, it was not without a warning and a protest in the House of Commons. We are engaged in a strange policy, grabbing new territory in Africa, while we give away this vast territory in Australia. When the day comes when the nations of the earth feel bound to protect their own labour, then the Australian colonies will be the first to keep our people out of the lands we now give away in this reckless manner. I admit the Colonial Office is against us, with the occupants of the Front Opposition Bench below me. The Colonial Office is incompetent to deal with the question, and the feeling of ex-Colonial Secretaries is like the feeling of ex-Irish Secretaries, to get rid of that responsibility which has been the source of so much difficulty. But this argument may be pushed too far, and I maintain it is the duty of the Colonial Office to retain some control and insure that these lands shall be administered in the interest of the whole Empire, not for the benefit of a handful of people in the village of Perth. Because of a petty difference between the colonists and the Colonial Office the Colonial Office is willing to make "ducks and drakes" of this territory. Why be in such a hurry to do this? We have been told that we should follow the precedent of what was done in Queensland. But two blacks do not make a white. Queensland did not make the best use of the gift, but there was a rush of people to mining enterprises, and the thing is done there. But here we are concerned with a territory three times as large, and we hand it over to a small and unprogressive colony. There is much to induce us to pause and make some reservation. I do not say that my proposal is best; I am willing enough there should be some reasonable concession, but I want some reservation of this great and almost unknown territory until we know something more about it, and to what use it can be applied. I accept the suggestion that we should now divide, and move to leave out the word "entire" in line 1.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not know whether the hon. Member has realised that if the word "entire" has the meaning he attributes to it, this will dispose of all other Amendments.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I was only anxious not to shut out other Amendments. I will move the Amendment as it stands in my name.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 23, after the word "Australia," to insert the words—

"North and west of the line following (that is to say): a line commencing at the point where the thirty-third parallel of south latitude strikes the coast of West Australia, thence running straight to the point where the thirtieth parallel of south latitude strikes the one hundred and nineteenth meridian of east longitude, and thence following that one hundred and ninetieth meridian northwards to the northern coast of Australia."—(Sir George Campbell.)

*(8.8.) BARON H. DE WORMS: I think, after this speech, it might perhaps be better if I said nothing. It is quite evident the Government cannot accept the Amendment. The hon. Member is fond of accusing Departments and individuals of incompetence, and it seems to me that his measure of incompetency is their disagreement with himself. Both in the Select Committee and in the House the hon. Member was in an absolute minority on this question; but he continues to assume that he was in the right, and that the majority who disagreed with him were in the wrong. He still takes a broad, if not a comprehensive, view of the subject. He reminds me of the French King who summed up his authority in the word "L'état c'est moi," the only difference between the hon. Member and the Sovereign is this, that whereas he only claimed to speak for the State, the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy claims to speak for all States and all peoples. He claims to speak on behalf of those who live here and in Australia. In spite of the strong evidence that has been brought before the Committee, and into which the hon. Member himself very carefully inquired, he is still not convinced, and asks the House to come to a decision in opposition to it, and to accept in place of it, the evidence, a letter from a practically unknown person, or known only in Albany.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Member for the Division of Albany.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The hon. Member assumes that because he is known to himself this gentleman must be known to all the world. The Member for Albany may be a distinguished person, but his opinion does not outweigh that of the chosen Delegates from Western Australia. The hon. Member complains of the smallness of the map, but I do not know that I need answer that; although perhaps a larger map would have better accentuated the size of the territory he would exclude from responsible Government. This would leave out of the hands of responsible Government the southern half of the South-Western Division and practically the whole of the Kimberley, Eastern, and Eucla Divisions. This would please no one, and effect no purpose. It would leave to the colony a territory in the north, but would detach a territory on the south, which, of course, is much nearer to, and in closer relations with, Perth. In particular, it would detach King George's Sound, whence the mails are forwarded to and from Perth, and which is the keystone of the defence of the colony. The colony could not be expected to look after these parts properly if they are liable to be deprived of the land revenue. Among strange and remarkable statements from the hon. Member was one that, with few exceptions, the other Australian colonies were antagonistic to the lands being given up to the new Government.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: No; I said that some of the leading men were much against it.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The hon. Member quoted certain colonies, New South Wales among others, as being against the lands being given up to the new Government.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I did not quote the colonies as having expressed a strong opinion in that direction. I said they had not expressed an opinion either way, and that some of the leading men in the colonies had expressed strong opinions against it.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: Then the hon. Member relies on negative evidence, and assumes that, having expressed no opinion, they are against the proposal.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I said they had not expressed an opinion in favour of the transfer, but in a modified sense there had been expressions of opinion against it.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I deny the inference conveyed by the hon. Member that a large number of the colonists, and many leading men among them, are opposed to the land being given up to the newly-constituted and responsible Government, and I assert that the vast majority of the colonists are anxious that the Bill should be passed. One and all have represented to the Government the desirability of passing this Bill as it now stands without any of the reservations suggested by the hon. Gentleman. This is conveyed by the representations of the official Representatives of the Colonies—the Agents General. I think I have a right to protest in the name of the Colonies against the assertions that have been made. The hon. Member has repeatedly asserted that one aim of those who speak on behalf of a responsible Government for Western Australia is the promotion of land jobbery. No more unfair or untrue statement was ever made. This movement in favour of responsible Government originated, as the hon. Member is well aware, many years ago. It did not originate in the idea of a Land Act at all; it was a national sentiment on the part of the people of Western Australia, who wished to have the same Government as other Australian Colonies. With regard to land grabbing, as I understand the hon. Member, he wants to suggest that the value of the land is so advantageous that men will be guilty of great political meanness in order to obtain control of it; but the hon. Member must be well aware that millions of acres of Western Australia are of little or no value at all. There are hundreds of thousands of acres of poisoned land, and in many districts the land is so poor that five acres would barely feed one sheep. I press this on the Committee, because I believe, if the statement of the hon. Member is to go abroad, many persons may be misled by it.

Then the hon. Member said that colonists were against immigration and free homesteads. There was no such evidence given before the Committee as that alleged by the hon. Member. What was said was that, in order to start a family in Western Australia, besides land, the sum of £300 was necessary. But where is that £300 to come from? Has the hon. Member any vast scheme of colonisation? Does he propose that the Government should furnish it? What does he mean by that? Where is it to come from? [Sir G. CAMPBELL: The Whisky Duties.] The hon. Member is fond of wild statements, which, when scrutinised, must be swept away. I believe the common-sense of the Committee will prevail. They will see that, if we grant responsible Government to the Western Australians, we must give them control of the land as well. [Sir G. CAMPBELL: Why?] Because we cannot separate the administrative power and the electoral power, and at the same time keep in the hands of the Home Government the sale and revenue of the land. Therefore, the Government came to the conclusion that they would not be justified in passing any system of responsible Government for Western Australia which would not at the same time give the control of the land. If the colonists are entitled to control the Government, they are also entitled to control the land.

*MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): Will they have power to alienate the land?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: If the hon. Member means power to sell or lease the land, certainly they will have that power. The Government cannot assent to the proposal of the hon. Member, and I do not think I need take up time in going over all the details of his speech.

*(8.20.) MR. T. H. BOLTON: Although there may be few Members who are prepared to follow the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy in the course he has taken, there are a large number of persons in the country who have considerable doubt as to the policy which the Government are pursuing in connection with this Bill. There is no indisposition to give full representative institutions to Western Australia, but there is a very great disinclination on the part of many people at home to the handing over to this new Government these enormous unoccupied territories. The feeling of the Australian Colonies may be in favour of the land of Australia being used entirely for the benefit of the Australians—that is not unreasonable from an Australian standpoint; but I very much doubt whether the other colonies have been fully consulted as to the placing of this vacant land under the absolute control of this particular Legislature. I know individuals have appeared before the Committee who stated that the other Australian Colonies desired to see the vacant lands placed under the control of the proposed new Legislature; but other people have said that these vacant lands ought to be placed under the joint control of the Australian Colonies. No reliable opinion on this particular question has been obtained from the Australian Colonies as a whole.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON: I have taken the evidence as I find it in the Blue Book; but if there is other evidence which was before the Committee, it ought to have been put in the Blue Book. I repeat that I doubt whether this particular question has been fully considered by the Australian Colonies. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy has formulated his views in, perhaps, not a very acceptable way; but we know and understand his wishes and desires in this matter. What are they? That ample territory should be given, but that this great unknown territory on the east and the fertile territory on the south should, to some extent, be reserved, in the hope that they may be available for English colonists. We are now told by the Government that the Australian Colonies all desire this Bill should pass without delay. I admit, under these circumstances, it is very difficult to interpose. We have no desire to stand in the way of giving full and free institutions to Western Australia; we only desire that those institutions should be adapted to what we consider are the claims of the Mother Country in connection with the vacant lands, and to retain control over national domains in the interest of the crowded population of this country. We must submit, I suppose, to the passing of this Bill, but I re-echo the sentiment expressed by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy that, at all events, it shall not be said there were not some Members of this House to raise a protest against handing over the entire control of these national domains to a few people in the colony retaining no Imperial control in the interest of the crowded population in this country. (8.30.)

(9.1.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

DR. CLARK (Caithness): If we could modify this clause so as to prevent evils arising in Western Australia which have arisen in other Australian colonies, especially in Victoria, we might amend the land clause so as to prevent the full control of the land being in the hands nominally of the Members of the Council; but I do not see how we can bring that about by any practicable means, and, therefore, I support the clause in its present form. I am somewhat astonished at the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for Kirkcaldy, because if it were adopted it would bring about the very state of things he so strongly objects to. There are two aspects in which to regard this question. The first is, with regard to the creation of a Crown Colony; and here I am glad to see that the Committee have so amended the Bill that its present form is far better than that in which it originally stood. Under present circumstances, I think it much better to give the full control of the whole of the land right away to the north to the present Assembly and Council than to divide it and place our portion under separate control. My hon. Friend (Sir George Campbell) knows something about the Administration of India, but the Administration of the Australian Colonies is a different matter. If this Bill be carried, the land will be under the control of the Government of Western Australia, who will, of course, be amenable to Parliamentary control, and can be "heckled" by gentlemen holding the same views as the hon. Baronet in the Legislative Assembly; but if it be not carried, you will have, instead of this, a Commissioner appointed by the Government, and the whole control of the land will be in his hands and that of the Sub-Commissioners. There would, in that case, be no power in the hands of the people, and there would be a thousand times more jobbery than if you had an Assembly by which the action of the Ministry in regard to the land could be called in question. If there were any effectual means of carrying out a system of Imperial control something might be said in favour of the proposal of my hon. Friend. But the working of the colonial system is this: A colonial man is usually appointed, for it is rarely found that an Imperial official gets the appointment unless he has been a colonial man, and is appointed at the suggestion of the colonists, and thoroughly under the influence of colonial ideas. But if this Amendment be carried, the result will be that, instead of the land being controlled by a Minister responsible to an elected body, it is controlled by a Commissioner, and appointed by the Government, and by assistant Commissioners under him, uncontrolled by public opinion, and the alienation of the land will go on to a very large extent. The leases, which the holders regard as freeholds, will be multiplied; and if there is anything my hon. Friend desires not to have, he will secure it by the passage of his Amendment. I think the passing of the clause as it stands would be the best solution of the question, and I trust, therefore, that the Amendment will not be pressed.

*(9.7.) CAPTAIN BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): I am one of those who do not wish to see the whole of the land of Western Australia placed entirely under the control of the new constitution. I cannot agree, however, with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle that a Bill of this sort, having been considered by a Select Committee, it is scarcely fair, and, in fact, almost ridiculous, for us to discuss it at any considerable length. It seems to me that this Bill is one that contains more important matter than any measure that has been submitted to the House during the present Session, and, if passed, it will settle for a long time the question of the government of a large portion of the western territory of Australia. I have not the fear which some hon. Members have, that, if this Bill is passed, it will result in different individuals here and there becoming possessed of enormous blocks of land to the ultimate detriment of the colony. The hon. Member for East Mayo overlooked the fact that in the colonies he spoke of the alienations of large tracts of land took place a great many years ago before public opinion was directed to these matters and when it was held that the best way of opening up the country was to allow individuals to acquire possession of large masses of territory. In these days, however, the force of public opinion will be far too strong in the colony to allow of such a course of procedure. I may say that if we look at the sales made by the Government of Western Australia it will be found that a very small quantity of land has been alienated in this way, but that large tracts have been allowed to be let upon lease, from which a considerable income has been derived and is still flowing in. An important question arising on this head is, what should be the proper destination of this income? I have been enabled to obtain from the somewhat imperfect records of this House some information as to the Australian Colonies, from which I have gathered a few figures which are not without interest. The fact is undoubted that a large sum has been realised over a series of years from the sale and leasing of land, and, roughly speaking, about one-third of that income has been expended on matters relating either to the land itself or to the native population. I think it a perfectly legitimate procedure that the income arising from the sale and letting of those large tracts of land shall, to some extent, be used in opening up a territory for the future benefit of the colony. Then comes the question, what has become of the rest of the income which has been flowing in from the rest of those sources? It has gone in the relief of the taxation of the colonists, men who are quite as well able to bear their share of taxation as any individuals in this country. Why should they be relieved of taxation by the sale and lease of waste lands to which they have no particular right? If the Committee will allow me I will quote a few figures. Take, for instance, the colony of New Zealand for the five years from 1871 to 1875. The average annual income in that period for the sale and lease of waste lands was £677,000. The amount expended on the lands was £374,000, so that the remaining £300,000 annually has gone towards the relief of the taxation of New Zealand. The land belongs not to New Zealand, but to the State as a whole. Precisely the same state of things exists in New South Wales. In the years 1867-8-9-70, the average annual income of New South Wales from the sale and lease of waste lands was £526,000, and the average annual expenditure about £200,000. The amount of the direct taxation of New South Wales was £880,000, so that really more than one-third of the amount is met by the income for the sale and lease of waste lands. Why should those people, who are undoubtedly wealthy and well-to-do, be relieved of taxation to the extent of something like one-third? I think the figures I have mentioned fortify the argument I have suggested, that the means derived from the sale and lease of waste lands ought not to be devoted to the relief of taxation of individual communities, inasmuch as the lands so dealt with do not belong to them any more than to other portions of the Empire. Take New Zealand. The large sums of money raised from the sale and lease of waste lands ought to have been spent very much more than they have been spent upon the elevation of the condition of the natives. We know what were the troubles in past times in New Zealand in connection with the natives. Unfortunately, in New Zealand, as in other countries where we have to deal with large numbers of natives, a much larger sum of money ought to have been spent in trying to educate and improve the condition of the natives. That, of course, is much less true of Australia than of New Zealand, but still it has some truth in Australia. But whether the money is spent on the natives or for purposes of colonisation, or, as suggested, for the provision of free homesteads for colonists, I am quite clear that in the case of Western Australia, where you have such a small community, and such a huge area of land, that it is unjust that the money arising from the sale and lease of waste lands should be applied to the relief of the taxation of 40,000 or 50,000 people who at present dwell in the colony. I must own I should like to hear what answer the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle has to give to the argument I have advanced. It is argued that the colonists of Australasia have petitioned Parliament to pass this Bill, and, in fact, to assign all the waste land to the Government which is to be set up under this Bill. I think we are inclined to give a little too much weight to the arguments, wishes, and Petitions of the colonists. After all, though we derive benefit from having colonies, it should not be forgotten that the colonies derive very great benefit from having us. I do not think it is a sound argument, that because a colony, perhaps separated from Western Australia by 2,000 miles, petitions in favour of the Bill, we should be told by that colony what we are to do, nor do I think that New South Wales has a very lively claim to insist upon Parliament acting in a particular way. I quite admit that if you federate Australia the case is very much altered. There is a great deal that could be said for the revenues derived from the sale and lease of waste lands being managed by a Federal Government which cannot be said for a single colony. I should personally raise no objection whatever if the money were to be placed under the control of a Federal Parliament and used for the Imperial benefit of Australia. I am doing my best to support the right hon. Gentleman and his Government. I understand that it was the original intention of the Bill to alienate a portion of the land, but that the Select Committee altered the proposition. I do not know whether I may look forward to the possibility of the Government changing its mind, and re-inserting in the Bill the 26th parallel of south latitude. I feel considerable doubt whether it is quite wise to give to a single Government the control of a territory the limits of which are distant 1,000, 800, and 600 miles. But, be that as it may, I do not entertain the fears expressed by Radical Members of this House. My views are entirely confined to the question of what I think is just. This enormous quantity of land does not belong to a small section of the people, but to the entire Empire, and it should not be applied to the relief of the taxation of a particular section of the community, but should be devoted, more or less, to Imperial purposes. I should have supported the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy had he drawn a less quaint line through the territory. I think he would have been better advised if he had moved the words as they stood in the original Bill, and I then should have been disposed to support him. The question is, if I moved an Amendment to the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman, whether there would be the slightest chance of its being accepted. But when I consider the want of interest in the Bill, and all that has been said, I think it would be hardly worth while to put the Committee to the trouble of considering an Amendment to the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman.

(9.30.) MR. J. MORLEY: The hon. Member who has just spoken has spoken, as he always does, in a serious and candid manner, and, as he has appealed to me, it is due to him that I should say at once what I have to say on his extremely interesting and fair remarks. I do not think he has quoted rightly the original proposal of the right hon. Gentleman on the Front Bench opposite, because the proposal originally embodied in Clause 4 was felt to be so absolutely untenable, in the face of the great body of evidence we listened to, that it would have been impossible to consider it, and I cannot admit that the Select Committee which sat to consider this Bill was divided by Party considerations. As to whether it is fair and desirable and compatible with the principles of Imperial policy to allow the revenues derived from this enormous tract of land to be expended for the benefit of the present generation of Western Australian colonists, and perhaps a generation to come, I agree with the hon. and gallant Member that it is not desirable. But it is a practical question whether we can have these large unexplored tracts of land brought within the sphere of agricultural, or even pastoral, operations, unless we allow individual ownership, even on a scale which is found afterwards to be objectionable.

An hon. MEMBER: Why so?

MR. J. MORLEY: Well, let us listen first of all to experience. Sir William Robinson, the present Governor of Western Australia, and a Colonial Governor of much experience, has placed the matter very clearly before the Select Committee. He stated that it is impossible to start the colonies without making these squatter allotments. He said further—

"Pastoral occupation is the only occupation understood here, and we owe a large debt of gratitude to those gentlemen who brought out their capital from England and took large tracts of land—and some of them, perhaps, hold them still. Without these large grants it may be said that Australia would not have arrived at the position she now occupies."

(9.35.) CAPTAIN BETHELL: I think the right hon. Gentleman came in after I had gone through part of my argument. I do not object to land being rented or leased at all, but my contention is that the revenues of the lands ought to be applied to Imperial purposes, rather than to the relief of local taxation.

(9.36.) MR. J. MORLEY: I am aware that I did not hear the whole of the argument of the hon. and gallant Gentleman. I agree that the Revenues derived from the selling or leasing of these lands ought to be set apart for large purposes, but if the hon. and gallant Gentleman means that the proceeds of land sales or alienations in Western Australia ought to be in any way taken possession of for Imperial purposes at large outside the colonies, I cannot assent to the principle. Practical difficulties ought not to be lost sight of in carrying out theoretically sound principles. I am not sure, however, that the Australian colonists have not learnt their lesson, and have not entirely set their faces against the alienation of large blocks of land. There, again, we have the evidence—which was not disproved by anyone who was called before the Committee—of Sir William Robinson, whose experience in some of the colonies has been very large. He told the Committee again and again that there had been a complete change in policy, and that the tendency of Australian legislation is no longer to job away lands; on the contrary, Sir William Robinson said that great jealousy is now exercised. I have looked very closely at the line proposed to be drawn by the Amendment of my hon. Friend, and I think it to be a most fantastic line. He himself has changed it since it has been before the Committee, the most extraordinary proposal ever brought before the House of Commons. The House is engaged on a Bill for giving responsible government to a colony which desires to have the control of the land, and the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy proposes to take away from the colony all the land which is of the greatest value. His proposals would exclude first, the goldfields, which are possessions of the utmost importance. He talks about picking the eyes of the lands, but surely that would be picking the eyes of the lands which the colony can have the control over. Secondly, he would exclude the oldest settlements in the country; thirdly, the forests, and all the timber industry, which is of great magnitude now, and will be of greater in the future; fourthly, the port of Albany, at which the mail steamers call, and which is the centre of communication with the outside world; fifthly, the main line of railway and the smaller tributary lines; and, finally, all the best land of the colony, both as to climate and rainfall. The hon. Gentleman's proposal would reduce the Bill to giving responsible Government to a community from whom you have taken all that which a colony most values. That is a thing which will not commend itself to anyone who inquires into the subject. It is asked why the Colonial Office should not reserve to itself the making or approving of land regulations for this tract of land north of parallel 26. I am not going to put before the House a long argument, but I will simply put before it for acceptance one or two considerations which were brought before the Committee. When you say that the Colonial Office is to make regulations for lands either north of 26, or any other sphere, what do you mean? With whose eyes are the Colonial Office seeing? It is clear that the Colonial Secretary would necessarily, in making these regulations, have to take the advice of the Governor of Western Australia. No one in the position of Secretary of State could make specific land regulations without the advice of the Colonial Government. But who is the Government? The Governor is a man who is paid by Western Australia, and he is working every day with Ministers who are practically nominated by the Colonial Legislature. In such circumstances, is it possible that the Colonial Office could make a single regulation for those lands that is not approved by the Colonial Legislature, whose Ministers will be constant and daily Colleagues of the Governor?

CAPTAIN BETHELL: Is it not so in South Africa?

MR. J. MORLEY: Yes, but I am not sure that it is to the people of South Africa a particularly satisfactory arrangement, and I am sure it is not going to last. And it only obtains in one single province of South Africa. So much for the old Clause 4. So much for the idea which in some quarters was entertained a few weeks or months ago. So much for the idea that the Secretary of State at home should reserve for himself the power to make regulations for this great tract of land north of 26 or north of 23. Now, I should like to turn to the other suggestion, which has been made in the Press and reproduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy to-night—I mean that we should keep these lands in our own hands until there is a Confederation of Australia. My hon. Friend who opened the subject to-night, I must say—no doubt involuntarily—misrepresented what happened at the Australian Congress. The right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies has, perhaps, sufficiently pointed this out, but I should like to make it perfectly clear. What Mr. Deakin said was not what my hon. Friend apparently wished the House to believe, namely, that he approved, of all things, of the administration of the lands by the Federal Government. Mr. Deakin said nothing of the kind. What he said was that it would be better that they should be administered and governed by the Federal Authority than by the best Cabinet administrators that could be collected in London. Of course, Mr.

Deakin was in entire accord with the view of the majority of the Committee. Mr. Deakin, therefore, cannot be quoted as an authority for the view put forward by my hon. Friend, nor does Sir James Steer give any countenance to the contention of my hon. Friend. The Blue Book is as good evidence as we can have that those who are most in favour of Australian Federation are most opposed to our retention of these lands in our own hands. In reference to federation, what position would Western Australia be in if she went into a Conference with a view to federation, and without having the control of her own lands? I say this—and I say it subject to the full criticism of those who know most—if there were such a Conference, and if the Colonial Secretary urged Western Australia to adopt federation, the answer would undoubtedly be, "You want us to federate. Give us back our own lands, so that we can go into the Conference on equal terms with the other colonies." Of course, hon. Gentlemen can see for themselves that if they want Western Australia to go on fair terms into a Federation Conference, Western Australia must be in a position to make a bargain. I am reminded that Mr. Parker, the leader of the Opposition in the Federation Conference, stated in his evidence—

"I do not think that Western Australia would ever dream of entering into federation until she had the entire control of her own lands."

I submit that to Gentlemen who are in favour of an Australian Confederation there is one more objection to the Amendment from a federation point of view. I would point out that the subtraction of these lands from Western Australia, and the proposal to transfer them to a Federal Authority is incompatible with that policy of immigration and emigration of which my hon. Friend the Member for Carnarvon (Mr. Rathbone) is presently going to speak. Depend upon it that the Federal Authority will not allow you to make your own emigration arrangements, and will be much less likely even than the Western Australian Government to do so. Therefore, when you say, "Reserve these lands with a view ultimately to handing them over to a Federal Authority," you make a proposals which will be most fatal to your favourite wish of reserving these lands and putting a certain population upon them. There is no proof so far that the lands in Western Australia have been jobbed. The Western Australians are like other Englishmen, and Irishmen, and Scotchmen, they do not sit content under oppression, and we may take it for granted that there is sufficient public opinion in Western Australia to make very short work of any attempt to job away these lands. We who sat on the Committee went into the land regulations. They are recorded in the Report submitted to this House, and I venture to say they are regulations to which the extremest Radical, short, of course, of a land nationaliser, could take little exception. They seem to me, and I think to most Members of the Committee, to have been framed with the utmost care to prevent that accumulation of land, very often under bogus titles of occupation, which has had some bad results in other colonies, and I dare say would have had results in Western Australia. The Committee went very carefully into the whole question, and came to the conclusion that the suggestion that the Secretary of State should regulate these lands was a most hopeless one, especially with regard to the gold-fields. It was made wonderfully clear to the Committee that auriferous lands require constant and minute power from month to month of varying regulations, and it would be quite hopeless to subject them to the delays of the Colonial Office—although, no doubt, such delays are no worse in the Colonial Office than in other Government Departments. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy says it takes a month to get from Perth to some of these lands. But there is a telegraph, and it is possible for a Minister sitting in Perth to vary a regulation in the course of half an hour or an hour.

(10.0.)* MR. SETON-KARR (St. Helen's): I entirely agree with many of the arguments that have been put forward by the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, although it is not often that we find ourselves in agreement. I was one of those who, in discussing this Bill before it went to a Select Committee, expressed a strong opinion that the Imperial Government would not be justified in giving away this enormous territory to the entire control of a Western Australian responsible Government. I wish to say that, in spite of my desire to the contrary, I have entirely changed my mind. I am not a Member of the Select Committee, but I have read the evidence that was given before it, and have had the opportunity of meeting some of the Representatives of the colony—Sir William Robinson in particular—and I have come to the conclusion that it is impossible to give Western Australia responsible Government without giving up to it the control of the land. The arguments of the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) on the matter from the federation point of view are absolutely convincing. Another reason for giving up the whole of this territory to Western Australia is to be found in the nature of the land. A considerable part is not favourable to white labour, and it would, therefore, be almost useless to this country. I admit that it would be unwise for Great Britain to give up valuable lands that might be conveniently utilised by her for colonisation purposes hereafter, but these lands are not, for the most part, of that character; and if we keep them the only result will be to offend the susceptibilities of the colonists. It might turn out that it would be impossible to make proper use of these lands, and it seems to me we are bound, if we are going to give responsible Government to Western Australia, not to retain the land. Otherwise we shall be showing a certain amount of want of faith in the Government. As we are told by the West Australian Representatives, they must be as anxious as we are to see that these lands are put to good use. They must be anxious to have colonists of a proper kind, and that will be a source of strength to the country. They would do everything in their power to facilitate any colonisation of the kind. On the other hand, supposing we want to colonise land, I do not see how we can carry out any colonisation scheme in the face of the opposition of the responsible Government of Western Australia. It seems to me, therefore, that we may as well do the thing with a good grace and a free hand. From the federation standpoint, from the practical standpoint, from the standpoint of those who believe in the good faith of the responsible Government of Western Australia, I am in favour of giving them the whole of this territory, large as it may seem; and I am strengthened in that view by seeing that we shall have, under Clause 6 of the Bill, some future control over a portion of the land if occasion arises for anything of the kind. I believe we shall subsequently have an Amendment moved with regard to the emigration clauses. I shall listen with interest to what may be said on that point, and, in the meantime, I shall vote against this Amendment.

*(10.8.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I am not surprised that the Amendment has not been understood by my hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Wodehouse), for I confess that even with the light thrown on it by his speech to-night I do not understand, and I do not think the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy does himself understand it. But I really must protest against the unjust way in which my hon. Friend has spoken of the proceedings of the Committee. I have sat on about as many Select Committees as most Members, and I can say with confidence that there never was a Committee which did its work more thoroughly. We sat on 12 different occasions, examined nine witnesses, and asked about 3,900 questions, of which my hon. Friend (Sir George Campbell) put his full share, and we were practically unanimously agreed as to the conclusions at which we arrived. The Bill, as originally framed, proposed to reserve all the land North of the 26th parallel, but it was found that that would be a great mistake, because it would be retaining land that was absolutely useless and giving away all that was valuable. It would also have involved this country in the vexed question of Chinese or Asiatic labour, without which the land reserved could not be cultivated. But now the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy proposes to reserve the best part of the colony, and to give over to the colonists the worst part. I need hardly say that that is really trifling with the colonists of West Australia. They have asked for bread, and it is proposed we should give them a stone. It is proposed we should reserve the Port of Albany for ourselves. That is a mere idle proposal. It will be futile if we give the colony responsible Government. It is quite clear that the Colonial Office, in such matters, has been and will be guided entirely by the opinion and the action of the Governor, and that Governor will be guided by the action of his responsible advisers. I wish hon. Members to bear in mind that the Select Committee was a strong Committee. It was composed of men who went into the committee-room with perfectly open minds, and who came to what was practically a unanimous conclusion. When the hon. Member was challenged, he did not venture to put the Committee to the trouble of a Division on this point. It does seem to me that if we are to go over all these matters again without trusting to the decision which was come to by the Select Committee who heard and weighed the evidence, there is not much use in hearing a Select Committee at all. I sincerely hope the Committee will shortly proceed to decide the question.

*(10.15.) MR. WODEHOUSE: I entirely agree with what has been urged by the right hon. Members for Newcastle and East Denbighshire, and it is unnecessary for me to repeat their arguments; but as the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy made direct references to me in the course of his speech, I must say a word. I take no exception whatever to those references, because they were most kindly and friendly, but I cannot subscribe to all that he said without some reserve and qualification. He spoke of me as tainted by my experience of the Colonial Office with a conviction of the incapacity and incompetency of that Office. To this I cannot for a moment assent. Although my connection with the Colonial Office was brief, and by no means important, I may be allowed to say that my experience there led me to believe that the permanent staff of the Office were specially capable and efficient. Mistakes have, no doubt, been often made by the Colonial Office, but they have not, in my opinion, been due so much to the traditions of the Office and the incompetency of its permanent Staff as to vacillations in colonial policy, caused by deference to passing phases of public opinion and the pressure of Parliamentary exigencies. Nothing is more fatal to efficiency of administration than a vacillating policy. If I were asked to adduce the latest illustration of a blunder made by the Colonial Office from deference to a passing gust of public opinion I should mention Clause 4 of this Bill in its original form—a clause introduced into it, as I believe, against the better judgment of the Colonial Office. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy referred to my inability to understand his Amendment, as evidence of the hurry with which this Bill was hurried through the Select Committee [Sir G. CAMPBELL: This Amendment.] It is hardly fair to cite my inability to comprehend his Amendment as a conclusive proof of the hurry with which it was disposed of, because, although it is perfectly true that my inability to understand the Amendment may have been due to the limitations of my own intelligence it may also have arisen from the imperfection of the hon. Member's exposition. Though I may not have comprehended the full and precise scope of the hon. Gentleman's Amendment, I did understand that he proposed to reserve some of the land in the Southern part of Western Australia, and I thought it unnecessary to linger on that point, because it was clear from all the evidence we had before us that any reservation of lands in the Southern districts would be absolutely fatal to the establishment of responsible Government. I believe there is no desire in any quarter of the House to withhold responsible Government from Western Australia, but the acceptance of such an Amendment as this would, I am sure, be fatal to the end and object of the Bill. It seems to me that an arrangement by which we should reserve lands for the control of the Secretary of State, and yet allow the responsible Government of the Colony to extend its administration over those reserved lands, would be quite unworkable. The power reserved would be ineffective for any good Imperial purpose, while it would provoke constant irritation in the colony. If you want to reserve lands and have full control of them, do not leave them to be administered by the responsible Government, but create a Crown Colony, which would be under the entire control of the Colonial Office. Upon that Office Parliament can always make its authority and influence felt. But the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy contains no such proposal. It proceeds on the lines of Clause 4 of the original Bill; but makes a reservation infinitely more distasteful to the Colonists than the reservation made by that clause, and all the evils attaching to it would be multiplied tenfold by the Amendment of the hon. Member. There is no precedent for a reservation of waste lands on the grant of responsible Government to a colony; and Western Australia could regard it as a special mark of undeserved suspicion and distrust.

(10.25.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: That has happened which I rather apprehended would happen, and that is, hon. Members have different plans and are not able to agree. I seem to have failed to make my plan intelligible. It is a geographical plan, and if any Member chooses to take up a map and mark out what I propose to reserve, he will have no difficulty in understanding my suggestion. But I quite admit this is a proposal which cannot well be thrashed out in the House. It might have been thrashed out in Committee, if the Committee had given their attention to it, but they objected ab initio, and I had no opportunity of discussing the matter. Perhaps I should be better advised if I took a Division upon the whole clause, rather than upon an Amendment which no one has understood. But let me say a word. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] I think it is scarcely consistent with fair play when I have been hit all round that I should not be allowed to say a word in my own defence. It has been said that my plan will deprive the colony of the gold mines. My objection to that is, that there are no considerable active gold mines at this moment. There are spots marked yellow on the map, but at the present time there are no very active gold mines. I think that it is not an unreasonable proposal to reserve the Albany country' from the control of the people of Perth, and keep the land for future colonisation.

(10.29.) MR. MORTON: I object to this land being given up to jobbers and speculators. We seem to have been deserted by the Front Opposition Bench. I do not know why, but it is so. And now we are told, on the authority of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, that the question was not fully discussed in Committee. On the other hand, we are told by the Members of the Front Opposition Bench that this matter was discussed and considered by a Select Committee, and that, therefore, we ought not to consider it here. Why is it brought here at all if we are not to consider it? I think we ought to consider it line by line.

MR. SETON-KARE rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

(10.30.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 183; Noes 41.—(Div. List, No. 166.)

Question put accordingly, "That those words be there inserted," and negatived.

*(10.47.) MR. CREMER: I think hon. Members will believe me that I have not the slightest desire to waste the time of the House after the long Debates which have taken place upon this Bill. But I cannot help moving the following Amendment, which raises what is to me a vital principle:—

Page 2, Clause 3, line 24, after the word "of" to omit the words, "the sale, letting, and disposal thereof including."

And at the end of the Clause to add the following words:—

"Provided always the Legislature of Western Australia shall not dispose of otherwise by letting the lands, royalties, mines, and minerals of the aforesaid colony."

If the Amendment which has just been negatived proved so very objectionable to many Members, I fear my Amendment, which is of a more drastic character than the proposal of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, will be still more so. I have been very much amused at the support which has been given to this Bill by Members of the Front Opposition Bench. To me the attitude which they have taken is mysterious. We do not usually find them countenancing and supporting the Government, and enabling them to pass their measures, and it is a matter of curiosity with me to know why, on this particular question, Members of the Front Opposition Bench should have gone out of their way to support this Bill, some of the provisions of which are absolutely objectionable to many Members sitting behind them. It has been urged that this Bill should be passed as speedily as possible, and that before many years have passed the objectionable clauses will be swept away. But what will happen while the sweeping-away process is going on. It was stated the other night that for 12 years no organic change could take place in the Constitution of Western Australia. Why, long before 12 years have elapsed all the land will have been snapped up by those who are promoting this Bill, and by a handful of men who will profit by and find seats in the Legislature of the colony. Being at a loss to understand the eagerness to pass the Bill, I looked for a reason in the Bill itself, and I found it in Clause 3. If this clause had not been incorporated in the Bill we should probably have heard very little about the Constitution of Western Australia. Clause 3 is the kernel of the whole question; and I object to it because it confers on a Legislature elected under a restricted suffrage the power of disposing of millions of acres of land with all mineral wealth and royalties. It does seem to me extraordinary that, while we protest against the appropriation by the few of the royalties of this country, we should hand over to 44,000 people, at the outside, the control of a territory as large as the half of Europe, if not larger. Out of the 44,000, I believe there will be only about 6,000 electors. It is, therefore, to 6,000 men, then, that you propose to hand over the control of an enormous territory. It is because I object to your doing so, and because I object to reproducing in the new world the evils of the old world, that I move this Amendment. It is clearly the real object of the promoters of the Bill to get hold of the waste lands of Western Australia. It is proposed to hand over to the Legislature of Western Australia the power to dispose of, or to let those lands, and if any evidence be needed, there is plenty at hand as to the folly and iniquity of this proposal. In support of this clause, evidence was supplied in the able speech of the hon. Member for East Mayo, whom no one has attempted to controvert, although several Members have sneered at him since he delivered it. [An hon. MEMBER: He supported the Bill.] Yes; the hon. Member supported the Bill because an appeal was made to the Irish Members to support it, on the ground that it was based upon Home Rule, and the result of that appeal is that scarcely any Irish Members have been found on these Benches during this evening, they having apparently been deluded by the statement that the Bill contains the principle of Home Rule. It may contain the sham principle of Home Rule, but I would put it to the Irish Members, whether they would accept a Home Rule Parliament elected by a restricted franchise and a property qualification for Members. I, for one, would vote against any such proposal, which I should regard as anti-progressive and anti-democratic. And I am surprised that the Irish Members have been deluded by the appeal made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle that they should assent to this Bill, because it contains the principle of Home Rule. The Bill proposes to hand over to a Legislature, constituted as it must be almost exclusively of men of property, the power to deal with the whole of the land, amounting to many millions of acres, in Western Australia. What, I ask, about the poor people of that colony? What about their power to direct the affairs of the Legislature and to check the land grabbing and land jobbing which will inevitably take place when this Bill is passed. It is all very well to tell us that in a few years the evils which the Constitution contains may be remedied, but long before that, long before the Legislature can be re-constructed on a democratic basis, the land will have been practically swallowed up by syndicates, formed, I hope not in this country, although it has been whispered that there are men who have assisted in the promotion of this Bill, who are connected with syndicates which have passed the first stage of their existence, and only await the passage of this measure to assume a crystallised form. The Bill proposes, in addition to allowing the Legislature of Western Australia to sell or do just as it pleases with the waste lands, also to deal with the subject of mines, minerals, and royalties. I do not suppose there are many Members of this House who share my views with regard to mineral wealth and royalties, but I know there are large numbers out of doors—I believe a growing number—who do share the view I have long entertained, that to allow any individual, I do not care how he has become possessed of the surface of the earth, whether by fair means or foul—I am afraid in most instances it is by the latter process—to appropriate the whole of the mineral wealth underlying the surface, and because a beneficent Creator, or the forces of Nature, have provided enormous quantities of valuable minerals in the bowels of the earth, to call those minerals his own, and charge the community for every handful of coal, copper, iron, or tin, or whatever else can be got at and brought to the surface, is a monstrous proposition, and it is because this Bill contains so pernicious a proposal that I offer my strongest opposition to it. Hon. Members opposite smile, but those who have watched the signs of the times in regard to the land question, who have studied the questions that are being raised in regard to the nationalisation, or communalisation, or municipalisation, as some people term it, of the land will admit that there is an enormous force of public opinion gathering around this question, and that the people are gradually being educated up to the views I have expressed, so that at no distant day hon. Gentlemen opposite will have to face these views when presenting themselves before the electors of the country, and will not be allowed to slide into this House, as they have hitherto been doing, without having to encounter these questions. We are often told when speaking of the evils of our system of land tenure that if we were going to begin again our opponents would be quite prepared to listen to our proposals, but that we ought to consider the enormous sum it would cost to buy up the landed interest of the United Kingdom. Well, we are going to begin in the case of Western Australia, and we propose at the starting-point that the Legislature shall not be allowed to produce in that part of the globe the evils which exist in such abundance in the adjacent colonies and in this country. If we make this start now the Western Australians will not be called upon in 20 or 30 years time to consider the problem which we have to face, how to get rid of the system of personal property in land, and how the money is to be raised to buy out the landlords. I am not surprised or frightened at the smiles of hon. Members at my suggestion. I have learned to live down ridicule. Twenty and more years ago I preached doctrines then received with derisive laughter; but I have seen those doctrines taken up and carried into effect by hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House. We protest against an enactment which will create in the new world evils of which we have bitterly to complain in the old world. We foresee the beginning of the evil, and are justified in registering our protest against it. Why this eagerness displayed on the two Front Benches to pass this Bill? I do not find any strong support in its favour elsewhere, and I do not think the Government can congratulate themselves on the halfhearted speeches made in its support by Members behind them. Why is there so much frantic eagerness displayed on the part of the two Front Benches to pass this Bill? It is mysterious to me, especially the deep anxiety on the part of the right hon. Member for Newcastle to get this Bill passed. I cannot help thinking that those who promote the Bill have been prospecting this part of the globe, and have looked with covetous eyes on the land occupied by the natives. They want, however, to prove that the natives have not been lost sight of in the bargain, because I notice that in Schedule C of the Bill the promoters try to throw dust in the eyes of the House, and the people of this country, by appearing in the guise of a pious and philanthropic body of men, and by proposing that a sum of £5,000 shall be appropriated for the welfare of the "aboriginal natives." Why, in a few years, if these men are allowed to pursue their nefarious practices no "aboriginal natives" will be left. Wherever the white man and the native have come into contact, the latter has been driven back by the advance of the former, as is shown by the history of the United States and the colonies. The chances are, therefore, that the £5,000 will never be expended for the benefit of the natives, for the reason that before many years have passed they will have disappeared. The Bill is promoted by landowners, or by those who are anxious to become so; and these men recognise in the passage of this Bill the readiest and the cheapest means of getting hold of land. I make my protest on behalf of the poor and the landless in that colony, who will be called upon to pay in the future for the huge plunder which will be committed if the Bill passes in its present shape. It has been urged over and over again that no one intends to grab or job the land of Western Australia, and the idea that this is intended has been repudiated with scorn and indignation. My Amendment will test the sincerity of those hon. Members who take this view. If they are perfectly certain that it will be looked upon as an iniquitous thing to do to take land in this way, if they are certain that the promoters have no such desire or inclination, then why not pass my Amendment and make it impossible for it to be done? I do not charge anyone positively with intending to appropriate their neighbours' land, but I have a shrewd suspicion that Clause 3 is agreeable to those who have that object in view. I want to make it impossible, and if my Amendment is passed it will deprive the Legislature of Western Australia, or the promoters of this Bill, of the power to do that which the Bill proposes to confer upon them by Clause 3. The form in which the clause would run with my Amendment and addition would be as follows:—

"The entire management and control of waste lands of the Crown of the colony of Western Australia, and of the proceeds of all royalties, mines, and minerals, shall be vested in the Legislature of that colony; provided always that the Legislature of Western Australia shall not dispose of, otherwise than by letting, such lands, royalties, mines, and minerals in the aforesaid colony."

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 24, to leave out the words the "sale, letting, and disposal thereof."—(Mr. Cremer.)

(11.10.) BARON H. DE WORMS: The logic of the hon. Member's speech can be best gathered from the last sentence he uttered—that if the Committee are sure that this land-grabbing system will not take place they would make it impossible by accepting the Amendment. But if hon. Members are sure that this will not take place, of course, the Amendment is unnecessary. Indeed, there is very little in the speech of the hon. Member worth answering. The hon. Member has made a series of charges against those whom he chooses to call the promoters of the Bill. Who are they? The hon. Member has not been able to explain who the promoters of the Bill are. The promoters of the Bill are the people of Western Australia. But the hon. Member speaks of them as if they were a body of private individuals promoting a Bill for their own interests. In the name of the colonists, I repudiate, in the strongest possible terms, the accusations the hon. Member has chosen to level against them, without a shadow of foundation. Judging by the speech of the hon. Member, it is evident that he has not studied the subject in order to become master of it; for he speaks of this power of sale as if it were an innovation, introduced now for the first time, conferring this new Constitution. He does not seem to be aware that it exists in the Constitution of every one of the other Australian colonies. Is there any reason why it should not also be given to Western Australia? The hon. Member has read us a lecture, not very intelligible, upon his principles of land nationalisation, but what it had to do with the Bill I am at a loss to imagine. Be that as it may, it is impossible that we can accept this Amendment. It simply means that while giving responsible government to Western Australia we should force the Government to await the assent of the Home Government before allowing them to deal with the lands under their control. Why, such a proposal is an insult to responsible government, and an insult to common sense. It is impossible for the Government to accept the Amendment, and I hope it will not be passed.

(11.12.) MR. NEVILLE (Liverpool, Exchange): I confess that all along I have regarded the Bill with a considerable amount of misgiving, and that feeling has increased as I have listened to the Debate. I do not for a moment impute to those responsible for the Bill other than a desire to do the best for Western Australia, but it by no means follows that they are acting in the wisest way in the course they have taken. I cannot help thinking that the Bill in effect will be far more in the interest of land speculators and land syndicates than of the people of Western Australia. It is said that this Bill represents the formulated desires of the people themselves, but it appears that the measure has only been carried in the Council with the assistance of the nominated members. It is a serious task we are engaged in. This Bill proposes that this country should give up to a small population, of about 40,000 persons, the last bit of land that England possesses for the purposes of colonisation, and not even to that number, but in reality to about one-fourth of that number. It is a proposal that deserves very serious consideration, and I must say I am inclined to support my hon. Friend in restricting the control over this vast territory. It is said it is our duty to endorse the opinion of the colonists of Western Australia that this Bill should be carried into effect in its present shape, but I altogether join issue with this statement. How is it that this handful of 40,000 people have remained in undisturbed possession of this enormous territory? Is it not because they have had the protection of the flag of England? We know that Germany has been seeking fields for colonisation, and does anyone suppose that but for the fact that these 40,000 persons in Western Australia have been backed up by England with its Military and Naval Forces, the emigrants could have held the colony against invasion and capture? Therefore, this country has paramount rights over the colony. If it were a question of giving territory to the people of Western Australia, I should feel very reluctant to interposing any obstacle in the way of the Bill, but we find that only a small minority of the people are concerned. The hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) has shown clearly the difficulty in which the people will be placed. Under the present proposed conditions, with a limited suffrage and qualification for representation, the Bill may be fitly described as a Bill for the creation of landlordism in Western Australia. Its effect will be to create a class of large landowners whose existence will be detrimental to the future of the colony. It is no answer to say that in a few years democracy will get the upper hand. Years hence it may be, and after a serious struggle, the people will find they have the shell, while someone else has walked off with the kernel. With these views as to the Bill, I shall certainly support the Amendment of my hon. Friend, though I may point out that the Amendment ought to limit the power of leasing to a certain number of years, since a lease of 1,000 years is practically the same thing as a sale.

(11.20.) MR. W. A. M'ARTHUR: There is one remark to be made to the hon. Member when he speaks of the power of England having protected Australia as part of the Empire. I can assure the hon. Member that if the Australian colonies still retain their connection with Great Britain it is largely because the principles which the hon. Member for Liverpool has just laid down have never been carried out by any English Parliament. The hon. Member for Haggerston has twitted us with not supporting the Front Bench; but I may say there are many of us well qualified who would have been glad to take part in the Debate in support of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle had we not been anxious that the Bill should be passed quickly, and had not such an interminable time been occupied by one or two hon. Members in stating objections which have been stated and answered over and over again, both in the Committee and in the House. The entire weight of Australian opinion is on the side of the Government and of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle. On the other side are the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, an English lawyer, and a Representative of the English working men. What is the use of experience in the House, what is the use of Committees inquiring carefully into such questions if, after the best colonial opinion has been taken, it is to be deliberately set aside at the bidding of a few English Radicals, few of whom have been out of England in their lives. Now I think we who know the colonies, and are connected with the colonies, have some right to complain of the universal vituperation employed by the hon. Member for Haggerston. The hon. Member spoke of the connection between the two Front Benches. It is a pity that a question of Government and Opposition should be introduced at all into colonial questions, for all ought to be equally interested in the progress of the Colonies. Then the hon. Member spoke of the promoters of the Bill, and of their anxiety to grab land. To whom did the hon. Member refer? This is a monstrous insult levelled against the public men of Australia.

*MR. CREMER: It has been done repeatedly in other Australian Colonies, and we are warranted in supposing the same of this case.

MR. W. A. M'ARTHUR: These men are doing their duty to their constituents, to whom they are responsible. What does the hon. Member mean? He is a man without any colonial experience, and yet he calmly and deliberately makes a monstrous charge against Australian public men—a charge amounting to one of downright theft—without a tittle of evidence or a single circumstance to justify it. That is not the conduct which will endear the English Radicals to the working men of Australia, at least if they think that the hon. Member represents the feelings of English working men. The hon. Member and others who have spoken are absolutely ignorant of the conditions under which land is obtained in Australia. They seem to think that anyone can go to Australia and take up some millions of acres and then come to reside in England until the land has greatly increased in value. But, as a matter of fact, the man who takes up land has to fence it and improve it, and fulfil many residential conditions, failing to fulfil which he loses his title to the land.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): We are anxious for information. Will the hon. Member permit me to ask him if in Western Australia a man takes a sheep run he is compelled to fence it and live there?

MR. W. A. M'ARTHUR: I never should have thought that anybody would object to land being taken for sheep runs. It is an excellent thing for the colony that as much land as possible should be taken in this way until it is available for purchase. You do not give the land to squatters, you simply let their sheep cross it. [An hon. MEMBER: With right of pre-emption.] The hon. Member for Haggerston has said that syndicates are already interested in the passing of the Bill in order to get up sales of land in Australia, and the hon. Member hinted that Members of Parliament were interested in the syndicates. Again, what does the hon. Member mean? Is this a charge of fraud not only against Members of the Western Australian Legislature, but also against Members of the House of Commons?

*MR. CREMER: All through the hon. Member has put words into my mouth which I did not use. I did not say that hon. Members of this House were interested in promoting these syndicates. I object to the hon. Gentleman misinterpreting the language which I employed. I merely said that there were rumours or whispers which I and others had heard.

MR. W. A. M'ARTHUR: I never said the hon. Member accused Members of this House of being members of these syndicates. I repeated what the hon. Member said, that there were syndicates interested in the passing of the Bill, in order to have the advantage of it.

*MR. CREMER: I did not say so.

MR. W. A. M'ARTHUR: Then the hon. Member insinuated it. If this honest Representative of the English Radical working man thinks he improves his position by that, he is welcome to the opinion, and I am glad I have given him the opportunity of making the correction. I venture to say I am quite sure that I am speaking the sentiments of the Radical working men of my constituency, who are much more likely to take their views and facts about Australia from one who was born there, and who has worked there for many years, than from irresponsible persons who get their information out of books and newspapers. I do not believe the Committee will say all these, our fellow-subjects in Australia, are thieves together promoting this Bill in order to divide the land and grow rich together. I do not believe the Committee is prepared to take that view, and to make Western Australia a sort of Cinderella among the colonies. If we are going to give self-government to Western Australia let us give it with both hands, not in a grudging, niggardly spirit. Let us not say we do not trust the colonists to act fairly with these lands. I trust that the House will disregard this and every other Amendment, and pass the Bill as it stands.

(11.30.) MR. STOREY: I am in sympathy with my hon. Friend, and say with him, "Australia for the Australians." But I venture to think that, though he is usually one of the most genial of men, he has imported into this discussion a certain amount of personal feeling which was entirely unnecessary. My hon. Friend the Member for Haggerston may in the course of his lengthy speech have said one or two things to which exception might be taken; but if we eliminate the personal element, what is it we have to consider? Will my hon. Friend, who was born in Australia, deny that most of the difficulties which have arisen in other Australian colonies have sprung from the fact that the original land legislation was bad? Under the legislation which our forefathers unfortunately permitted, great grants of land were made to a limited number of persons, with the evil result that the people at large, and especially the working classes, were for years and years prevented acquiring land. I put it to hon. Members and to the House that if the land legislation of the colonies in the past has been bad, we ought now to enable Western Australia to start on a better basis. I say it is the business of this Committee to seize the present opportunity of doing this. Of course, I admit that the right hon. Baronet in charge of this Bill is as innocent of syndicates as I am. I admit, too, that my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle is as innocent of syndicates as he is of sin. In fact, I would not impute to any Member of this House that he has any personal object to serve by supporting this Bill. I do not think that that enters into the question at all. I put it to the House that the system of land legislation in Australia in the past has been bad, and the Amendment of my hon. Friend is a step in the right direction, since, while it would promote the letting of the land, it would retain the legal estate in the land in the authority of the Parliament of the colony. We hold that that would be a good thing. How thankful should we be in this country if, under our land system, we could make great reforms! I submit that, under Clause 3 as it stands, it will be competent for a limited number of persons to become owners of large tracts of land in Western Australia. What would prevent it?

MR. J. MORLEY: Their own land regulations.

MR. STOREY: If my right hon. Friend will agree to put in a clause referring the settlement of this to the colony when it has representative Government, I am at one with him. But so far as my experience goes, and I have not been in Australia, although I have personal and practical reasons for knowing what has been the result of past land legislation there, it has been bad, and in my opinion, the inevitable effect of this Bill will be to cause large quantities of land to pass into the hands of a limited number of persons. I shall consequently support the Amendment.

(11.40.) DR. CLARK: When my hon. Friend says that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Haggerston is absurd and that nothing of the kind which he has suggested has ever taken place in our colonies, I must differ from him. I remember that this very same difficulty occurred in New Zealand, and an election was fought on the question. I do not think that my hon. Friend the Member for Haggerston has exaggerated the matter at all. As far as land jobbing is concerned, there are plenty of examples of it in a Return which has been furnished to the House, for it shows that individuals and companies own blocks of land ranging from 5,000,000 of acres downwards, the largest being the Bank of New South Wales, with 5,000,000 acres.

CAPTAIN BETHELL: Those are all leases.

DR. CLARK: They are leases, but they are practically freeholds. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh has stated that, as far as Victoria is concerned, the matter has been settled fairly well, but the right hon. Gentleman must know that it was only after two absolute deadlocks had occurred that a compromise was arrived at.

*MR. CHILDERS: I did not refer at all to the land policy of Victoria; but solely to the constitution of the two Houses.

DR. CLARK: The contention was then, as it is now, that the squatting element and land jobbers jobbed away the land, and prevented the people from getting on it. I contend that this Amendment will prevent a great many of the evils that might result from the constitution of a new Assembly with a freehold qualification for members.

*(11.48.) MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I wish to say a few words on this question, although it has been discussed at such enormous length. The question seems to me to turn upon the point whether the House, with the evils of the land system in this country before it, should give the land in this enormous colony in perpetuity to the squatting class, or whether it should insist upon the land being reserved for the whole community, and the power to deal with it vested in the hands of a popularly-elected Assembly. Under the Bill it is proposed to give power to dispose, at one fell swoop, not only of lands, but of mines and mineral royalties. That this proposal should be made is astonishing, knowing, as the Government must, that the royalty system is the curse of the industry of Great Britain, and has so seriously hampered it in the competition with Belgium, Germany, and other countries. And yet they are seeking to establish and perpetuate it in a country where hitherto it has been unknown. Let us, at least, leave the minerals alone, so that the inhabitants of the country may work them in the future unhampered by extortionate taxes. Some hon. Members have expressed astonishment at the apparent compact on this question between the two Front Benches. To me it is in no way astonishing, for, as far as I can see, the only division between the two Front Benches is the solid mahogany table between them, with its bauble and its books. This is almost the first time this Session that an opportunity has presented itself for discussing a real Democratic question, and it is desirable that the people should be placed in a position to know who are their friends and who are opposed to them.

(11.54.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE rose in his place, and claimed to move "That the Question be now put," but the CHAIR-

MAN withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

(11.55.) MR. P. MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): I shall move to report Progress. I think that the Act in its present shape would be most reactionary. The colonies generally are limiting the areas of land that can be acquired by individuals or bodies of individuals, but this measure will sanction the acquisition of immense areas in Western Australia. I am not taking this step with a view of embarrassing the Government; on the contrary, I shall be glad to assist them in getting the Bill through. But I am interested in Australia, and I hold that the scheduled Act does not go far enough in giving representation to the people. I beg to move that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Pritchard Morgan.)

*(11.57.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I hope that the hon. Member will not persevere with his Motion. The question before the Committee has been very fully discussed, not only this evening, but on other occasions. The real question to be determined is whether the colony is to have self-government or not. The Motion of the hon. Member, if not withdrawn, must seriously delay the progress of business.

(11.59.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 74; Noes 187.—(Div. List, No. 167.)

(12.10.) It being after midnight, the Chairman proceeded to interrupt the business: whereupon,

MR. W. H. SMITH rose in his place, and claimed to move "That the Question, be now put."

Motion made, and Question proposed "That the Question be now put."

House cleared for a Division.

MR. STOREY [speaking seated, with his hat on]: Mr. Courtney, we shall be obliged if you will explain to us how it is that the First Lord of the Treasury can make this Motion after 12 o'clock?

THE CHAIRMAN [speaking seated]: The point of order has been explained, I think, a score of times, and will be probably followed many more times. When a Division is in progress at 12 o'clock, the interruption of business is the close of the Division, and at that point it is possible to move the Closure.

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

Question put accordingly, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

Mr. W. H. SMITH rose in his place, and claimed to move "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

Mr. P. MORGAN [speaking seated, with his hat on]: I wish, Sir, to call your attention to the fact that I have had an Amendment on the Paper for the last fortnight, and that I have been attending the House for a fortnight in order to bring it forward. It is an important Amendment affecting the welfare of the people of Western Australia.

THE CHAIRMAN [speaking seated]: It is entirely in the discretion of the Chair to estimate the value of Amendments so passed over. I believe the hon. Member is mistaken in supposing that the Amendment is not included in the Bill as it stands.

Mr. P. MORGAN: I must, Mr. Courtney—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

(12.35.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 194; Noes 54.—(Div. List, No. 170.)

Whereupon, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO WORKMEN BILL—(No. 172.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(12.46.) Mr. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): I wish to ask whether the Government hope to be able to go on with this Bill, seeing that they put it on the Paper from time to time, or whether they have abandoned all hope of making progress with it?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Perhaps, Sir, the hon. Member will put the question to the leader of the House.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

METROPOLIS MANAGEMENT AND BUILDING ACTS (AMENDMENT) (RE-COMMITTED) BILL.—(No. 356.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(12.50.) Dr. CLARK: I beg, Sir, to move that you do report Progress.

*Sir J. LUBBOCK (London University): I hope the hon. Member will allow us to proceed. There is no Amendment to the Bill.

Mr. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): There is a long Amendment on the Paper.

Mr. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I understand that the new clause which appears on the Paper in my name is out of order, and, therefore, there is no Amendment to the Bill.

Clause 1.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this Clause stand part of the Bill."

Dr. CLARK: I now beg to move Sir, that you do report Progress.

Q

*SIR J. LUBBOCK: The Bill has been before the House a long while, and I hope the Motion will not be persisted in. Question put, and negatived.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Clause 2.

(12.51.) MR. W. REDMOND: I think this is a very late hour at which to go on with a measure of any kind. We are all extremely tired, and I do not think any good purpose will be served by refusing to postpone this Bill at least till to-morrow night.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK: The Bill is supported by Metropolitan Members on both sides of the House.

An hon. MEMBER: I object.

Committee report Progress, to sit again upon Thursday.

OPEN SPACES BILL [LORDS].—(No. 303.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

(12.54.) MR. W. REDMOND: I move, Sir, that you report Progress, on the ground that it is altogether inconvenient to transact business in the last few minutes of a Sitting, when many Members have gone home on the supposition that no Bills would be proceeded with. I beg to move that you report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. W. Redmond.)

*(12.55.) SIR J. LUBBOCK: I hope the hon. Member will allow this Bill to be taken. There is no Amendment to it, and it is supported by Members on both sides.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): If the hon. and learned Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) were here, I am sure he would join in the right hon. Gentleman's appeal.

(12.56.) MR. CONYBEARE: The fact that the hon. and learned Member for Longford is not here is the very best argument for not proceeding with the Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress, to sit again upon Thursday.

FISHERIES REGULATION (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 53.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(12.57.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): The Government have introduced into another place a Bill which is contained within the four corners of my Bill. I would suggest that they should consent to the Second Reading of this Bill in order that both measures may be referred to a Select Committee. It is not a Party question.

(12.58.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The question would, at all events, require consideration. I am not at all sure that the right hon. Gentleman represents accurately the contents of the two Bills.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday next.

COURT OF CHANCERY OF LANCASTER BILL [LORDS].

Bill read the first time; to be read a second time upon Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 363.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

On the Motion for Adjournment:—

MR. STOREY: May I ask what is the business for to-morrow?

*MR. JACKSON: It is proposed to take the Inland Revenue Regulation Bill, the Barracks Bill, and the Western Australia Bill.

It being One of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

private Member of your Lordships' House. Now, this Bill deals, as I have said, with one point—a very important point, indeed, but with one point only—and if no opposition had been proposed to be offered to the Bill, it would have been necessary for me to say but a very few words to your Lordships in explanation; but as there is a Motion that it should be read a second time this day six months, I think it will be convenient to your Lordships if I very shortly remind you of what has passed in the way of inquiry and otherwise lately with reference to the office of High Sheriff. Two years ago your Lordships, on my Motion, granted a Committee to inquire into the office and duties of High Sheriffs. It was notorious, and had been notorious for a long time, that great anomalies existed both in the manner in which High Sheriffs were selected and in many of the duties which they were called upon to perform. The Chairman of that Committee was Lord Cranbrook, the Lord President of the Council, and there sat on the Committee several Members of your Lordships' House, who were very familiar with all matters of county business, more than one of whom had themselves served the office of High Sheriff, and the Lord Chief Justice of England was also a member of the Committee. The Report and the evidence were in due course laid upon the Table of the House, where any of your Lordships who wish can refer to them; but I will merely say, generally, that all the evidence tended in one direction; that upon the consideration of the Report the Committee was unanimous, and that the Report was signed by every member of the Committee. Now, my Lords, to put in a very few words the substance of our recommendations. We recommended that the High Sheriff should be relieved from all obligations in connection with legal duties and legal business which are in practice discharged by the Under Sheriff; we recommended that he should be relieved from all responsibility for executions; that there should be a Returning Officer appointed to make elections; to Parliamentary and Coroners that the position of the Under Sheriff should be clearly defined, and that he should in future be a permanent salaried officer.

The Earl of Camperdown

the County Councils. Those, in short, were the recommendations; and I hoped that the Government might find themselves able soon to introduce a Bill dealing with the whole of our Report. I have once or twice received answers which were favourable from the learned Lord on the Woolsack; but as time went on, the answers became, I regret to say, less favourable; and as time was slipping away, I thought, on the whole, that it would be better if I were to introduce a Bill treating only that part of the question which touches the High Sheriff himself most nearly—I mean the question of the expenses which he is compelled to incur at the Assizes. Now, my Lords, this Bill, as I have said, is a Bill of very limited scope, and I ought here to express my acknowledgment to Lord Thring for his very kind assistance in drafting it; for if I had not had the advantage of the assistance of his great acquaintance with the law relating to High Sheriffs, I should not have been able, at this late period of the Session, to have laid a Bill upon the Table of this House. Now, my Lords, let us come to the Bill. The Bill proposes that the Joint Committee of the County Council, and the Justices of the Peace in every county in England and Wales, and the Grand Jury in each county in Ireland shall, with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor, make regulations as to the mode in which the Judges are to be received at the Assizes in the respective counties. Therefore, the first proposal that I make is that regulations shall be laid down as to the manner in which Her Majesty's Judges are to be received at Assizes in future; and I would point out to your Lordships that this is recommended, in the first instance, by the witnesses. Sir Offley Wakeman, a very important witness indeed from Shropshire, and who had himself served as High Sheriff, told us it was very desirable, he thought, that some regulations should be laid down. In the Report your Lordships will see that we ourselves went so far as to recommend certain definite regulations. We said—

“We are of opinion that the county official bearing the title of High Sheriff should receive the Judges on circuit, and discharge the duties with regard to the Grand Jury and other honorary duties as at present; we recommend that he should be appointed as hitherto, but we are of opinion that all the expenses of the office should be paid by the Treasury and the county jointly, including the expense of one well-appointed carriage with a pair of horses to convey the Judge on his business, and that trumpeters, javelin-men, and so on, be discontinued."

That is our recommendation. But it may be necessary that different regulations should be made for different counties, and I have therefore thought it best to include in this Bill the provision that the regulations should be made by the Joint Committee of the County Council and the Justices of the Peace, with the approval of the Lord Chancellor. My Lords, the reason why I have selected the Joint Committee of the County Council to act with the Justices of the Peace is because that Committee at the present time has the general charge and management of the police. If it had not been for this, I should not myself have proposed to place a duty of this sort in the hands of the General Committee, but rather in the hands of the County Council; but after consultation with those who are familiar with the working of County Councils, though it may be thought by others a matter of argument whether the Joint Committee is the right body, I think, on the whole, it is right to propose, in the first instance, that this duty should devolve upon the Joint Committee. When those regulations are made they are to be submitted to the Lord Chancellor for his concurrence, and the reason for that is that nothing may be done to diminish or interfere with the proper and dignified reception of Her Majesty's Judges. The Lord Chancellor, as the head of the law, will, of course, take every care that the regulations that are proposed by the Joint Committee shall be such as are fitting and proper. Now, the reason for proposing the regulations at all is this: that at the present time a High Sheriff has no guidance whatsoever as to the practice he ought to follow in receiving the Judges or doing anything else at the Assizes. There is no one to advise him in the matter at all, with the exception of the Under Sheriff. On the other hand, the Under Sheriff is practically a permanent officer, and, of course, it is a matter of very little concern to him what is or is not done, at all events, from the point of view of the expenditure, since all the expenses fall upon the Sheriff; and as many of your Lordships no doubt know, and you will find it was mentioned by the witnesses in evidence when any particular expenditure is proposed, and when the Sheriff is in doubt, the answer made to him is, "Oh, your predecessor did it, and, therefore, you ought to do it," and the consequence is, that whether it is right or not, the High Sheriff is naturally unwilling to appear to be stingy, and though he may not be by any means a rich man, many things in that way fall upon him which, if proper regulations were made, might possibly not devolve upon him. If regulations are made, a High Sheriff will have this advantage: that he can point to them, and he will know exactly what he ought to do. Of course, there is no reason why, if the High Sheriff wishes to spend more, and if he wishes to entertain, or do things of that sort, he should not do so. It will be at his discretion to do it; of course, that would be an expense properly falling upon himself, and would be properly borne by him. Your Lordships will remember that everyone who is pricked to act as High Sheriff is compelled to serve, and, therefore, if an honorary duty of this kind is thrust upon them, whether they wish it or whether they do not, surely, Parliament ought to lay down some regulations showing what they ought to do, and beyond the limits of which they ought not to be compelled to go. I do not think I need detain your Lordships at present, at all events, by making any further remarks, except this: that I do not know what smaller measure than this could possibly be proposed if we are to do anything at all in the way of defining what the expenses incurred by a High Sheriff are to be. I would ask your Lordships, can any measure more moderate than this be proposed? Certainly, the Members of the Committee, as I have shown your Lordships, all signed a Report, laying down certain definite recommendations; and until I have heard the reasons which may be given for proposing the rejection of this Bill, I should prefer to defer making any further remarks for my reply. I do not think I need trouble your Lordships any further now, and I will merely move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2."
—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

*LORD COLERIDGE: My Lords, I am sorry to be obliged to move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months. The noble Earl has very properly described it as a very small one, dealing with a very small portion of the office of High Sheriff. It seems to me that this Bill, is strictly speaking, a Bill that ought not to have been introduced in your Lordships' House. It is a Bill which certainly, as to the 2nd and the conclusion of the 3rd clause, ought to have been dealt with, first of all, by the House of Commons, because, as I understand, it is an attempt to impose charges on the rates; not because it affects any question of administration, which, as I understand, has always been a matter within your Lordships' thorough cognisance and jurisdiction, but because it deals with the whole of the county rates throughout England and Wales, and is really, therefore, as far as England and Wales is concerned, dealing with the subject of taxation. It is, therefore, a Bill which, in the main substance of it, ought to have been introduced into the House of Commons and not here. However, that, I suppose, can be got rid of by striking out the 2nd clause, and altering the conclusion of the 3rd clause so as to make it a Bill within your Lordships' jurisdiction. That might be done, and I rather gathered from the speech of the noble Earl that he proposed to do that; that he did not propose, as I gathered, to submit the Bill in its present form to your Lordships to-night. But that leaves only part of the 3rd clause. That will be really the whole of the Bill then left, and it is the 3rd clause to which, with the greatest respect to the noble Earl, I entertain great objection. The provision is that the expenses and so forth, which are incurred in the reception of the Judges at Assizes, shall be determined between the Joint Committee of the County Council and the Justices of the Peace in England and Wales, and the Grand Jury in Ireland, with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor, and those authorities shall make regulations for the different counties in England which are to be observed, so that whatever a gentleman occupying the office of High Sheriff might do either in excess or diminution of those regulations, he would be guilty of a breach of the Act of Parliament if he did not observe the regulations which are laid down. First of all, I venture to submit that the persons who have to pay—that is, the County Council and the Justices, for the entertainment or reception of the Judges, are not the proper persons to make regulations for the expenses so incurred. Certainly they ought not to make them without some consultation with the persons who are most interested in the result of those regulations, and it would, I think, only be respectful to the Judges that they should be consulted. As long as you choose to maintain an Imperial system, as long as Judges are to be treated with dignity, and as long as a certain amount of ceremony is to be maintained, which certainly, to some minds, may seem excessive, though the custom has come down from time immemorial, as long as that is kept up I must say that I think it would only be decent and respectful to them that they should be consulted as to how they should be entertained in the counties to which they go. It is provided that this is not to be done except with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor. About that I shall say a few words by-and-bye. But I would particularly desire to point out this—there is nothing in the slightest degree to provide that those regulations are to be the same. They cannot be the same in the different counties. What might be considered very fit and proper for large counties, such as Yorkshire or Lincolnshire, might be thought very unfit for Rutland or other small counties. There is no provision in this Bill for laying down lines, nor is there any suggestion of the lines which the County Council, the Justices of the Peace, and the Lord Chancellor should follow in making those regulations and ascertaining the sort of reception which the Judges should be entitled to. And, more than that, I am perfectly aware that in former days things have been done by Sheriffs to Judges and by Judges to Sheriffs which, for my own part, I would not in the least defend. Many things have been done, I think, in forgetfulness of the relative positions of the High Sheriff and the Judge which may very likely have caused annoyance in the minds of the persons who have been subjected to them, and I should say very just annoyance. But all that was long ago. For my own part, I have been nearly 17 years upon the Bench, and during the whole time I have been a Judge I have never once—not once—had the smallest difficulty or trouble with any Sheriff with whom I have been brought in contact. They have always treated me, and I have certainly always tried to treat them, as gentlemen, and there has never been, as far as I know, the slightest desire expressed that there should be any regulation in the matter other than the regulation that decent provision should be made for the Judges in taking us to church and conducting us to our Courts. As far as I know, the expenses connected with Assizes which have to be incurred by the Sheriffs are necessarily small. A carriage and pair, which is all that is necessary, is all that a Sheriff is expected to provide, and the cost of that equipage in a small Assize town, where prices, I suppose, would not be very high, would not be a very heavy infliction; and I do not myself see what cause there is for interfering with that expense. At the same time, I can quite understand that, whatever the expense may be in the present state of the landed and agricultural interests, that the incidental expenses which have fallen upon Sheriffs, if even of very moderate amount, might sometimes be heavy for them to bear. Then, if it be said that the Judges should not be received by the Sheriffs at all, but that they should be provided for in some other way, or not at all, as is the case in America, I do not now say anything about. If that be thought right, let it be done by authority. But let us see, if regulations are to be made, that throughout England and Wales they are the same, and that the reception of the Judges is the same. Now, I said I would say a word or two about the Lord Chancellor as an official. These regulations, if they are passed, are to be passed with his concurrence. Of course, the Lord Chancellor is a great legal official of the country, and, if my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack will allow me to say so, he is well acquainted with the subject; and if he should be succeeded by my noble Friend Lord Herschell, who also was a Common Lawyer, he, too, knows all about the circuits. If that were to be always the case that the Lord Chancellor should be familiar with these matters, I should not have a word to say. But during the time I have been on the Bench, I have known the office of Lord Chancellor to be occasionally filled by very great men and very great lawyers, who—speaking with all respect of them—knew no more about the circuits, or about the course of business or life on circuit, than any one of your Lordships who have never troubled your heads about them. I remember one of the greatest Law Lords, Lord Cairns. We used to have talks about those matters, and I think his views of the circuits were entirely misconceived. He apparently thought we went there, not to do much work, but to eat and drink, and to eat and drink to excess, and that the whole system was a system of guzzling, which it was high time should be put an end to. He used to speak in that manner and to that end. I am sure there was no man whom I admired more than Lord Cairns. He was a great lawyer, and within his sphere a great man; but he did not know the subject, and I do not think a man who is not acquainted with a subject is a fit person to lay down regulations about it. I have mentioned Lord Cairns' view of these circuit matters because, really, he had no information and no knowledge at all about them. I rather object, therefore, that in an Act of Parliament which is fixing, not upon this man or that man, but upon whoever may fill an office which may be held at one time by a person who is thoroughly acquainted with the subject, and at another time by a person who is unacquainted with it, the only check which the Judges can have upon the propriety of the regulations, is to be an officer who may be fit or unfit to check them—unfit from no fault of his own, but because his professional life may have been otherwise cast. Further, I think, if I may be pardoned for saying so, and if the noble Earl will forgive me, this is an instance of one of those small bits of legislation which would be much better left alone. Nobody, as far as I know, who are conversant with these matters, complains of the present state of things, and those who do complain have not very much knowledge of the matter or the work. If it is to be dealt with, it is a matter which should be dealt with by the Government of the country. All intelligent minds possessing knowledge of it either approve of the present system or of a modified system of reception of Judges on Assize. Destroy it altogether if you please, though I should regret it, but do not take this sort of half measure in which the persons who will be the most interested in cutting down and diminishing the reception are to settle the regulations, those regulations to be afterwards settled by a person who knows very little about the matter. I therefore beg leave to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment moved, to leave out the word "now," and add at the end of the Motion the words "this day six months."—(The Lord Coleridge.)

LORD ESHER: My Lords, in the first place, I desire to say that I am wholly disinterested in this matter, because I can never be called upon, I think, to go circuit again, having been a Judge now for 21 years. The next remark I wish to make is this: I have waited with some curiosity to hear what was the chief point in this Bill; and, after having listened to all that has been said, it seems to me that its chief point is to get rid on the part of the Sheriffs of the payment of their expenses. My objection to the Bill is that I do not believe it can be worked in any sensible way unless every line of it is altered. Of all the extraordinary compositions that I have ever seen applicable to real business this seems to me to be the most extraordinary. These expenses are the expenses of the High Sheriff in receiving and protecting the Judges. What the High Sheriff does now to protect the Judges I am sure I do not know. Whoever drew this Bill must, I should imagine, have been thinking of the times when, I believe, upon the journey from Newcastle to Carlisle the High Sheriff had to protect the Judges against marauding Scots. In no other way does the Sheriff protect the Judges. I heard somebody just now say the Sheriffs protected them by the javelin-men, but there are no such people as javelin-men now.

*LORD COLERIDGE: I can assure the noble Lord there are, in some cases.
Lord Coleridge

LORD ESHER: I can only say I have not seen them; at all events, for the last 15 years, and I rather think there is an Act of Parliament which has done away with them. The expenses of the Sheriffs are, further, in providing the necessary accommodation in keeping order within and about the precincts of the Courts of Assize. Then it says those expenses "are in this Act referred to Assize expenses of the Sheriff." The words never appear again in the Act, but that is a small matter. Then it provides that they shall be defrayed out of the county rate in like manner as the expenses of maintaining or providing Judge's lodgings may be defrayed. That, no doubt, is very pleasant for the High Sheriff. It would seem that the recommendation of the Committee is to do away with everything the High Sheriff has to do, except the mere reception of the Judges. No doubt they would like to be paid their expenses; and if you leave that clause as it is, they would have to be paid their expenses, whatever they might be. Let us see what it means. Supposing the High Sheriff now thinks it right to receive the Judges, and to protect them, and to provide for them with decency, and he is allowed to do so by the County Council, the Sheriff would then send in his charges. Are they so very carefully protected by this Bill? It says—

"The amount of expenses claimed by the Sheriff out of the county rate shall be submitted to the Treasury."

Now, the Treasury may be in some respects the most estimable Department in the Kingdom, though a great many people think it is the most detestable office in the Kingdom; and if what the High Sheriff is to get depends upon what the Treasury will allow, I am afraid he will very often find himself very badly off indeed, and that he will be treated by the Treasury, from the way in which they often treat matters, as if they were the stingiest people in the world. And the decision of the Treasury as to whether the sum claimed by the Sheriff is payable out of the county rate is to be final. So that, after all, the Sheriffs are handed over for the purpose of getting their expenses to the Treasury, and they must look to the Treasury for a final order. Then, that being the provision for payment, the 2nd clause is that—

“The Joint Committee of the County Council and of the Justices of the Peace in each county in England and Wales and the Grand Jury in Ireland”— are to act. Will anybody tell me how to read that? I should have thought it meant the County Council and the Justices of the Peace in England and Wales, and the County Council and Grand Jury in Ireland. That is the way I should read the Bill according to its ordinary grammatical construction. But if so, there are no County Councils in Ireland, and, therefore, the thing cannot be worked—

“And the Grand Jury in each county in Ireland shall, with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor”—

Is this to apply to England and Ireland? Which Lord Chancellor? Is the Lord Chancellor of England to concur with the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, or whatever the highest legal authority in Ireland may be? The Bill has been drawn without thought, that is the truth of it.

“Make regulations as to the mode in which, in their respective counties, the Judges are to be received at the Assizes, and otherwise as to the character and extent of the duties to be discharged by the High Sheriff with reference to the Judges and Assizes.”

Now, the regulations under this Bill may be different in every county in England. They may be different as to character and not merely in detail; their character will depend chiefly upon the nature of the County Council in each county, and the Lord Chancellor will have either to set himself against the County Council or to agree with it. If the Lord Chancellor does not agree with the County Council in any county, what is to happen? The state of things is to remain as it is in that county. In the next county the Lord Chancellor may agree with the County Council, and then there will be one law in one county and another law in another county, and the regulations may be in every county upon a different principle altogether. Then, they are only to agree as to the mode in which the Judges are to be received. In some counties they may propose that the Judge shall be received, and shall find his own carriage. In other counties they will, perhaps, allow him a carriage and pair of horses, while in some other county they may insist that he shall take whatever vehicle is left at the inn after everybody else is provided for; and so you will go on. But the answer will be, I suppose, that the Lord Chancellor will not consent to that. Probably he would not consent where there is a violent County Council which wants to cut down the expense of receiving the Judges to nothing at all. Well, then, in that county I say the law will remain as it is. Then as to the character and extent of the duties to be discharged by the High Sheriff with reference to the Judges at Assizes. What are the other duties? Nobody knows. This Bill does not say what they are. The High Sheriff, of course, has a duty. He is now responsible for the decent reception and the decent maintenance of the Judges. But here he will have to act according to the regulations, “and such regulations shall be duly observed.” Duly observed by whom? Is it by the Sheriff or by the Judge? And this is to be an Act of Parliament! The duties “shall be duly observed.” That is to say, these regulations shall have the force of an Act of Parliament. What is to happen if the High Sheriff does not observe them? Is he to be guilty of a misdemeanour because he has not observed, or obeyed, an Act of Parliament? What is to happen to the Judges? Apparently they are to change places with the County Council. Instead of the County Council being responsible to them, they are to be responsible to the County Council. In fact, there is not one provision, as far as I can see, which will not practically alter the relative positions of the Judge and Sheriff, except to do them harm. Where have there been any differences between the High Sheriffs and the Judges? I was told a few minutes ago that two Judges—they are the only Judges in existence certainly that ever I heard of—had fined a High Sheriff. I can only recollect hearing of one disagreement between a Judge and a High Sheriff. I think it was in Wales, and the Judge was the late Mr. Justice Cresswell. The High Sheriff proposed to “receive him” in a broken-down hackney coach. Mr. Justice Cresswell said he “would not risk his neck in it.” The High Sheriff said, “Do as you like; I shall get into it and go.” But the learned Judge said, “No, you have to attend upon me; I mean to walk into the town, as you will not provide me with a proper vehicle, and you must walk with me." And I recollect being myself once introduced into a lodging where there was no bell that would ring; but I made no fuss about it: I only asked the High Sheriff to lend me his dog-whistle, and he was kind enough to let me have it. The result was, that while I was there, every time I wanted my servant either I, or my marshall, had to go to the door, open it, and blow the High Sheriffs' dog-whistle until we could get the servant to come. I never had a difference with a High Sheriff. On the contrary; when a High Sheriff began to talk about the expenses, and I do not know what, I have always said to him, "Now, has not this been the happiest fortnight in your life? Here you have been in Court every day, which has amused you exceedingly, and you have received every consideration;" and he has always said it was the happiest time in his life. What have they to pay now? It is said there are certain expenses now. But there were exceedingly heavy expenses formerly. I do not believe at the present time that in nine counties out of ten the expenses are really heavy. The office is never imposed upon anybody who can make it clear to the Committee of the Privy Council that he is not able to sustain the expense. That is always a sufficient excuse. Therefore it is that I think people who are able should not object to bear the expense. They only have to bear it once in their lives. It comes only once upon an estate, I think, until there is a succession. They have to pay a sum which, I venture to say, in no county in England can be estimated at more than from £400 to £500, and I think it can be done for much less in most of the counties. And this is the dreadful infliction upon the estates of country gentlemen which is to induce a Bill of such a character. It is an unworkable Bill, which in any case would have to be eviscerated and filled up again for the purpose of altering what has been done now for so long a time. The truth is, the Bill has not been well-considered. If regulations are to be made, they ought to be made by some authority which will make them on the same principle for all the counties in England. It ought not to be left as it is in this Bill. And what is more: this is only the smallest part of the subject which the Committee we have heard of recommended should be fully treated. The whole of that subject should be treated. One Bill should be brought in which would settle the whole matter. If you have a number of little Bills passed to settle each minute point you will have a legislation which nobody will be able to construe, and which nobody will be able to put into action. I second the Amendment of my noble Friend.

*THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): My Lords, I sat on the Committee to which my noble Friend who has brought in this Bill referred, and heard with a good deal of interest the evidence taken there. Apart from the guidance afforded by that evidence, I have had other means also of arriving at a different conclusion from that which has been expressed by the noble and learned Lord, the Master of the Rolls. This Bill is not introduced for the purpose of putting an end to differences, if they exist, between Judges and Sheriffs. The Judge may quarrel with the Sheriff and the Sheriff may quarrel with the Judge just as before, only under these different circumstances: that some rules will be laid down under which the Sheriff will act, and the Judge will see that the Sheriff cannot be called upon to go beyond them, which is not the case at present. My noble Friend says there is no real grievance in this matter; but there is a very real grievance. There is one county at this moment in which the Sheriff, so far from having had to serve only once in his life, is obliged to serve a second time, because there is nobody else who is ready to bear the burden of the office. Nothing can be so distasteful to gentlemen as to have to come and disclose their private affairs, their estate accounts, and to show that, in consequence of debts to their bankers or otherwise, they are not in a position to pay even that small sum which has been mentioned of the £400 or £500 which the dignity of the office entails. There are gentlemen who, with all the appearance of wealth, are really living in the greatest state of poverty possible. And even if a man is called upon only once in his life, as the noble and learned Lord has said, to serve as Sheriff, yet if he dies soon afterwards his son, with perhaps great debts upon the estate and Succession Duty to pay, may be called upon at once to serve. My Lords, the times are completely changed. In the old times, no doubt, and in some counties even in the present day, the Shrievalty is rather sought after than avoided; but in the agricultural counties throughout England it has become a real burden. Country squires have not the command they formerly had of wealth; men have not the margin over from their incomes that they formerly had; and therefore they are obliged to look out and see in what way they can curtail expenditure. My noble and learned Friend says the Bill requires to be eviscerated, and no doubt he can eviscerate anything, and he has often done so with Acts of Parliament in the able Judgments which we know he has delivered. But the Bill has one chief point, and I think it is a point upon which it is worth while taking the sense of the House. The country calls upon these gentlemen to serve, and it is, I think, a question upon which it is worth while to take the sense of your Lordships—Ought the State to call upon a gentleman to undertake those duties and bear the expenses connected with them, whether he will or not? Ought you to call upon anybody you may fix upon to come and disclose to you his reasons for not desiring to serve, and to lay before you the accounts of his estate in order to show that he is not in a position to undertake those duties? Is it not part of the duty that belongs to a county (in many counties I believe now the Judges' lodgings are provided by the county) to find the money required in connection with the visits of the Judges to the Assize towns? In many places already the expenses are found by the counties, and not by the Sheriffs. I do not believe that the County Councils would so stint or cut down the expenses as to make the ceremonies associated with the visits of the Judges ridiculous. I do not think they would be parsimonious, though, I believe, they would use a judicious economy, which seems to me a very desirable thing to do in these matters. I can remember a time when the High Sheriff in Yorkshire rode in with his tenantry on horseback and made a great show; but all that kind of display died out gradually. There were some Judges who did not like it, and I remember in particular one Judge who always avoided anything of the kind, who used to carry his own bag to the carriage waiting for him, and wished as much as possible to get rid of the ceremony he was surrounded with. Still, I think the reception of the Judges is rather looked forward to as an event in Assize towns. It is expected that the Judge should go with trumpeters and in great state to their Courts; but I have observed in many cases after the first appearance, though the Judge may have come in with great solemnity he is allowed to go to and from the Courts without much show of respect or assemblages to look at him. At first he goes into the town, goes to church, the sermon is preached, and he returns with ceremony, and altogether no doubt a great deal is thought of the first day of the Assize, but after the first day the ceremonies are very much abridged; yet all the expenditure for the High Sheriff goes on, he is obliged to find the horses and carriage, and, of course, there are other expenses, even though in some cases no longer the cost of javelin-men, and altogether he is put to very heavy expense. It so appeared to the Committee on which I sat. There are some High Sheriffs who have tried to cut down expenses as much as possible, and some have brought them very low indeed, while at the same time they have very much curtailed the duties they owe to the Judges; and it is very difficult to say, if you leave it absolutely to the discretion of the Sheriffs, so long as there is a decent appearance made that any fault can be found. I do not know that in that case the Judge could interfere with him. But I think in almost every case the High Sheriff has done his best, and I cannot help thinking that the time has now come when we might take some step towards making a change. My noble and learned Friend has said this cannot be worked, and objection was taken to the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor. I do not see that that is a ground for objecting to the Second Reading, though it may be made a ground of objection in Committee, as to the mode of framing regulations in regard to these expenses. With regard to what the noble and learned Lord Coleridge said about the Bill being improperly brought into this House, this is a Bill not affecting taxes, but the rates, and Bills are constantly introduced in your Lordships' House which affect the rates. There is nothing irregular in it, therefore, in that respect. With regard also to the Treasury being the arbiter. The Treasury is not arbiter upon grounds which are open to it to settle for itself, but it must be guided by the regulations as to the expenses to which the Sheriff is subject. Therefore, the Treasury will not have an absolute discretion in the matter, but will be rather like a public auditor, having to see that no expenses are incurred which do not come within the ordinary regulations. I do not think it necessary to defend the drafting of the Bill; that is a matter to be examined in Committee; but I hope your Lordships will, at all events, express your opinion that the time has come when these expenses ought no longer to be imposed as a tax on individuals who are totally unable to bear them.

LORD MORRIS: My Lords, probably the House will pardon me for intruding for a few moments, because I observe that Ireland has been introduced into this Bill apparently at the eleventh hour, and I should imagine without the slightest consideration of what the practice is in Ireland. The 2nd clause of the Bill provides that the expenses of the High Sheriff shall, so far as they are expenses which would before the passing of this Act have been defrayed by the Treasury or out of the County Rate, be defrayed out of the County Rate in like manner, as the expenses of providing and maintaining Judges' lodgings are now by law defrayed and shall be included in the costs of the Assize, within the meaning of the Local Government Act of 1888. Now, that Act is entirely inapplicable to Ireland. The lodgings of the Judges in Ireland are provided not by the Sheriff, but by the Treasury. That expense is paid by the Treasury, and there is no Act of Parliament that I am aware of which is applicable to Ireland called the Local Government Act of 1888. How expenses are to be measured within the meaning of an Act which does not exist at all in the country to which this well-considered Bill is to apply is not explained. The 3rd clause of the Bill is that—

"The amount of expenses claimed by any Sheriff out of a County Rate shall be submitted to the Treasury together with his accounts under the Sheriffs Act, 1887."

There is no such Act in Ireland; so that whoever has drafted this Act and put Ireland in it has done so without much consideration, and it is not alone that he has done it without much consideration, but he has apparently done it without any consideration. I cannot conceive any Bill being moved or introduced with a more infinitesimal regard to the state of law, the practice, or anything like acquaintance with that portion of the United Kingdom, which is sometimes not quite considered in these Acts of Parliament; and, indeed, I have observed that everybody who has addressed your Lordships' House up to this moment has spoken of this Bill as if it merely referred to England. I have not heard one reference to Ireland to which it is supposed to apply from any noble Lord who has addressed your Lordships. We have had illustrations and anecdotes to a considerable extent as regards what has happened in England. I can speak with even a longer experience than my noble Friend the Master of the Rolls, having been a Judge going circuit for 22 years, one year more, I regret to say, than my noble Friend, and I have never heard of any difficulties in Ireland as to the reception of the Judges. The lodgings are not provided, as I have already said, by the Sheriff. He provides the carriage by which they are brought to their lodgings, and go every day to the Courts. I may say it is the habit in Ireland for the Judges to go to church or chapel as private individuals, and are not accompanied by the High Sheriff. I quite agree with the Lord President of the Council, that this is a subject which ought to be legislated upon, but as regards the expenses which the High Sheriffs are put to in Ireland in connection with receiving the Judges going circuit, they would be, I should say, only about £10 each Assizes in many counties. In Ireland the High Sheriffs enter into a contract with the Sub-sheriff, by which they agree to pay him a certain sum to indemnify him, not for entertaining the Judges, but for his duties, and against all actions that may be brought against him. The matter has, in my opinion, really reached a crisis in Ireland, for, in consequence of the series of so-called remedial measures that have been applied in Ireland to the landed gentry, persons desiring to fill the High Shrievalty are getting to be within a very narrow circuit, and it is extremely hard to find anybody who will serve the office at all. This measure could bring no relief of a practical character in Ireland, even if it could work there, because, as I have said already, the expenses of actually receiving the Judges is very small. The sum paid to the Sub-sheriff, in some cases £200 or £300, is simply for acting as Sub-sheriff, not for honouring the Judge. I am very sorry a Bill of this sort should have been brought in, merely touching, as it does, the fringe of the question. I believe it would not work in Ireland, even if properly drafted, and it would be an almost inappreciable relief to the High Sheriff in Ireland, whereas it would be more convenient if he were relieved from indemnifying the sub-sheriff, who should be appointed with a regular salary, or if something of that kind could be carried out. As the Lord President of the Council has said it is the opinion of the Government that such a Bill should be brought in, I would not vote against them; but, as far as I can see, this Bill would not be of any great practical utility in Ireland.

LORD BELPER: My Lords, as I was Chairman of the Quarter Sessions in a county which took up this question—we having passed a Resolution upon it, I think, two years ago before the Committee of your Lordships' House sat—I should like to say a few words upon it. I must say that I think the noble and learned Lords who have addressed the House have ignored the fact that there is, undoubtedly, a very strong feeling in the country that the time has now come when you can no longer place what is really a part of the administration of justice as a charge upon the pocket of a single individual, and that individual very frequently a gentleman who is quite unable to bear any extra expense, and who, during the last few years, certainly has not been in a position to spend money on what does not concern him personally. I cordially support my noble Friend who has brought in this Bill, for that reason. But I must say I rather regret the Bill does not go a little further. I have been at some pains to get the particulars in a county in which I live of the actual proportion of the Sheriff's expenses which this Bill would really deal with. I think the county to which I refer may be taken to be a tolerably typical county, though, of course, the custom as to expenditure differs in various counties exceedingly. I find that the expenditure which would be dealt with by this Bill would be less than two-fifths of the whole of the High Sheriff's expenditure. I think there is a very important consideration, which has not been noticed by any of the noble Lords who have addressed you this evening, and that is the economical part of the question. Even with regard to the part of it which this Bill deals with, I believe that precisely the same amount of reception and State might be kept up, but at a very much smaller expense. I have looked into the figures, and I believe you can save on this head alone between 40 and 50 per cent. of the present expenditure. You would have, in the first place, the same body acting every year instead of successive individuals. At present the High Sheriff has absolutely no control over the expenditure. Every year the High Sheriff has to get his new liveries, new coach, and new harness, and I believe the thing might be done, with exactly the same amount of proper respect to the Judges, at much less expense. But that part of the expenses which this Bill does not deal with is more than two-fifths of the total expenses. At present I am leaving out of consideration the personal expenses of the High Sheriff. I believe, if your Lordships pass this Bill, in the county with which I am connected one great economy might be effected at once, that is if you choose to put it into this Bill, that you might absolutely abolish the office of Under Sheriff. I do not know whether the practice is general, but in the county I am referring to it has been the custom of the High Sheriff to appoint his own solicitor as Under Sheriff, and he then appoints an acting Under Sheriff, who does the whole of the work and takes the fees. But, practically, the Under Sheriff does nothing except to assure the High Sheriff that everything is being properly done, and to make whatever arrangements have to be made in a way that is satisfactory to the High Sheriff who has appointed him. Under this head you would save something like 20 per cent. of the whole expenditure, if you abolish the office of Under Sheriff, and let the officer acting as Under Sheriff be appointed a permanent officer, as was suggested by the Committee of your Lordships' House. With regard to the Sheriff himself, there are, as has been pointed out, certain fees payable on taking office. I believe it is the custom for the Under Sheriff, the acting Under Sheriff, and, I believe, the Sheriff's Officer, all to give bonds of indemnity to the High Sheriff in case they should do anything illegal during the time the High Sheriff remains in office. Now, those bonds of indemnity are made out afresh every year, although they may be exactly the same persons who are acting as Under Sheriff and Sheriff's Officer. There is very considerable expense in regard to those fees on the Sheriff taking office, which might be avoided if the County Council took the bond of indemnity, and themselves had this appointment of the Under Sheriff. Then, my Lords, there are other charges and fees which are never really disputed. The Sheriff when he comes into office cannot do that. He simply asks, "What are the fees?" and pays them, as he is told has always been the custom. If the County Council, or some such authority, became empowered to arrange and revise, from time to time, the scale of fees charged, I believe on that head alone there would be found to be considerable economy. My Lords, I do not know whether the noble Lord who has charge of the Bill would be willing, if the Bill is read a second time now, to accept any enlargement of its scope in this direction. I venture to think it will be rather unfortunate if this part of the question is carried now without any consideration being given to the question of the Under Sheriff's expenditure. I do not wish to trouble your Lordships at any greater length. I would only venture to point out, with regard to one remark which was made by the Lord Chief Justice, that I cannot myself see that in the Bill there is anything which would prevent the Sheriffs from entertaining the Judges in a more hospitable or even splendid manner, if they wished to do so. I believe the Bill only says that certain things are to be done, and that those things will have to be done with the approval of the Lord Chancellor. I believe in some counties it is the custom for the Sheriff, he being a rich man, to provide a four-in-hand to drive the learned Judges into the country after the completion of their work in the Courts. No doubt that would be extremely agreeable to the Judges, but I do not think there is anything in the Bill which would prevent a High Sheriff providing a four-in-hand, if he wished to do so. Quite the contrary; because if you take part of the necessary expenses off his shoulders he will have a little more to spend in showing hospitality to the Judges and to his own friends. However that may be, there is certainly a strong feeling prevalent throughout the country with respect to this relic of the olden times. I, therefore, trust that your Lordships will pass the Second Reading of the Bill, and also that my noble Friend in charge of it will be disposed to receive Amendments, somewhat extending its scope, especially with regard to doing away with the office of Under Sheriff.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, perhaps I may be allowed to say a few words in support of my noble Friend behind me. In the part of the country to which I belong I know the feeling is exceedingly strong upon the subject, and it is thought that the levying of these sums upon the gentlemen who have to serve the office of High Sheriff is an exceedingly hard and unjust practice with regard to the reception of the Judges on circuit. I would just point out that in these matters times have very much changed. Judges in London are, I think, treated with as much respect as in any other part of the country, but it has not been thought necessary that they should be attended with a kind of pageant as they go to their Courts. No one would say, of course, that proper arrangements should not be made, or that on these occasions it may not be necessary to have some kind of reception of high officers connected with the administration of justice, but I assure noble and learned Lords that they will scarcely be aware of the kind of remarks which are made in the country regarding the present practice. It is looked upon altogether as belonging to a different state of things. In former times, when railway communication did not exist, and people rarely left their own country, no doubt the entry of the Judges into an Assize town was a very unusual occasion, and their reception was an impressive ceremony. When the Judges came down to the country from the Metropolis in those days, it was very natural that they should be received with great ceremony. But those times have long passed away. People are now in the habit of travelling about by railroad all over the country, and when one hears that the Judges are to be received in the present rather extraordinary fashion, I confess it excites, as no doubt it does with many people, a feeling of anything but respect. I think, my Lords, the time has, therefore, come when it is desirable that there should be some regulations laid down in accordance with the customs and habits of the present day, and which should be, as far as possible, the same in each county and all over the country. Of course, there might be some differences maintained, the wishes of particular counties might be consulted, but, practically, it would be the same thing throughout most parts of the country. I do not think there is any cause to fear that the County Councils or the Joint Committee would treat the Judges with scant respect. On the contrary, I believe that each County Council, as a body, would wish that the county they represent should distinguish itself by acting with proper respect to Her Majesty's Judges, and I think in that respect there will be nothing to regret. But I do earnestly hope the question will not be left in its present very unsatisfactory position. If noble and learned Lords will pardon me for saying so, Judges, like other people, are apt sometimes to show a want of discretion; and though in the vast majority of cases the Judges in this respect give no cause for disagreement with the Sheriffs, yet I must say I have heard anecdotes as to proceedings of learned Judges in regard to the manner of their reception, which I would much rather not have been acquainted with. Then, too, I must say that many people think, though it is quite proper that the Sheriffs should receive the Judges, it is not decorous, or necessary, or proper, that the Sheriff should dance attendance on them during the whole time of the Assizes. The Sheriff is a gentleman of high position, and to place him in that position is not fitting. He should receive the Judges, and after that they should receive the same attention as other gentlemen. I have only risen for the purpose of supporting what my noble Friend has said. I hope we shall read the Bill a second time, and any question of Amendments can be dealt with in Committee. The question of Ireland is a somewhat different one, but that can, no doubt, be dealt with in another manner.

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, after the discussion which has taken place, I do not think it is necessary for me to detain your Lordships very long. But there are one or two points which have been raised which I should like to answer, because it might be thought not respectful if I did not answer certain objections which noble and learned Lords have taken. First, there is the question of form, which is objected to. My Lords, when the Bill is leaving this House, the clause, according to the invariable practice, which refers to the rates will be struck out and re-inserted after it has left the House. That is an answer to that objection. Then, my Lords, the next objection which was taken, was that the Lord Chancellor is not the proper official to entrust with the supervision of these regulations, because sometimes the Lord Chancellor is a person who has not been connected with Common Law, and has not gone circuit. I apprehend that the Lord Chancellor, as head of the law, will, of course, consult the Judges. I think there is no Lord Chancellor who would not take such a course, and I think that that, at all events, is not a ground upon which your Lordships should refuse to read this Bill a second time. Then, it is said there have been no complaints. I can understand that noble and learned Lords who were not on the Committee may not be aware of the complaints; but I think the Lord Chief Justice, who sat on the Committee and heard the evidence, will not say that no complaints were laid before the Committee. If any of your Lordships will read the evidence you will see the statement made by the Lord President is exactly correct, that many persons do feel that they are put to expense, and occasionally to unnecessary expense, in these matters, and that they are desirous some rules and regulations should be laid down. As has been very truly said, the object of this Bill is to lay down regulations, and not in any way to treat the Judges with disrespect. I should certainly not be the person to propose a measure which would have that effect. With regard to most of the other objections which have been taken, they can, I think, be perfectly well dealt with in Committee. My Lords, this Bill, I hope, will be referred to Committee in the ordinary way, and I can only say that I shall be perfectly ready to consider any Amendments which noble Lords may send to me, if they think there are points in the Bill which are not properly treated—for instance, let us say, the question of Ireland. Lord Morris said this Bill does not in certain respects refer properly to Ireland.

*LORD MORRIS: Not in any respect.

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: Very well, in any respect. As the measure is a very small one indeed, I shall be glad to receive from him an Amendment making it so refer. I apprehend there is nothing so different in the nature of an English county to an Irish county as to make it impossible for words to be inserted which will enable the Grand Jury in Ireland to act in exactly the same way as the County Council does in England. Then the last question I have to answer is whether I should be prepared to enlarge the scope of my Bill in Committee. Well, I confess I am rather afraid to answer that question, because, owing to the fortuitous concurrence of learned Judges here to-night, I should be rather afraid lest, if I enlarged the Bill, it should meet with more serious opposition. It is so far practically unopposed, because it is such a little one, but I very much fear if I proposed to deal more largely with the office of High Sheriff the objection would be such as to make it impossible for it to pass this Session.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I have very little to add. First with regard to the remarks which have been made by my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chief Justice, I would appeal to him whether a great many of the objections which he has urged might not, at all events, be left to Committee, so that your Lordships need not be put to the trouble of dividing upon this Bill. My noble Friend, I think, has never served upon the Committee, when applications are constantly made, from time to time, for the removal of certain names from the list of Sheriffs. If he had ever undergone that experience, I am sure he would have been under an entirely different impression as to whether or not there are complaints made with reference to performing the office of High Sheriff. With reference to the observations which were made by the Master of the Rolls, I am bound to tell him he is greatly in error in two respects. In the first place, he said he is no longer liable to go on circuit. I think he will see that is an error which may be cured when I tell him that he is liable.

LORD ESHER: I think nothing will ever induce me to go.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I am afraid my noble and learned Friend is like some of those gentlemen who are called upon to act as High Sheriff; he would rather not serve. His second error is one which he could not have fallen into if he did go circuit—namely, that the javelin-men are abolished. That is entirely an error; no Act of Parliament has abolished the javelin-men at all. What has been done is this: An Act of Parliament has been passed which enables the High Sheriff, with the consent of Quarter Sessions, to employ police instead of javelin-men; but that can only be done if the Quarter Sessions consent. Only last year an application was made to me by a High Sheriff to know what he was to do because the Court of Quarter Sessions had refused to allow the use of the police. The High Sheriffs are now obliged, I believe, to provide a certain number of men in uniform—they are not called “javelin-men”—to attend the Judges on circuit. In all the circumstances, I consider there is an evil which ought to be dealt with, that there is a great subject of grievance in this matter, and that gentlemen throughout the country who are likely to be called upon to fill that office should be considered by your Lordships. Some of the objections to the Bill, as I have said, might be dealt with in Committee, and, in particular, that which was pointed out with regard to the Lord Chancellor making arrangements with the County Councils. I can assure your Lordships, if the Bill goes into Committee, and the question is raised as to who is the proper person to make regulations with the County Councils, I shall myself move that the Lord Chief Justice shall do it. That part of the objection, therefore, that the Lord Chancellor may not be a person who is acquainted with the circuits will be removed. Under the circumstances, I hope your Lordships will not think it necessary to divide the House on the question, but will allow the Bill to be read a second time.

LORD COLERIDGE: After the exceedingly seductive appeal which has been made by my noble and learned Friend I will certainly accede to his suggestion, and I will not trouble your Lordships to go to a Division.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn: Bill read 2^a, and committed to the Standing Committee for General Bills.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) (PLEURO-PNEUMONIA) BILL.—(No. 105.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

THE EARL OF JERSEY: My Lords, when this Bill was passed through Committee there was an understanding that certain points should be referred for further consideration. There were three points raised: the first was whether more power should be taken to appoint additional officers, besides the Inspectors referred to in the Act; the second point was whether it might not be desirable to make the payment of compensation retrospective, so that persons owning animals which were slaughtered before the 1st September might be compensated for them under the Act, instead of out of the rates, as at present; and the third point was whether it might not be advisable to take further powers to withhold compensation for cattle slaughtered for having been in contact with diseased animals in cases where the owners had concealed the existence of the disease. These three points have been considered by the Minister of Agriculture, and he thinks that, under the Bill as it stands, there is ample power to appoint a sufficient number of Inspectors and other officers. There would be no fear of too many salaried officers being appointed, as any additional work would be done by Sub-Inspectors, who would only be paid by fees, except in the case of a general outbreak, when special arrangements would be made. With regard to the suggestion that the Bill should be made to apply to cattle slaughtered before the date when it comes into operation, as the provision in the Bill was founded on a Resolution of the House of Commons, it would require a separate Resolution to carry out the suggestion, and, considering the difficulties of passing measures quickly, it would not be desirable to make that change. As to the third point, there has naturally been considerable difference of opinion, but the President of the Board of Agriculture has carefully considered the matter, and has come to the conclusion that under the Act of 1878, and the present measure, he has sufficient powers to cope with any outbreak of pleuro-pneumonia which may arise, and that it will not be necessary to extend his powers by this Bill. No doubt it is very desirable that evil doers should be punished, but the President of the Board thinks he has sufficient power. If afterwards it is found desirable to enlarge his powers, it would be quite possible to get a short measure passed with this object in another Session of Parliament. I hope, therefore, it will not be considered necessary by those who take an interest in this matter to insist upon any change being made in the Bill.

LORD MORRIS: My Lords, on the occasion of the Second Reading of this Bill, the noble Lord opposite mentioned that there was a very strong belief in England, or in his part of the country, that this disease was propagated from Ireland. He spoke of the Government of the day as not having acted with great vigour in endeavouring to stamp it out, and said it was much more difficult to enforce the orders in Ireland than in England. I will take this opportunity, not having been present when the Bill went into Committee, of dissenting entirely, not only from what the noble Lord stated as being a matter of belief, but from the notion that there is any good ground for it. At the time of the Second Reading of the Bill there were only two places infect, the North and South Dublin Unions. An Order was made in February, 1889, declaring that no cattle belonging to those districts should be exported to Great Britain, or exposed for sale in the Metropolitan Market on the ordinary day; and further, all cattle in the defined districts must be handed on hoof and horn, and can only be moved out of the districts on licence; and every addition or diminution of cattle moved from the districts must be reported to the police, who exercise the strictest supervision over the defined districts and prosecute. Inspectors are specially employed and engaged in visiting the defined districts. Any diseased cattle are at once slaughtered, and all cattle in contact. Pleuro-pneumonia has decreased. In 1887 there were 240 outbreaks, and 819 cattle attacked. In 1888 only 181 cases and 522 attacked. In 1889, 108 outbreaks and 184 cattle attacked. All cases reported by the Board of Agriculture in England are at once inquired into. In all cases, it appeared that the cattle were not affected when leaving Ireland. I understand that a serious outbreak in Norfolk was not reported to the authorities there for months. The disease is much more likely to have spread in this manner from the County of Norfolk than by cattle from Ireland. I think, therefore, this impression, which the noble Earl says is so strongly felt in England, appears to be founded on no facts. I feel that the Government have acted with the greatest vigour in stamping out pleuro-pneumonia, the same course as they followed with regard to moral plagues. I can only say that the Orders have been carried out in Ireland as stringently as possible, and I do not see that more difficulty exists in enforcing them in Ireland than in England. It appears to me that in England really you have only adopted the system which has been in force in Ireland. The prevalent belief in England which the noble Earl referred to is wholly unfounded, and I suppose the only way to meet an unfounded statement of belief is to contradict it on the first occasion that one can.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I have no doubt the noble Lord is entirely satisfied with the Report he has read, but I should infer from that satisfaction that he has probably not had much practical experience upon this subject. I am perfectly aware that excellent orders are issued in Ireland by the Privy Council, and I have no doubt that they are under the impression there that the diminution in the number of cases is entirely caused by the excellent way in which the law has been carried into effect. But I am rather disposed to draw exactly the opposite conclusion from that diminution of cases, because the impression it makes upon my mind is that there has been a want of vigilance in this matter. I doubt exceedingly that there has been a diminution of pleuro-pneumonia in Ireland. It is almost impossible to conceive that it can be so, when we know that animals which have been found to be affected with pleuro-pneumonia in England have been traced to Ireland; and so much has this been felt to be the case, that I know a great many people who do not think it prudent now to purchase Irish cattle, and as those cattle are exceedingly valuable to farmers, they would not decline to purchase them if they were not obliged to do so. Therefore, I think the noble Lord will see that that belief cannot be so easily disposed of. Ireland is a country of very small agricultural proprietors, and there are a great number of them; and those who are acquainted with the class of men who constitute a very large proportion of those proprietors must know that it follows there is much more difficulty in getting information from them than in a country like this, where there are mostly large farmers. I am very glad the noble Lord has read the Report. It shows certainly that there has been no lack of Orders issued, and all I can say is that I sincerely trust those Orders will be vigorously and continuously carried into effect. I hope the Irish Government, occupied as it is with many other matters, may in this so conduct their affairs that they will meet with the approval of everyone, and that they will succeed in removing from Ireland this disease, which affects animals sent to England. I am sorry my noble Friend, after consultation with the President of the Board of Agriculture, has not been able to accept the Amendments which have been suggested. I rather gather from what he has said that the difficulty is not the intrinsic character of those Amendments, but the fear that if the Bill goes down to the other House there may be difficulty in passing the measure through. I can appreciate the difficulty, and I do not wish to undervalue it. I regret that the last of the Amendments has not been adopted, which would have enabled the Government to deprive those owners who had neglected to give notice of the existence of disease on their farms of the compensation which they would otherwise have been entitled to. I think that would have given a very valuable power to the President of the Board of Agriculture. I am by no means persuaded that the powers they possess will be found adequate for the purposes required. I think the experience of the Local Authorities, which is very considerable in these matters, is at present much more weighty than that of the Board of Agriculture. All I can say is that I am very sorry the Amendments cannot be introduced into the Bill, and that I hope at some future time, if there is any amending Bill brought in, it may be found possible to include them.

Bill read 3^a (according to order), and passed.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING ACTS AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 122.)

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACTS OF ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND REPEAL BILL.

A Bill for the repeal of the Local Government Acts for England and Scotland—Was presented by Lord Denman; read 1^a; to be printed; and to be read 2^a on Tuesday next.—(No. 156.)

ADMIRAL COLOMB'S FLASHING SIGNALS.

VISCOUNT OXENBRIDGE: In the absence of my noble Friend Lord Sudeley I have to move for correspondence between Flag Officers (including Rear-Admiral Colomb) and the Admiralty relating to flashing signals between 1st January, 1887, and the present date.

*LORD ELPHINSTONE: I am sorry to have to state that I am not prepared to accede to the Motion as it stands on the Paper. It asks for certain correspondence between Naval Officers and the Admiralty from the 1st January, 1887, down to the present time. As that is obviously but a small portion of the correspondence it would, being incomplete, give an erroneous idea of what the effect of the correspondence was. If my Friend is prepared to move for the whole correspondence from 1867 there would be no objection to give that Return.

VISCOUNT OXENBRIDGE: As my noble Friend is prepared to do that, I propose to amend the notice in that way.

NAVY (FLASHING SIGNALS).

The whole official correspondence relating to Rear-Admiral Colomb, from 1867 to the present date: Ordered to be laid before the House.—(The Lord Sudeley.)

QUESTIONS.

IRELAND—POLICE SHADOWING.

Mr. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord S

Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Rev. W. H. O'Kelly, a parish priest of New York City, and Mr. Patrick B. Egan, merchant in the same city, and native of Woodford, County Galway, were shadowed by police through Cork on the 10th instant, and that one of the constables, who gave his name as Murphy, followed Mr. Egan from Cork to his house in Woodford; and whether he will give instructions to the police not to subject visitors to Ireland to such treatment in future?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Constabulary Authorities report that it is the case that the movements of P. B. Egan are watched in consequence of information in the possession of the police; but that it is not the case that those of the rev. gentleman named have been. The police have been acting in the proper discharge of their duty.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state what number of persons are now being shadowed by policemen in the County of Cork, or if he can give the number so shadowed for the first fortnight of this month?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The question was answered yesterday by my right hon. Friend the Attorney General for Ireland. I have nothing to add to his reply.

MR. FLYNN: Is there any distinction drawn between persons "shadowed" and persons "temporarily observed" by the police; or is it only a difference of degree?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is undoubtedly a difference between shadowing and a general observation.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): Does it depend upon the distance at which the constable watches the person observed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir.

MR. FLYNN: Is temporary shadowing carried on only for a day, or a portion of a day?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; shadowing is an operation which may be carried on permanently or temporarily.

Mr. Roche

THE CAVAN UNION.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, when Patrick M'Cartland, of Belturbet, a widower with six children, all under nine years of age, dependent upon him, was sentenced to three months' imprisonment, leaving his family for the time without support, the Board of Guardians of the Cavan Union resolved, on the 6th August, 1889, that the best course would be to place the children in the charge of their nearest relative, their grandmother, and to allow her 1s. per week per child for their support during the term of their father's imprisonment, which is about half what it would have cost to support the children in the workhouse; whether the Auditor of the Local Government Board surcharged the sum so paid in out-door relief to the Chairman; and whether the Auditor acted with the sanction of the Local Government Board in the matter; and, if so, whether he will consider the expediency of giving the Guardians a wider discretion in such special cases?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The facts appear to be substantially as stated in the question. The Guardians could not, in the circumstances, legally grant out-door relief to the man's family. The Auditor, therefore, was obliged to surcharge the Vice-Chairman, and the Local Government Board have no statutable power to give the Guardians a wider discretion of the nature indicated.

BAIL PRISONERS.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if it is the fact that to-day the Chief Magistrate of Waterford attended at the gaol of that city, but that the Governor refused to take the recognisances which were tendered on behalf of Mr. Redmond and Mr. Fisher, two bail prisoners, unless a Resident Magistrate were present; and, if so, whether he will telegraph at once to have these gentlemen released on bail?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I know nothing about the circumstances of the case, but I will make inquiries.

MR. DILLON: Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake, if the facts are as I have stated, to have these men let out to-night? It is a most unpleasant thing to be detained in gaol in defiance of the law.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will take care, if anything illegal has been done, to have it remedied as soon as possible. I am not aware at present that anything illegal has been done.

MR. FLYNN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there is no necessity for the presence of a Magistrate at all?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not familiar with the law.

MR. CONYBEARE: When I was in Derry Gaol the presence of a Resident Magistrate when recognisances were entered into was not required.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already given the only answer to the question I am able to give.

MR. TATE'S PICTURES.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Trustees of the National Gallery accepted Mr. Tate's generous offer subject to the condition that the Government should provide sufficient space to accommodate the pictures; whether the Collection consists entirely, or almost entirely, of works of the modern British School, and whether, under these circumstances, they must have been of necessity kept together, and whether there are already several precedents in the National Gallery, such as the Reel and Turner Collections, for groups of pictures to be hung by themselves in separate rooms; whether, even if Mr. Tate had handed over his pictures to the nation quite unconditionally, and allowed them to be dispersed in different rooms, space could have been found to hang more than half-a-dozen of them; whether the Trustees have repeatedly pressed on the Government the desirability of enlarging the existing building; and whether he will lay the correspondence regarding Mr. Tate's offer upon the Table of the House?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I will answer the first part of the question by replying to the last part. Correspondence will be laid on the Table of the House which will show in detail all that has been done in the matter. It is true that the Trustees of the National Gallery have repeatedly urged on the Government the desirability of enlarging the existing building, and arrangements have been made for providing additional accommodation with a view to a permanent Gallery for British Art.

LOCAL TAXATION.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with reference to the declaration of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, of Ireland, on the 24th of March last, that Ireland is entitled to

"A contribution of £40,000 a year, which Ireland has never yet got, but which she has a right to get, as a set-off against the advantage which England and Scotland have recently derived from the Licence Duties handed over to those countries," and Section 7 of the Land Purchase Bill, which proposes a yearly charge on the Consolidated Fund of £40,000 in order "That the like benefits may be given to Ireland as were given to England and Scotland when the duties on local taxation licences were transferred to Local Authorities," what means he will adopt to provide that the arrears of this contribution, and the amount payable for 1890-91, shall be made available for the benefit of Ireland in the current financial year?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member's assumption that the Land Purchase Bill will not pass into law by March 31, 1891, is one with which I cannot agree. Accordingly, I think that the time for discussing the point of what should be done with the £40,000 if the Bill does not pass by that date had better stand over until it is seen more clearly how that may be. I can, however, assure the hon. Member that one way or another that sum of £40,000 shall not be lost to Ireland—that is to say, it shall not be retained in the Exchequer. As to the question of arrears, I would point out that this is the first year in which Scotland gets the difference between the grant and the licence, and the first year, too, in which Ireland will get the £40,000, so that Ireland and Scotland will stand on the same footing.

MR. SEXTON: I am much obliged for the general assurance which the right hon. Gentleman has given. Does the right hon. Gentleman expect us to take it from him that the Land Purchase Bill will pass through this House and through the House of Lords, and receive the Royal Assent, before the 31st of March next year?

THE LOCAL TAXATION (CUSTOMS AND EXCISE) DUTIES BILL.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the further inquiry into the incidence of the Beer and Spirit Duties comprised in the Local Budget, which he undertook to make with a view to a Supplemental Estimate, has yet been concluded?

MR. GOSCHEN: I have not received any information on the subject, but will communicate with the Department.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government will consider the desirability of appropriating part of the money derived from the increased duty on spirits to provide for the free postage of newspapers to places beyond the cities and towns in which they are published, or as preliminary to that arrangement of reducing the postage on all newspapers weighing less than four ounces to one farthing each copy?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I hope the hon. Gentleman will not think I am treating him with discourtesy if I repeat the same answer I have already given to a question of the same character, that Her Majesty's Government are considering the question, but are not able yet to make any statement to the House.

MR. STUART RENDEL (Montgomeryshire): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware of the unanimity of feeling existing in Wales in reference to the expenditure of the Welsh portion of the moneys to be placed at the disposal of the County Councils under the provisions of the Local Taxation Bill; and, whether, in compliance with that feeling, he is prepared to consider favourably the allocation of the whole or a portion of such moneys for the purpose of Intermediate Education in Wales and Monmouthshire, and in furtherance of the objects of the Welsh Intermediate Education Act of last Session?

Mr. Sexton

*MR. W. H. SMITH: My answer is the same as that which I have given to the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. Leng.)

SATURDAY SITTINGS.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if there are to be any Saturday Sittings this Session?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sure the hon. Member will see that I have not the power of forecasting future events.

HELIGOLAND.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, before agreeing to the cession of Heligoland, Her Majesty's Government had any resolution from the Executive Council of Heligoland, assenting to the cession on behalf of the inhabitants, laid before them; what steps have been taken to ascertain the wishes of the inhabitants as to the transfer of the island to Germany; whether Her Majesty's Government have considered the very full evidence obtained by the correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette, and the statements in the Press of Mr. W. G. Black, Mr. Fraser Rae, and other gentlemen who have special means of knowing the sentiments of the inhabitants, to the effect that the transfer is viewed with the strongest aversion; whether any evidence has been produced to a contrary effect; and, if so, what evidence; and whether, having regard to these facts, Her Majesty's Government will re-consider their decision, and consent to send a Commissioner to ascertain the wishes of the inhabitants?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It has already been stated that no reference was made to the inhabitants of Heligoland on the question of the cession of the island. As I have said before, it would not be a matter for surprise that there should be regret at parting with a sovereignty under which the people have so long lived. While the utmost care has been taken in the agreement with Germany to secure for the inhabitants the continuance of the privileges they have hitherto enjoyed, it cannot, I think, be regarded as a hard thing to hand over the inhabitants of the island to a nation to which they are allied, both by blood and language. I believe there is an Executive Council in the island, but no Resolution of the kind referred to has been adopted.

*MR. CHANNING: Was any Despatch received by Her Majesty's Government from the Governor of the Island before the cession was agreed to, stating the grounds upon which he based his belief that the inhabitants would favour the transfer; and, if so, will Her Majesty's Government lay such Despatch on the Table of the House?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No such Despatch exists. The Governor of Heligoland was in this country at the time the negotiations were in progress, and personal communications proceeded with him on the subject.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): Is it the fact that the Agreement for the cession was signed in Berlin to-day; and, if so, will it be laid on the Table?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not aware.

MR. CONYBEARE: May I ask whether the conditions of the cession will apply to all persons on the Island or to adults only, and whether the children as they grow up will be subject to conscription under Germany?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Full details of the negotiations will be communicated to the House.

*MR. CHANNING: Are we to understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that the Government have information in their possession to the effect that the inhabitants are likely to approve of this transfer, and that the decision of Her Majesty's Government is to refuse to lay such information in any form before the House?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have repeatedly stated that Her Majesty's Government are satisfied with the conditions under which the cession has been made, and that they have been made under circumstances which will secure to the inhabitants a continuance of the privileges they have hitherto enjoyed.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE IN WALES.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I have a question on the Paper of my intention to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that violent resistance to the payment of tithe rent-charge has been renewed in Wales; that at Llanefydd, in the Vale of Clwyd, Mr. Stevens and a distraining party were unable to proceed with the recovery of tithe rent-charge by the ordinary means provided by the law owing to the disturbance of rioters; that stones were thrown, and one of the emergency men injured; whether he is also aware that there are at present arrears of tithe rent-charge in Wales amounting to thousands of pounds; that grave breaches of the peace are anticipated during the winter should remedial legislation be any longer denied; and whether, in the interests of law, order, and justice, he will recommend the House to proceed with the Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill in the present Session? At the request of my right hon. Friend I beg to postpone the question until Thursday.

MARINE INSURANCE.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if his attention has been called to a letter purporting to be signed by Messrs. J. and P. Hutchinson, shipping agents in Glasgow, and published in the Shipping Gazette of the 23rd June, in which the writers, replying to a demand for explanations from the Committee of Lloyd's regarding certain marine policies of insurance, make the following admissions:—

"We had issued a policy of insurance purporting to bear the signatures of certain Lloyd's underwriters, while, as a matter of fact, we had no mandate or authority to adhibit their names, and the policy which we issued did not even represent any actual contract made by them, the premiums being different to that at which the risk had been accepted"; and whether he will inquire into the genuineness of the letter, and if it be genuine if he will instruct the Procurator Fiscal, in the public interest, to investigate the prima facie case of forgery and fraud which the alleged admission establishes?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The matter which forms the subject of this question was fully investigated some time ago, but no such case was disclosed as to justify criminal proceedings.

THE ROYAL NAVY—TRAINING SHIPS.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he is aware that Commander Field is engaged in delivering lectures at some of our seaports regarding the pay and prospects of seamen in the Royal Navy for the purpose of obtaining an additional number of boys, and whether this is with the consent of the Admiralty; will he be good enough to state how the 4,514 lads specified in the Navy Estimates of last year are distributed, that is, how many are on board training brigs and how many otherwise afloat; how many of the 1,730 additional boys voted this year have been obtained; and whether any system is to be adopted whereby lads other than those trained on board the Britannia may compete for commissions?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): Of the 4,514 boys specified in the Navy Estimates of last year, 1,892 are in the training ships and 96 in the brigs, the remainder being distributed in various capacities over the Fleet. The number of boys to be entered this year in excess of the numbers last year is 1,290. Of these, 727 have been entered since April 1, 1890. A few boys are already entered direct as midshipmen or cadets from the Worcester and Conway training ships.

NAVAL MANŒUVRES.

MR. GOURLEY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is intended during the autumn to mobilise the Channel and Reserve Squadrons, on a similar or larger scale than last year, for the Naval Manœuvres; if so, whether, with the large addition of ocean cruisers, it is intended to extend the scope of the experimental operations to the protection of the leading food and cotton ocean routes between the United Kingdom, America, India, and Australia, notifying to owners and commanders of British ships that they will be expected to avoid (if possible) capture by experimental cruisers, in place of instructing the officers of Her Majesty's ships nominally to capture merchantmen under conditions totally opposed to what must exist in actual war?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): Speaking generally, my answer to the first question is in the affirmative, and to the second in the negative.

Mr. Gourley

MR. GOURLEY: Perhaps the noble Lord will state how many squadrons are to be mobilised.

LORD G. HAMILTON: There will be two fleets—one against the other. I believe the mobilisation will be of such a nature as to be efficient; but the question is of a character that I cannot answer.

FLASHING SIGNALS.

MR. BALLANTINE (Coventry): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Treasury has decided upon offering Admiral Colomb £2,000 as an adequate settlement of his claims in respect of his invention of flashing signals; and, if so, when this offer will be officially communicated to Admiral Colomb?

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): Has the noble Lord seen a statement of claim, laid before the Admiralty in July, 1859, in which Major General Charles Babbage states that his father was the inventor of flashing signals, and published full particulars in the Times, and exhibited the apparatus in work years before the patent of Admiral Colomb?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The Government have decided to offer Admiral Colomb a further grant of £2,000 for his services in connection with the introduction into the Navy of the system of flashing signals, and this offer will be at once officially communicated to Admiral Colomb. The claims not only of the late Major General Charles Babbage, but also of another gentleman, to be considered the originator of the system of flashing signals have been brought to my notice. The question they raise is one rather for a Court of Law than a Public Department to decide. I cannot undertake to express an opinion upon the claims in question. Admiral Colomb's claim to have adapted flashing signals to Naval uses is not, I believe, disputed.

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM: The noble Lord refers to "a further sum of £2,000." What is the amount Admiral Colomb has already received?

LORD G. HAMILTON: £1,000.

THE NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE REGIMENT.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the case of Richard Hinde, who was recently fined 40s. and costs, or in default seven days' hard labour, at Lichfield Petty Sessions, for being absent through inadvertence from the annual training of the 3rd Battalion North Staffordshire Regiment on 29th April; and whether he will take into his consideration the desirability of remitting a portion of the sentence?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The Justices inform me that the prisoner's defence was that he did not know to which regiment he belonged, the 3rd or the 4th Battalion; but inasmuch as he had served for several years in the Army, and had trained last year with the 3rd Battalion, the Justices deemed his excuse insufficient, and imposed the minimum penalty of 40s. In default of payment the prisoner was committed for the minimum term of seven days' imprisonment, which sentence expires to-day. It does not seem to me to be a case calling for any interference on my part.

"MITCHELL v. REGINA."

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he has received repeated applications from the Suppliant in "Mitchell v. Regina," for payment of the small sum due under allowance regulations for having performed the duty of Paymaster at Manchester in 1885-6, when he was also commanding Royal Engineers, and Officer commanding the troops; and whether it is true that his application has been refused; and, if so, can he explain the reason for this refusal?

*THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY FOR WAR (MR. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): Colonel Mitchell was not entitled to the allowance he claimed, and he has been repeatedly so informed.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the Petition of Right, presented by the Suppliant in "Mitchell v. Regina" in 1888?

MR. MATTHEWS: It is not usual to lay such documents upon the Table of the House, and as the case arising upon the Petition has been decided by the legal tribunals of the country, I do not see that any public advantage would be gained by such a course. I shall be glad to show the Petition to the hon. Member if he wishes it.

INQUEST AT BLACKPOOL.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the circumstances attending an inquest held in Blackpool, on Monday, on the body of a woman found dead in a house in that town, in which no evidence, medical or other, as to the cause of death was submitted to the jury; and that the jury insisted, in spite of the strenuous opposition of the Coroner, upon a post mortem examination of the body being made; whether application has been made to him for authority to exhume the body for this purpose; and what he proposes to do in the matter?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; my attention has been called to this matter, and I am informed by the Coroner that the deceased was found dead in her own house on the 21st June. The police having no suspicions of foul play, and the body being greatly decomposed, the Coroner did not think a post mortem necessary, and for sanitary reasons ordered the burial of the body, which had been duly viewed by the Jury, at the earliest possible period. The Jurors at the inquest, which was held in the afternoon of 23rd June, the body having been buried in the morning of that day, declared their inability to find a verdict in the absence of medical evidence. The Coroner accordingly issued his precept for the exhumation of the body, and an inquest was held and medical evidence given, with the result that the verdict was death from natural causes. I do not propose to take any action, as I do not gather from the facts before me that the Coroner has failed in his duty.

PROCESSIONS TO HYDE PARK.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Whitehaven): I wish to put a question to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, of which I have given him private notice, and if he cannot answer it now, I will repeat the question on Thursday. I wish to ask him whether he has seen a paragraph in the Times to-day, in which it is stated that certain persons, calling themselves "the Open-air Meetings Committee" have "Unanimously decided to meet on Clerkenwell Green next Saturday, march in procession to Hyde Park, and there hold a public meeting with a view to the assertion of the right of public procession and public meeting in London" in the interests of the public. Will the right hon. Gentleman take steps to prevent wanton and unnecessary proceedings and obstruction in the public thoroughfares which are absolutely contrary to the wishes of the inhabitants of the Metropolis, and which materially interfere with their ordinary occupations and business?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have not seen the paragraph in question, but I will make inquiry and see what steps ought to be taken.

DEATH FROM STARVATION.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if his attention has been directed to the verdict of the Coroner's Jury at the Vestry Hall, E., on Thursday last, on the death of Elizabeth Bryant, which was "that the deceased died of starvation;" whether he is aware that the Parish Authorities, as reported, refused deceased outdoor relief, and that in consequence, rather than go into the workhouse, deceased died; and if, in face of the apparent dislike (even to preferring death by starvation) of the poor of the East End to the indoor system, he will advise that the system shall be relaxed?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have no information upon the matter referred to; but if the hon. Member will give me particulars as to the name of the Coroner who held the inquest, or the place at which it was held, I shall be happy to make inquiry.

OUTRAGES IN ARMENIA.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the statement in the Daily News of Monday, to the effect that Halil Pacha, Governor of Van, is constantly supplying Martini-Henry rifles to the Kurdish chiefs of the district; that the Kurds, emboldened by the encouragement they meet with in high places, are committing every kind of outrage and atrocity on the Armenian people; that on the 23rd of May the Kurds outraged an Armenian woman of Kavash, and cut off her breasts with their swords, death following shortly after the deed; that murders have been committed by Turkish soldiers in the town of Van itself; that towards the middle of April more than 15 villages lying to the south of Van were raided by the Kurdish brigand chief Shakir; and that the Governor, Halil Pacha, has effected no arrests; whether the Government have any information relating to these matters; and whether they will cause inquiry to be made?

*MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I wish to put this further question to the right hon. Gentleman—whether he has seen the following statement in the Daily News of this morning:—

"Most of the principal outlaws and bad characters who were arrested last year and cast into prison, in consequence of the Armenian agitation in Europe, have been let loose, and are now overrunning the country. The miscreants have, it is reported, purchased their release through the Turkish Governors on payment of substantial sums. The notorious Hussein Bey, of Hosh, in the Kharpout district, whose name is dreaded throughout the country, and whose misdeeds are almost unsurpassed in the criminal annals of Turkey, having slaughtered more than 15 Armenians during his lifetime, has been released from the Erzeroum Gaol, and appointed to a high public office at Kharpout. The inhabitants of the district are almost panic stricken in consequence. The policy of exterminating the Armenian element is being pursued with unabated vigour. While a great number of Armenians emigrate to distant climes through want of security and protection to life and property, those who venture to return to their country are killed on their way by Kurdish brigands at the instigation of the local officials."

I wish also to ask whether there are still a number of Christians imprisoned at Erzeroum and at Erzincan, where they have been lying for two years and a half; and whether the Under Secretary will inquire into the truth of these allegations, and use his influence to prevent further misdoings?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FER-GUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): In answer to the question on the Paper I have to say that we have received no such information, but there is no doubt that the Kurds are armed. Nor have we received any information of the shocking occurrence stated by a newspaper correspondent to have occurred at Kavash. On April 19 the Vice Consul at Van reported that a company of 16 mounted Kurds made a descent into the Havatzor Valley, 10 miles from Van, for the purpose of levying blackmail. On May 19 the Consul at Erzeroum reported that the Vali was making "honest and strenuous efforts" to have these Kurds arrested; and I observe to-day a telegram that one of the leaders has been arrested. With regard to the last question, I have no doubt that these matters will be reported on in due course; but the hon. Gentleman will observe that in the newspaper from which he takes these statements they are professedly not from its own correspondent, but either from "An Armenian correspondent," or were rumours. In regard to the question of the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Schwann), I may say that I only received it just before I came to the House, and I have not had an opportunity of making inquiries. It is a question which I could not undertake to answer off-hand.

*MR. SCHWANN: Will the right hon. Gentleman make inquiries?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I will make inquiries at the Foreign Office. I cannot carry all the Records of the Office in my head. I shall be happy to give him an answer if he will put the question on the Paper.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Have the Government received information of any representation having been made by the Russian Consul, and will the right hon. Gentleman consider the advisability of a joint representation being made to the Porte?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I can answer that question now, and also the question of the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. F. Stevenson) upon the same subject. [To ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is true that the Russian Consul at Erzeroum has addressed remonstrances to the Turkish Authorities on the subject of the outrages which have been committed against the Armenian population; and whether the British Consul has been, or will be, instructed to address similar remonstrances?] We have asked our Consul at Erzeroum, in conjunction with the Russian and French Consuls, to make a joint representation as to the measures thought to be necessary. The recommendations have been brought to the notice of the Grand Vizier at Constantinople by Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires, and certain orders have been given in accordance with those representations.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON: Will the Government instruct Mr. Clifford Lloyd to convey information as soon as possible to the Government with regard to the matters referred to in his question?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that it is totally unnecessary to convey such special directions. Mr. C. Lloyd has interested himself greatly in these things. [Cries of "Oh!" from the IRISH MEMBERS.] I do not know on what grounds hon. Gentlemen should doubt the truth of that statement. Mr. Clifford Lloyd has constantly interested himself greatly in these matters. I have explained to the House over and over again that newspaper correspondents have only to telegraph a rumour; whereas Her Majesty's Representative has to ascertain its correctness before making a Report.

THE ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what is the object of the negotiations with Germany as regards Walfisch Bay; whether the Government will undertake not to make any cession of territory at Walfisch Bay without the consent of the Cape Colony; and whether the negotiations with regard to Walfisch Bay form part of the negotiations for the general Anglo-German Agreement?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The object of the negotiations is the delimitation of the southern boundary of Walfisch Bay. There is no question of cession of territory. The matter will be dealt with by the Agreement.

MR. BUCHANAN: Has the Cape Colony been consulted?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am not prepared to answer that question.

BARRACKS AT COLCHESTER.

MR. ROUND (Essex, N.E., Harwich): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he proposes to erect permanent infantry barracks at Colchester in place of the wooden huts now in use and which were built for temporary occupation by the German Legion at the time of the Crimean War?

MR. BRODRICK: If any of the huts are found unfit for occupation they will be replaced by others built of permanent materials.

HOLIDAY FOR POSTMEN.

COLONEL EYRE (Lincolnshire, Gainsborough): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the postmen throughout the United Kingdom are to have a general holiday on the 2nd of July; and whether postmen availing themselves of this holiday will have to pay substitutes for their work?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The intention is that, if possible, all officers who can be spared shall have a holiday on July 2, and those who cannot be spared shall have a holiday on some other day during the year. All substitutes will be paid by the Department.

HOUSE OF COMMONS ENVELOPES.

MR. DONALD CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will give instructions for Members being supplied, at the rate of a penny, with envelopes having a penny stamp embossed on House of Commons paper; and, if so, how soon they will be obtainable?

*MR. RAIKES: I have already suggested to the authorities of the House an arrangement under which House of Commons envelopes with embossed stamps could be supplied to Members at the Post Office in the House. The part of the Post Office in the matter will be simply to keep them on sale, and this part it will be prepared to carry out as soon as the envelopes are ready.

POST OFFICE TELEGRAPHISTS.

MR. LAFONE (Southwark, Bermondsey): May I ask the Postmaster General if there is any truth in the statement which appears in this morning papers, that the telegraphists employed by the Post Office refuse to work overtime?

*MR. RAIKES: At the Central Telegraph Office, where the business is liable to sudden increase from unforeseen causes, it is impossible to carry on the work without overtime. Every effort is made, however, to restrict the overtime, and additions are made to the staff from time to time as the number of messages increases or additional wires are brought into operation. Less than a year ago authority was given to increase the number of telegraphists by 100, and no time was lost in training the new hands. The question of a further increase of the force is now under examination. The necessity for overtime is, I am sure, appreciated by the general body of the telegraphists, and I do not entertain any apprehension that these officers have it in contemplation to refuse to perform duties which are required in the interests of the public. They are well aware that one of the difficulties which the Department has to contend with in this matter arises out of its desire to allow those officers who are not juniors to take their holidays in the summer season of the year, and they are also aware that if overtime were entirely abolished there would be a grievance on the part of a large proportion of the staff by whom the payment for the overtime is welcomed as an additional source of income.

ALLOTMENTS AT TIDDINGTON.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Penrith (Mr. J. W. Lowther) whether he is aware that, under a bequest of a Mrs. Ann Jenkinson, a sum of money was left, the interest of which was to be applied to the reduction of the rents of allotments held by poor men residing at Tiddington, near Alveston, Warwickshire; whether it is true that the Trustees of this Charity have rented from one of their number (the Vicar) nine acres of glebe land at a rental of £3 10s. per acre, and have sub-let the same to labourers in allotments at £3 per acre, while the adjacent portion of the glebe land has been let to a farmer at 25s. per acre, and the rent for allotments in neighbouring parishes is 30s. to 35s. per acre; and whether the Charity Commissioners will take steps to ensure the operation of the benevolent intentions of the testatrix for the benefit of the allotment holders of Tiddington?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): The facts set out in the question are not absolutely accurate, but are substantially correct. The Vicar, on May 19, suggested that the tenancy of the Trustees should be determined, and on June 5 the Commissioners informed the Trustees that this course was desirable.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: The hon. Gentleman has not answered the last paragraph of the question.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: It seems to me that it is a matter for the Trustees themselves to carry out. Of course, the Commissioners will do everything in their power to assist the Trustees in carrying out the scheme.

BRITISH GUIANA.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Government has yet received any Report respecting the charges of misconduct against the Chief Justice and other Judges of British Guiana preferred by the late Mr. de Souza, or has made the inquiries promised in reply to questions put to him on or about the 17th November, 1888; whether two editors of newspapers in British Guiana were committed to prison for commenting on the de Souza case, after all proceedings connected therewith were terminated; whether they were fined, and to what amount, before they could obtain their release; and whether, having regard to the decision of the Privy Council in the de Souza case, he will consider the propriety of remitting such fines?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth): In November, 1888, it was stated, in answer to questions in this House, that Mr. de Souza had notified his intention to prefer charges of misconduct against the Judges of British Guiana, and that on the receipt of such charges, if they were not accompanied by a full Report, Her Majesty's Government would call for such further Report as might be necessary. Mr. de Souza did not prefer any charges, and there was, therefore, no occasion for Her Majesty's Government to call for a further Report. Mr. de Souza obtained permission to appeal to Her Majesty in Council against the sentence imposed upon him for contempt of Court by the Supreme Court of British Guiana, but he died before the appeal could be prosecuted. In November, 1888, two editors of newspapers in British Guiana were sentenced to pay fines of £50 and £20, and in default of payment to be imprisoned until the fines were paid, for contempt of Court in publishing articles containing scandalous and libellous statements tending to obstruct and prejudice the administration of justice. The articles related to the de Souza case, and were published after the proceedings in that case had terminated. One of the editors paid the fine without going to prison, and the other after being in prison for one day. The only decision of the Privy Council in the de Souza case was that Mr. de Souza should have special leave to appeal against the orders of the Colonial Court. Her Majesty's Government do not propose to direct the re-payment of the fines.

MR. CONYBEARE: Do I understand from the answer of the right hon. Gentleman that Mr. de Souza died before the appeal could be prosecuted?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Yes, Sir; that is so.

DORMANT FUNDS IN CHANCERY.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: I had intended to ask the Attorney General if, in reference to the dormant funds in Chancery, he will consider whether the publication of the lists may not be made more useful to the public by giving the names of the estates and "matters" which are the subject of the suits in addition to the titles of the suits; and whether the office still retains its objections to publishing the amounts of money to the credit of each suit? but I beg to postpone the question until Thursday.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA CONSTITUTION (RE-COMMITTED) BILL.—(No. 256.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill again considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 agreed to.

*(4.15.) MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire, Arfon): I beg to move the addition of the following clause:—

"Any Act of the Legislature of Western Australia authorising the imposition of restrictions on the emigration of British subjects into Western Australia, other than persons who have been convicted of crime, shall be void."

I think we ought, in this House, to guard against any want of forethought upon the part of the colony in future. The object of the clause is to provide that in case the inhabitants of Western Australia desire hereafter to pass a law which would restrict the migration of British subjects to that colony it would be necessary, in the first instance, to obtain the consent of the British Parliament. The Imperial Government ought to act as trustees, not only of the 40,000 persons who now constitute the inhabitants of Western Australia, but of all British subjects who desire to colonise that region. It may be said that at present there is no danger of such an interdiction being proposed, because the Western Australians are anxious for immigration. But that is just the reason why we should embrace the opportunity of laying down a rule which would prevent the possibility in future of hurried and unwise legislation, and perhaps do that which it would be impossible to undo. A real danger exists, and I trust that that want of foresight which has hitherto characterised the regulation of our colonies will not be further extended. Anyone who watches the current of events in foreign countries will see that there is danger, and that a strong feeling is being expressed against the continuance of emigration to fields which have hitherto been open to the subjects of this country. We may learn a great deal from the action of the United States. The people there are the most advanced of all the democratic countries in the world, and have had a greater experience of democracy than any other, but anyone who has studied the course of politics there will see that there future difficulties and dangers threaten them in reference to emigration. What I ask now is that we should take precautions against hasty legislation in times of peculiar pressure in the future. Let me give an instance. The American people have found that one of the greatest dangers to democracy is an unwise and profuse expenditure in regard to local matters, the result of the past action on the part of more than one local legislature having been to reduce the localities to the verge of bankruptcy. The American people have, therefore, in nine of the principal States of the Union grafted upon their Constitution laws which prevent local expenditure or local taxation from exceeding a certain amount. In that way the hands of the Local Legislatures have been tied, so that it requires two or three years of successive action before an excessive expenditure can be incurred. That, I think, would be the effect of the proposal I now make. Hitherto, there has been no Federal Constitution in Australia, and, consequently, our legislation cannot take the exact form which it has taken in the American States; but the Imperial Government is responsible, not merely to the present inhabitants of Western Australia, but for all time. I am not afraid of the democracy acting in any ungenerous or narrow spirit if they have time to think, and can have the justice of the case placed before them by those whom they are willing to listen to.

But I cannot forget that a few years ago, after a period of lengthened distress in America, the working classes became irritated at the change in their condition, and took steps to prevent emigration. Similar reaction from overtrading may happen in Western Australia, and I am afraid that if it does the blame will be attached to the emigrants from England, Scotland, and Ireland, who go over there to compete with the colonists in their work, and that, under the pressure of temporary distress, the colony may be tempted to pass hasty and unwise laws against emigration from this country. And when once bad laws are imposed it is difficult to make a retreat. I, therefore, propose that no such legislation shall be permissible on the part of the inhabitants of Western Australia against their fellow-subjects in this country without an appeal to Parliament. The witnesses who were examined before the Committee which sat recently upon this subject expressed their willingness to accept a clause in the direction of my Amendment, and I think the House would display a gross want of forethought if they neglect the present opportunity of protecting those portions of Her Majesty's subjects who may hereafter desire to emigrate.

New Clause (Emigration of British subjects,) brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read the second time."

*(4.28.) MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): The hon. Member has assigned various reasons in support of his proposal, and among them he has referred to the evidence before the Select Committee. But it so happens that not a single witness was in favour of this clause. One after another, including Sir William Robinson, the present Governor, and Sir Napier Broome, the late Governor, they all stated that there is no necessity for it, and the only evidence which in the slightest degree justifies what my hon. Friend has stated was that of Mr. Parker, one of the leading men in the colony. And all that Mr. Parker said was that the introduction of Chinese British subjects under Clause 8 might give rise to a considerable amount of agitation, and, therefore, he was in favour of in-serting in the clause "not being Chinese;" and when the difficulty of the Imperial Authorities legislating against the Chinese was brought to his notice; he also thought that the whole clause should be abandoned. We know that the Australians will not allow Chinese to go into their territories. They would come in hundreds and thousands from Penang, from Singapore, and from Hong Kong if they were once allowed to enter. Surely it is better to allow these colonies to settle the question of emigration themselves instead of taking it into your own hands. The Amendment is perfectly unnecessary. For there, every law passed by any Australian Legislature may within two years be annulled by the Crown. The consequence is that if any Act is passed which may prevent British emigrants going to Australia, it may be annulled at any time within two years after its passage. There is also another reason why the clause is unnecessary. In the general form of instructions given to the Governors of colonies there is included a clause providing that they are to reserve for the consideration of the Crown any Act which is to the prejudice of any British subject, and under that clause every Act which has been passed against the immigration of British subjects, including Chinese, has been reserved for the consideration of the Crown. For these reasons I think it is quite unnecessary, and it would certainly be very objectionable to the Australian Colonies, that a clause of this sort should be inserted in this Bill.

(4.34.) MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): No one could have more sympathy than I have with the view of my hon. Friend (Mr. Rathbone) as to the desirability of providing such outlets as we can for our surplus population. I think, however, that the proposed Amendment would not attain the object my hon. Friend has in view, and the hon. Member who has just spoken has shown that the proposal is entirely unnecessary. The point which has been raised with regard to Chinese subjects of Great Britain is one of the utmost importance. We are asked to give Parliamentary sanction to the emigration of Chinese into Western Australia. I think it is most undesirable. It is undesirable that this country should have so disagreeable a matter brought under its jurisdiction as that of having to decide whether or not the Chinese should be freely admitted into the British Empire. It has been found necessary in America to put restrictions upon the immigration of Chinese, and I think very rightly so. In Canada the same course has been adopted, and in that case it was also very desirable. In the present situation in Australia I do not think it would be for the welfare of the State that the Chinese should be allowed free entry. On the other hand, the value of Chinese support in our relations with the East is of an importance that cannot be denied, and I deprecate the attempt to introduce disturbing questions of this kind into the relative positions of the two countries.

*(5.36.) MR. RANKIN (Herefordshire, Leominster): I am ready to support the Amendment or some modification of it, and I think that the difficulty with regard to the Chinese, who are also British subjects, may be met by some slight alteration in the wording of the new clause proposed by the hon. Member for Carnarvonshire. We must remember that this country is making an enormous concession to the Western Australians, and I think it is only reasonable that we should insist upon the imposition of some conditions. The Western Australians are the English, Scotch, and Irish of a few years back, and will be the English, Scotch, and Irish of a few years to come; and it seems to me right that, when making such an enormous concession to these few persons, we should obtain conditions which will be for the benefit of our own nation for years to come. I fully endorse what has been said as to the likelihood of our requiring outlets for the people, and I would strongly press on the Government that they should adopt some clause of this sort. The Government themselves, by the clause (8) which they put into their own Bill at first, show that they consider some arrangement about this matter of emigration in the future is necessary and just, and I am sure that the Western Australians would gladly accept such a clause. It is true that the other Australian Colonies are by no means ready to welcome our emigrants now; and as this region is practically the only one left over which we have any control, I think it would be an act of folly to throw away our last chance of getting settlements for our people.

(4.42.) MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I do not think there is any fear in the mind of anyone who has travelled in the Australian Colonies that the Australian people will ever impose any real disability on citizens of this country desiring to go to Australia. The idea is absurd, but it is true, no matter whether you pass this clause or not, that the Australian people will certainly reserve to themselves the same rights as are enjoyed by the American people for the control of immigration. They will insist, no matter what the English Parliament may do, on their right to restrict objectionable immigration. This objectionable immigration comes under three heads. First of all, that of the Chinese subjects of Her Majesty; secondly, of the coolies from India, which is objected to by a large section of the community, and also of those that reside in the Fiji Islands and the Southern Sea. The latter class of immigrants are admitted in some places, but objected to in others, and not allowed to land. The proposed clause will become more and more onerous in proportion to the increase of white labour in the colony. But there is another class of immigration which the Australian Colonies are beginning to object to, and will increasingly object to, namely, the importation of paupers from other countries. No matter what this House passes, Australia will not allow you to land your paupers on her shores. And more than that, I believe they will shortly stop the system of contract labour which the American people are now legislating against—the system under which large employers of labour enter into contracts with bodies of men to work for them, giving them free passages and giving them a fixed rate of wages lower than the rate generally prevailing in the country. As has been pointed out, Western Australia will have no right to pass any Act without the consent of the Crown; but what would be the result if the House were so ill-advised as to pass any clause of this kind? Simply to bring ourselves into collision with the Legislature of Western Australia. When the Act excluding the Chinese from New South Wales was sent home for the consideration of the Crown, the Executive of the colony did not wait for the assent of the Crown, but at once stopped the Chinese coming into the country, thus setting the authority of the Imperial Parliament at defiance. That is exactly what would happen in Western Australia if any such clause as this were agreed to, and you know that public opinion in this country would not back you up in any high-handed proceeding against the colony. Do you mean to say that you would tie up the hands of the people of Western Australia by a clause of this kind? If they take the matter in their own hands, what are you going to do? I believe that in the whole history of the Australian Colonies the only other instance in which Australia undertook to interfere with the free landing of British subjects from the United Kingdom was when they would not allow certain informers in the Phoenix Park murder case to land. They had no law to justify their action; but the Executive of the Colony, trusting to their own judgment, and having confidence in the people, took it upon themselves to do it. They said, "We will not allow these men to land, as it would interfere with public peace and tranquillity." These men had committed no crime. They were sent out by the Home Government, who were under apprehensions as to their safety; but the Executive of the colony said, "We will not let them land," and the Home Government acquiesced in that decision. I maintain that this clause is unnecessary and mischievous, and calculated to lead to future trouble with the colony.

*(4.49.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): Her Majesty's Government appreciate the motives of the hon. Member who moves the clause; but, at the same time, I think he can judge from the arguments put forward on both sides of the House that it cannot be inserted in the Bill. Her Majesty's Government are anxious to do all in their power to promote emigration, but I do not think that the method he has suggested would be likely to forward that object. Independently of that consideration, I would point out to the hon. Gentleman that the course he proposes is entirely without precedent. The other Australian Colonies have received responsible Government, but no such regulation was ever imposed on them, and if Western Australia is entitled to responsible Government the House would not be justified in imposing upon her restrictions that would be entirely foreign to those to which the other Australian Colonies are subjected. I would further point out to the hon. Member that the evidence produced before the Committee was entirely opposed to his view. All the witnesses examined—or all those who had had the best opportunity of forming an opinion—expressed themselves in the same sense as the hon. Member for Leicester. They said, "The Western Australians would reject any legislation of this sort;" and the fact of an enormous tract of land being handed over to them is rather in favour of than against their doing all they can to promote emigration. We have been told that 8,000 may be taken to represent the adult male population of Western Australia. I do not pledge myself to the accuracy of those figures; but, if they are correct, surely that is an argument in favour of the proposition that these men will do all they can to invite labour to their shores, for the purpose of developing to the utmost the resources of the vast area so sparsely populated. Two Governors of the colony have testified to the fact that Western Australia would strenuously oppose any such clause as this. They object, as I suppose we should object, to a wholesome system of immigration which, to use a familiar Colonial expression, dumps down on their shores large numbers of paupers and criminals. And I think they are justified in that objection; and to say that they shall not be allowed to enforce any regulation with regard to that matter which shall not previously have received the assent of Parliament in this country is to impose upon them a restriction which is unfair and not in accordance with the principles of responsible Government. Further. The Act to remove doubts as to the validity of Colonial Laws, the 28 and 29 Vict., cap. 63, provides, in Sections 2 and 3, as follows:—

“Any Colonial Law which is or shall be in any respect repugnant to the Provisions of any Act of Parliament extending to the Colony to which such Law may relate, or repugnant to any Order or Regulation made under Authority of such Act of Parliament, or having in the Colony the Force and effect of such Act, shall be read subject to such Act, Order, or Regulation, and shall to the extent of such Repugnancy, but not otherwise, be and remain absolutely void and inoperative. No Colonial Law shall be or be deemed to have been void or inoperative on the ground of Repugnancy to the Law of England unless the same shall be repugnant to the Provisions of some such Act of Parliament, Order, or Regulation as aforesaid.”

I think the new clause of the hon. Gentleman would be in contravention of these sections; but be that as it may, I hope that, in view of the fact that such a regulation has never been adopted in the case of any of the other colonies, and taking into consideration the fact that the evidence taken before the Committee was strongly against the principle affirmed by the clause, the hon. Gentleman will not divide the Committee, and will accept the views I have laid before him.

Baron H. de Worms

(4.56.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): While I think the Amendment right, I doubt if the hon. Member will be able to carry it, or whether Her Majesty's Government will be at all likely to be induced to accept it, because now that we are giving Western Australia so-called “statesmen”—who are somewhat on a level with the Councillors of a tenth-rate town in this country—responsible Government, it would hardly be of any use to try and impose on the colony terms different to those we impose on other colonies. If this clause is imposed on Western Australia, we ought to impose it on all the other colonies. I think it is a clause that ought to be imposed on all the other colonies, but Her Majesty's Government do not dare to impose it on them. They dare not say “boo” to the colonies nowadays. There was a time—a century ago—when we were inclined to tyrannise over the colonies, but now the colonies tyrannise over us. The hon. Member for Mayo told us that New South Wales defied the law in regard to foreign immigration. He referred to the Chinese question. I am sure he did not wish to raise that question, but was desirous only of raising the question of what we may call the immigration of European-British subjects. The question is, whether the white subjects of Her Majesty from these British Islands should be allowed to emigrate from this country to Western Australia. Then my hon. Friend the Member for Mayo (Mr. Dillon) says we should have to make war upon these colonies in order to force our emigrants upon them. You cannot make war upon these colonies, but you can withdraw your connection and refuse to occupy the humiliating position we now occupy. You dare not contradict your colonies. You give them all they want; but when you want anything from them, you dare not insist upon having it. We are consenting to this tyrannical, overbearing treatment of the colonies. It seems to me it would be far better to say to the colonies: “If you desire to maintain the connection with us, and to retain our assistance, you must accede to our demands. Otherwise, let us part amicably.” If the colonies quarrelled with other countries we should be bound to back them, whether they were right or wrong; and I think that if the connection is to continue, they should at least submit to the reasonable demands of this country. One of those demands is that, as long as this is a United Empire, the citizens of one part shall be free to go to another part, and shall not be shut out by restrictive rules. We are told that the Australians must not admit paupers. There are paupers and paupers. A man who is unfitted to earn his bread ought not to be sent out, but I do not think that poor men ought to be shut out if they are able to earn their bread, although they may not be able to do so in this country.

*(5.5.) SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I should like to mention one consideration which I hope will induce the hon. Member to withdraw his Amendment. There is no Australian Legislature that has yet imposed restrictions on the immigration of British subjects into Australia. That which hon. Members mistake for such legislation is a provision against spending the money of the colonies upon taking emigrants to Australia. I may remark in this connection that the chief difficulty in regard to emigration is its cost. It has been conclusively proved that it costs between £20 and £30 to transfer a human being from this country to Australia and to settle him there. The Australians, however, are not likely in any way to interfere with the immigration of British subjects provided we pay for it. There are two technical objections to this Amendment: One is, that it would permit Chinese and coolie immigration; and the other, that the only persons exempt would be those convicted of crime. There already exist Customs Acts which prevent the landing in these colonies of persons who are not convicted of crime, including lunatics and other persons who are hopeless paupers. I think the Amendment would not be objected to by the Australians, for the reason that they do not intend to carry out any regulation forbidding the immigration of capable citizens. But I think it is unnecessary, and that it would be very injudicious, to say the least of it, to put it into the Bill.

(5.7.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) I believe the true policy of this House and of the country is to trust the colonists in this matter of emigration. I have, however, only risen to correct an error inadvertently made by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir G. Campbell) yesterday, and which might have some importance in Australia. He quoted from a letter which he stated was from my correspondent, Mr. Hensman, but which was, in fact, written by another gentleman to the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith), and which was in opposition to responsible Government. It is of some importance to Mr. Hensman that I should say neither he nor anyone else I know of acting in connection with him in Western Australia has written to me or anyone else words contrary to the adoption of responsible Government in Western Australia. The objection taken by Mr. Hensman and his friends was solely to the form of the Bill.

(5.9.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I have refrained from speaking on this Bill in the hope that it would pass the House at a much earlier period, and I have now to express my extreme regret that those who have thought it their duty to oppose the Bill should have made use of words of opprobrium towards the Australian Colonies. It can have no good effect, and may lead to ill-feeling between the colonists and ourselves such as we all wish to avoid. It would be an absurdity to add such an Amendment to the Bill. I hope that neither here nor elsewhere will restrictions be imposed on emigration; but we must not forget that these are just the questions which arise at times when labour is plentiful and wages are falling, and these are just the occasions when the colonists would be tempted to rebel against any tie upon them. I will not push the matter further, as I understand the hon. Member does not intend to carry his Amendment to a Division. I regret that against any portion of our colonial dominions suggestions of jobbery and insult, and trying to trample upon us, words which may go to the other side of the world, and be treated there as of more importance than they deserve, should be uttered in this House.

*MR. RATHBONE: I have never uttered one word—

MR. BRADLAUGH: I referred to the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy.

T

*MR. RATHBONE: I have never said one word in disparagement of the Australian Colonies. I must confess that the arguments of the Under Secretary for the Colonies are somewhat extraordinary coming from a Member of a Government who, with the consent of the Representatives of Western Australia, inserted in the Bill a clause very similar to my own. Let me point out that if this clause were read a second time it would be perfectly competent for the House to introduce words confining it to the interests of the inhabitants of the United Kingdom. The hon. Member for Shropshire talked of millions of Chinese coming in as British subjects. The hon. Gentleman—and other Members who have spoken—seem to forget that the Chinese difficulty exists now, and that it will exist if the Australians pass laws against the immigration of Chinese, laws which have to be sanctioned by Her Majesty's Government. The Queen will have to give her sanction to any of the laws which are passed against the Chinese by the Australians, and, therefore, my proposal is a wise one, because the fact of such a law existing will probably prevent objectionable legislation being proposed in Australia in times of pressure. The Under Secretary for the Colonies says there is no precedent for what I suggest. I admit there is not. I contend there is no precedent for proper foresight and statesmanship on the part of the Government of this country in dealing with our colonies. We have never taken sufficient care to look ahead more than one or two years, hence the difficulties that have occurred, and will occur again. I am afraid that there is a disposition on the part of the present Government to deal only with the difficulties of to-day, and that there is little hope of my persuading the House to look further ahead.

Question put, and negatived.

*(5.22.) MR. P. MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to move the new clause which stands in my name, which is to the effect that, whether the lands be alienated or not, the gold and silver mines be vested in the Colonial Legislature. As I understand the Bill, by it the gold and silver to be found in the lands of Western Australia will pass under the general words of the clause to the persons who become possessed of the lands. I believe that the Crown cannot divest itself of the precious metals without a special Act. In this country the gold and silver found even in copper mines is vested in the Crown. Though a man may own the fee-simple of his lands and is entitled to all the mines and minerals they contain, yet he cannot touch the gold and silver without the permission of, or an arrangement with, the Crown. There is another reason why what I propose should be emphasised by a new clause. The rights of the Crown, or rather the Colonial Legislature, should be reserved in the same way as they are here at home. I am possessed of certain lands in Wales with all the mines and minerals. My predecessors in title have possessed the same rights of ownership, yet directly I attempted to mine for gold or silver on lands of which I hold the title deeds, giving me the right to the mines and minerals, I was prevented to work the lands in search of gold and silver. If, therefore, I was prevented from gold mining in this country à fortiori, the colonists of Western Australia should not be entitled either to seek for gold and silver without permission of the Local Legislature. Not only would I have my new clause apply to the mines of gold and silver contained in the lands to be handed over to the control of the Legislature of Western Australia, but to all lands that have been alienated. I have lived a long time in Australia, and although I have not taken part in the Debate on the Bill as a whole, yet, notwithstanding that the franchise under it may be regarded as too high, I consider that it is a good Bill, and I congratulate the Government upon introducing it. I hope that it will be speedily passed into law. In the Colony of Victoria lands which have been alienated 20, 30, or 50 years are found afterwards to contain precious metals; and, recently, a special Act of the Local Legislature has been passed whereby the right to the precious metals shall revert after 10 years to the Crown. I wish that this should be done at once in Western Australia for the benefit of working men, who would then have nothing to do but pay their fee of 10s. each, and with their picks begin to dig for gold—even on the alienated lands—to enter upon the lands of private persons in Western Australia; of course by paying compensation, as now can be done in Victoria. It is with this object in view that I propose the new clause.

New Clause (Mines and Minerals)
(Mr. P. Morgan), brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed.
"That the Clause be now read a second time.

BARON H. DE WORMS: I think the hon. Gentleman has scarcely considered his own clause, or he would have found it is absolutely unnecessary. In the first place, he speaks of all mines. "All mines" include gold and silver mines. Then again, "minerals" include gold and silver. That is the opinion of the highest Legal Authorities. As to the second part of the clause, let me point out that it would be retrospective and its effect would amount to confiscation.

MR. P. MORGAN: All I want to do is to put the Government of Western Australia in precisely the same position with reference to land that has been alienated as the Government of this country professes to be in.

BARON H. DE WORMS: What I suggest is, that you ought not to take away rights that already exist in certain individuals and transfer them to the Legislature without compensation.

(5.29.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I do not think the right hon. Gentleman understands the point. My hon. Friend's point is that he possesses lands in Wales just as much as any man possesses lands in Australia, and that when he mines in Wales the Crown comes down and charges him royalty. He claims that the Government of Western Australia should be placed in the same position. Just as you prevent the hon. Member from mining in Wales for gold, unless he pays the royalties, so the colonists, in permitting the sale of lands should reserve these royalties on metals. It is an important question for the colonies, and whether the gold mining industry of Western Australia will be advanced or hindered depends upon how it is settled.

(5.31.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): In a few words I think I can remove all doubts, though I notice the two hon. Gentlemen do not approach the subject in the same way. First, I will deal with the objection of the hon. and learned Gentleman who moved the Amendment. Mines and minerals in the United Kingdom do not include the royal metals, and therefore arise those issues and Crown claims which have arisen in certain cases. In regard to these waste lands in Australia the position is wholly different, and there can be no doubt whatever that all mining rights, and the right to prospect for the precious metals, will be vested by the Act in the Legislature of the colony. With regard to prospecting upon lands already leased, that must depend upon grants already made. If rights have been disposed of, of course the arrangements made must be respected, but all rights else will be vested in the Legislature, with whom will be the power to licence to prospect for all minerals. The object of the Amendment is, I submit, carried out by the Bill.

Question put, and negatived.

(5.33.) MR. MUNRO FERGUSON: The new clause which I have to propose arises out of circumstances which were referred to yesterday on the subject of the pearl fisheries. The Federal Council passed an Act applying to British ships and boats, allowing certain regulations to be enacted by the Legislative Council of Western Australia. These powers are defined in the Bill, but then follows the words "And any Act amending the same." In replying to me in the last discussion the Under Secretary said that Acts dealing with this subject were Acts of the Federal Council, and, therefore, Western Australia had no power to rescind or deal with these Acts. But to this I have to refer to the words I have quoted, which delegate to Western Australia powers under any Act for amending the Acts cited. Further it was asked if the Federal Council gave power to legislate for extra territorial waters, and the right hon. Gentleman replied "Certainly not." I will leave the Under Secretary to explain how this answer conforms to legislation which has been passed by the Federal Council, and which enables the Western Australia Federal Councils to amend and apply Acts to extra territorial waters. I need not dwell on points of detail; they are well known. It is the fact that this affects the relations between this country and Western Australia which compels me to move this new clause.

New Clause (Jurisdiction in extraterritorial waters), brought up, and read the first time.

Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

*(5.36.) SIR R. WEBSTER: This is a subject which the Solicitor General and I had brought under our notice ; but, speaking from recollection, it does not come within the Bill at all.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON: Sub-section 60 of the Schedule.

SIR R. WEBSTER: I am not aware of any clause in the Bill. I may be under misapprehension. It was no part of my duty to look at the Schedule in connection with this subject.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON: The part upon which I ground my reason for the clause is the sub-section of the Schedule (60), which deals with the levying of duties on imports.

SIR R. WEBSTER: That gives no warrant for the new clause. That is a Customs' clause, whereas the Fishery clauses are in the nature of police regulations, by which the various colonies under the Federal Act are enabled to regulate their own fisheries. The hon. Member now proposes that it shall not be lawful for the Legislature of the colony to exercise any jurisdiction in extra territorial waters, but the levying of duties on imports cannot affect ships sailing in those waters, notwithstanding any powers delegated by the Federal Council. Now, the hon. Member purposes to deal with a subject which, so far as I know, has never been discussed in this connection. My recollection of the matter is that, under the Federal Council Act, power was given to each colony to make its own regulations in respect to pearl fishing. The Schedule of the Bill does not touch the question at all. The Federal Council of Australasia has dealt with the matter and settled it in an Act which has been approved by Her Majesty, and it would be quite inconsistent with anything in the Bill, which does not propose to deal with fishery regulations, to pass such a clause. The question, if raised at all, should be raised on a proposal to amend the Federal Councils Act.

Mr. Munro Ferguson

(5.41.) MR. HALDANE (Haddington): I am unable to agree with the Attorney General that this is not germane to the Bill. In 1883 the Legislature of this country adopted a distinct policy in regard to extra territorial Australian waters, and by Section 15 of the Act of that year exclusive power is given to the Federal Council to legislate in respect to these waters, and the regulations for fishing were placed under the authority of the Federal Council. But under the Bill, which became law in 1889, the Federal Council have done what seems to me an extraordinary thing, they have delegated their powers of regulating, among other things, the pearl fishing in extra territorial waters off Western Australia to the Legislative Council of Western Australia.

SIR R. WEBSTER: I do not agree that that is so.

MR. HALDANE: It is a matter of reference to the Act. Certain Acts are defined, but then follows the significant line, "and also any Act amending any of the same." Then, by Section 5 of the Act, there is a provision that it shall not be lawful to employ in the pearl fishing ships or boats in waters adjacent to Western Australia, unless such ships are duly licensed. In this way control is given to the Legislature of Western Australia over extra territorial waters adjacent to the colony, and directly contrary to the Act we debated in 1885. I should like to know if the Law Officers were consulted in reference to the Act, for there is the gravest reason to suppose the Federal Council acted ultra vires in delegating this power. This being so, British boats have been taxed by having import duties levied on them in a way that has certainly created some ill-feeling, and we are entitled in this Bill to put some restriction on the Legislature, which is now being re-constituted, in reference to the exercise of such powers. Here is a Bill recognising a new Constitution for Western Australia, and here we have an opportunity of saying what are the limits within which jurisdiction shall be enforced. It may be that Sub-section 60 in the schedule refers to treaty obligations, but that has nothing to do with whether it is right and proper to deal with the matter here. It seems to me it is perfectly right to take the opportunity to put a limitation on the powers granted.

(5.47.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I am sorry the hon. and learned Gentleman should have thought it necessary to adopt this tone. I think it has been practically determined by the House that we cannot make any Amendment to the scheduled Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman has brought forward no evidence to justify him in stating that there has been any gross abuse in the action of the Federal Council of Australasia, and he then goes on to ask a question which he knows cannot be answered—namely, whether the Law Officers were consulted. I do not admit that the House has before it any facts upon which to base the conclusion that the Federal Council have delegated their power, or done anything which they had not a right to do. But, even if it were so, that is not a matter which has to do with this Bill, and I respectfully protest against this side attempt to fetter the hands of the Council and the Government of Western Australia.

(5.49.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: At present Western Australia does exercise certain powers over non-Australian vessels trading from Singapore and other ports. That may be a jurisdiction British shipowners do not like, but at all events they have at the present time the consolation of knowing that the Crown Executive is under the control of the Secretary of State, so that, in a sense, they are not without protection, but the grievance will be greatly aggravated when you give up all control to the West Australian Government.

(5.50.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I understand that not one single foreign vessel has ever come within these waters for pearl fishing. Further, if a vessel should come, it is also certain that every two weeks or so it would have to put into one of the ports of Western Australia to refit, &c. I take it that the moment such foreign vessel puts into a Western Australian port she would not be able to depart until she had taken out a licence and paid the duty. The case, however, has not arisen, and is not likely to arise.

(5.51.) MR. MUNRO FERGUSON: The question is the imposition of a tax on British ships engaged in a certain industry. I do not think the Attorney General can have read the evidence before the Special Committee, for this question was gone into very fully. Western Australia has been given certain powers by the Federal Council, and we are now asked to give her fresh powers, and some of the powers granted by the Federal Council have been exercised to the prejudice of Englishmen fishing in the extra territorial waters of Western Australia, and we have, I think, a fair right to ask that in the granting of these new powers they shall be exercised without prejudice to other rights of Englishmen in these waters.

(5.52.) MR. HALDANE: I think we have a right to complain of the way in which we have been treated in this matter. It seems to me that neither the Under Secretary or the Attorney General have taken the trouble to get up the facts. Last night I asked the Under Secretary whether the Federal Council had conferred powers upon Western Australia to legislate for extra territorial waters, and the right hon. Gentleman answered, rather recklessly, as I thought, "Certainly not." But I think we have shown that the Federal Council has conferred such powers on the Legislative Council of Western Australia, and until we have some better explanation I shall continue to say so, and I do not think there can be much doubt about it. The Attorney General says the matter was never before the Committee, and, therefore, ought not to be discussed, but, as a matter of fact, the subject was fully and specifically before the Committee in evidence. I am so far in sympathy with the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle that I express no opinion upon the exercise of the licensing power. But I do say that this House, having said that the Federal Council is the proper authority to exercise this jurisdiction, the Council has delegated the powers to the Legislature of Western Australia, and that it has been exercised not in accordance with the policy which received legislative sanction in 1885. We cannot know how far the opinion of the Law Officers confirmed the validity of the Act of 1889, but we are entitled to make provision for what may happen in the future.

Question put, and negatived.

Schedules and Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported to the House without Amendment.

*(6.0.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I trust I may appeal to the House to read the Bill a third time. There is a very general feeling in its favour, although there may be some difference as to details.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

(6.1.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I must object. The Bill has not been fully discussed, because the Closure was applied on a most important clause last night.

(6.2.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): If the Government had treated the opposition to the third clause of this Bill in a spirit of fairness the appeal might have been acceded to; but I think we have a right to complain of their conduct towards us. We were only allowed an hour and a quarter to discuss a most important Amendment, whereas three or four hours were given to the discussion of an Amendment of a far less important character. I know that the hon. Members for Morpeth and the Wansbeck Division of Northumberland were anxious, with other hon. Members, to speak on my Amendment; and the Government were perfectly aware of the fact that we desired to discuss a principle dear to the hearts of hundreds of thousands of men out of doors. This was the first opportunity we had had of raising a Debate on it, and yet the Government allowed us only an hour and a quarter. Under these circumstances, many of us think we are justified in opposing the Third Reading of the Bill being taken to-day.

(6.3.) MR. BURT (Morpeth): As I gather that the First Lord of the Treasury is prepared to assent to the postponement of the Third Reading, I will reserve what I have to say on the principle of the Bill until the Motion for the Third Reading is made. With regard to the very small opportunity we had last night of Debate on what I regard as the chief principle of the Bill, it is true that a good deal of time was occupied on other parts of the Bill; but I do submit that on that one question there certainly was not ample discussion.

(6.5.) DR. CLARK: Can the Bill be now read a third time, without the assent of the House?

*(6.6.) MR. SPEAKER: It must be by the general pleasure of the House.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I had hoped that the House would agree to read this Bill a third time. I think there have been ample opportunities of discussing it. If the proposal to which hon. Members refer had been accepted the Bill would have been lost, and, under these circumstances, I hope hon. Members will not think the Government exercised undue authority in asking for the Closure last night.

(6.7.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I, for one, shall very much regret if the House declines to assent to the Third Reading of the Bill. I have been reproached in regard to my attitude towards the Bill, which I am told is an unusual attitude for a Member of the Opposition. We who have voted with the Government in support of the measure have not, as is suggested, been supporting the Bill of the Government, but the Bill sent over from the Western Australian Legislature. The Bill of the Government, as it went before the Select Committee, is not the Bill now before the House. We succeeded in Committee, without much pressure upon the Under Secretary, in transforming the Bill in two very Radical particulars—in procuring the excision of Clauses 4 and 8. It will be most disastrous if we are going to turn colonial legislation into the vortex of Party politics. It is quite true that a very short time was allowed for the discussion of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Haggerston. I regret it was so, but so much time had been taken up needlessly with discussion on other Amendments that the hon. Gentleman suffered for the excesses of others. The course which has been taken in regard to the Bill, after it was submitted to full discussion in a Select Committee which is admitted to be impartial and not animated by Party considerations, is to be regretted.

(6.10.) MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): The Government have themselves to blame for the objection now taken to the Third Reading of the Bill. They allowed great latitude to a certain hon. Gentleman, who ultimately withdrew the Amendment, and when the First Lord made up his mind to Closure that Debate my hon. Friends supported him in his action. Yet, on what we considered to be the most important Amendment, we were only allowed three speeches before the Leader of the House, most unfairly, in my opinion, Closed us. The present opposition is, I repeat, due to the unfair manner in which the Opposition was treated last night by the Closing of the Debate after insufficient discussion upon what was, perhaps, the crux of the whole Bill. I, for my part, shall certainly oppose the Third Reading being now taken.

*(6.12.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I have the greatest sympathy with my hon. Friend the Member for Haggerston with regard to the way in which his Amendment was Closed last night, seeing that the subject was one of great interest to many Members. I think we have good reason to protest against so important a Bill being so rapidly pushed through its stages by the application of the Closure.

(6.13.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I shall certainly object to the Third Reading. I heard an hon. Member opposite speak of this Bill last night as the most important piece of legislation before the House during the whole Session. I do not think it was right on the part of the right hon. Gentleman last night to rush it through the House as he did.

(6.14.) MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): I have endeavoured to help the Government through with this measure by religiously abstaining from uttering a single syllable in the course of the Debate, but the impression made upon my mind by the action of the Government with reference to the 3rd clause was that they were acting oppressively last night. The right hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill said the Amendment of the hon. Member for Haggerston was supported only by a Scotchman, an English lawyer, and a London Radical. Arithmetically speaking, he was correct, because the Government, by a forcible measure, stopped further discussion; but I am morally convinced that, if they had had an opportunity, 50 Members on this side would have supported the Amendment, and would have made the promoters of the Bill understand how strong was the opposition.

*(6.16.) MR. W. H. SMITH: If hon. Members really wish the Debate to be adjourned I will offer no opposition.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

POLICE (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 353.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading, read.

*(6.18.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The House is aware that it is proposed to refer this Bill to a Select Committee, which will consider its details, and it will, therefore, only be necessary for me now to give a general outline of the measure. It is probably unnecessary that I should vindicate the general principle of superannuation. One of the reasons rendering the establishment of a system of superannuation desirable is the fact that the work of a constable is of a specially arduous nature, and to secure proper efficiency the men must be engaged in it when they are in the prime of life. To attract a good class of men to the Force a current of promotion is necessary. Another point to bear in mind is that the system acts as an inducement to the men to be of good conduct. A man is likely to be careful not to misconduct himself when he knows that his prospects of a retiring allowance depend on his keeping a clean defaulters' sheet. I will not stay now to dwell on general considerations, but will proceed to say a few words as to the existing state of things in Scotland. There, at the present time, there is no systematic pensioning of the Force. In the burghs the Police Authorities have a general power to give something to a man when he leaves, small periodical payments to be made during pleasure, or in some cases spread over a term of years. In the counties there is no power to spread the payment over a period of years, and the donation must take the shape of a gratuity or lump sum down. In the burghs, therefore, there are payments in the nature of pensions, but not in the counties. One feature is common both to burghs and counties—namely, that no man has a right to a pension, under any circumstances at all. It is entirely by the pleasure of the Police Authorities if any payment is made to him on his retirement. The present amounts charged against the rates in Scotland for payments to retired constables reach a total of £4,789. Of this sum, £1,744 is for county payments, and £2,706 for burgh payments. In Greenock there is an organised Pension Fund; the charge is £338 10s. 9d. It is an argument in favour of the establishment of a statutory system of pensions that some of the counties have found pensions so necessary for the due maintenance of the Force that they have stretched the existing law, and, in lieu of only giving gratuities, have made payments in the nature of pensions, terminating after a period of years. The legality of this proceeding I greatly question. In Lanarkshire, the Police Authorities have found themselves compelled to rely upon a voluntary assessment in order to provide pensions for retired men. The feeling of the community in Lanarkshire has thus actually outstripped the present law, and proceeded in the direction in which the Government now propose to go. There is another point which must be within the knowledge of hon. Members. In many Forces may be found men whose services would not be missed, and who are kept on at a lower rate of pay, as a sort of pension, and simply because the Local Authorities do not feel justified in keeping them in the higher grade, for the performances of the duties in which they are disqualified by the advance of years. I shall start, then, with the assumption that there is a general feeling in favour of a system of superannuation for the police. Now, Sir, in regard to the provisions of the Bill, I do not think it necessary to go into them with any great amount of detail; but it may be convenient to state that the proposals we submit start with the Police Authority in each case with regard to the administration of the Police Fund. When the House remembers that the object is to promote the efficiency of the police it is manifest that there is a relation between the wages to be paid to the police and the amount of their retiring pensions, which renders it almost impossible to have one authority to regulate and determine who are to receive the pensions, and another separate authority to determine the question of wages. This, therefore, I am disposed to think is one of the necessary conditions of this measure of superannuation. But there are other provisions in the Bill. As the House is aware, we propose that a policeman shall be entitled, after a certain amount of service, to receive a pension, the amount of which is to be left flexible and determinable within certain limits of maxima and minima by the Local Authorities; but this is to be qualified by a condition which is left to the Local Authority, and that is, that they may fix the age on arriving at which alone a man shall be allowed to retire with a pension. Let me take the case of 25 years as the long period of service after which the full pension, that is to say three-fifths of the wages, is to become due, without a medical certificate. This is to be taken in connection with the proposal that the Local Authority is entitled to prescribe an age before the attainment of which a man shall not obtain a pension, even though he may have served for 25 years. On this matter, both with regard to the amount of salary between the maximum and minimum, and, also, the age between maximum and minimum, the Local Authority will have the right to decide and determine the sort of work, and the peculiarities of the service to be performed, in the particular districts as to which pensions are to be accorded. Therefore, there is a free hand given to the Local Authorities in introducing such variances as they may deem appropriate to the circumstances of the case. Well, Sir, as I have stated, we have fixed certain maxima and minima, and I may be allowed to say, on this as on all other matters, I am not going to discuss the question whether we have fixed them rightly or not; and for this reason: that these are matters entirely for the Committee, and if the Committee consider that any modifications of our proposals should be introduced, or that certain variations should be made, they can be brought forward in Committee. I say, therefore, that the details are left entirely open. At the same time I must say that I trust hon. Members will perceive that there are limits at which it is necessary to stop in order to secure the general object of the measure, which is the increased efficiency of the police. And now I will ask the House to see how the national aspect of the question stands; and on this point I do not intend to go into detail, but merely to indicate the general lines on which our proposals are based. In the first place, it will be convenient that I should take a figure. I will, therefore, state that the number of efficient men at the present time in the Police Force of Scotland is 4,042. Now, Sir, the proposal of the Bill is that the sum of £40,000, which is provided for in the Local Taxation Bill, should be placed in the hands of the Local Authorities, in certain proportions which, at the present moment, it is not necessary for me to discuss. The allocation of that sum will begin at the beginning. It will at once, and hereafter from year to year, be placed in the hands of the Local Authorities, and in addition to this there is the $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. deduction from the pay of the men, which, as has been already stated, amounts to £7,500. This, again, will be an amount available year by year, and plus this, there is a certain amount provided from various minor and miscellaneous sources, but, as to these, I have not been able to obtain the precise details. I can, however, give the House specimens from some of the larger towns, if the House cares to have them, and it will be seen that these items amount to a considerable sum. I may say that, in regard to these items, there is great variance as between the different towns; they include such things as the payment of fines, payments for police services, and so forth, and in regard to these things it is obvious that the local conditions will vary very much. I will take, as an instance, the case of Glasgow, which, however, I do not put forward as a representative case. In Glasgow, the regular deductions of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. amount to £1,774, and the miscellaneous items, to which I have referred, amount to £4,530. In Aberdeen, which stands on a different footing to Glasgow, the deduction of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. amounts to £199, and the miscellaneous items to £136. In the other burghs and counties, I find from five counties and five burghs of which I have instances, that generally speaking, there is more derived from the miscellaneous items than from the $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. deduction. I do not propose to enter minutely into the financial results of the scheme; but I will ask the House to suppose that 300 men are retired during the first two years, and that three-fifths is to be the proportion of the pension payable; that would come to between £15,000 and £20,000. Suppose we take the figure at £15,000 or £20,000. The result of our calculations is this: that at the outset the Government grant of £40,000 alone is much more than enough to meet the liability thrown on the fund, and the consequence will be that at this time, and for some time afterwards, a large portion of the £40,000 will be invested and accumulated, so that the rates will not be even within sight of being touched. There will not only be the surplus of the £40,000, but also the £7,500 derived from the $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. deduction from the wages of the men. But, looking forward to a more distant period, the result of our calculations is that for at least 30 years there will be no burden whatever on the rates. An hon. Gentleman opposite seems to indicate incredulity; but I would remind him that this is a subject on which careful and detailed calculations are necessary, and if he doubts the infallibility of the calculations on which I rely I may say that, for my part, I am not convinced of the infallibility of some rival suggestions that have been made. The House will, however, observe that, so far as the rates are concerned, the question is a very remote one, assuming our calculations to be at all near the mark. But I want further to point out that, supposing at some distant time the burden is thrown on the rates, any one must see that much more than the Government contribution would be required; in fact, that much more than double would be required; and that there is no reason for alarm as far as the rate-payers are concerned is shown by the fact that the produce of one penny per pound on the valuation roll of Scotland is £83,000 per annum. Now, Sir, I am not suggesting that this amount will be required until a very remote period, if at all. I merely mention the matter as showing that the alarmist figures are necessarily circumscribed by these prosaic figures of mine.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): Has the right hon. Gentleman made an estimate of the maximum amount of the pension list?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Yes, I have. I may say that somewhere over 50 years hence, something under £80,000 will be required, plus the £40,000.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: In addition to the £40,000?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Yes.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: And above all other sources?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I think not. I may say I think the amount of detail through which I have gone is sufficient to show what is the scheme of the Government. I am not concerned to do more than show that the scheme we propose is practical, and, moreover, presents no danger of an expenditure which can be regarded as in any way excessive. I will not now occupy more of the time of the House beyond saying that my object has been to show the general principles on which the scheme is framed. It is a scheme under which, in the first place, pensions are, by Statute Law, to be a matter of right under certain conditions, the fixing of which is to be partly by the Bill within certain limits, the adjustment of which is to be left to the Local Authorities; in the second place, our system places the power of managing these funds in the hands of the Local Authorities; while, in the third place, I hope I have said enough to show that the financial aspect of the question is such as to present no ground for alarm, and that the object in view, which is of high importance, can be obtained by the aid of the Parliamentary grant within very reasonable limits and without adding to the local burdens. I beg to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”

(6.45.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I think the Lord Advocate has set the model of the maximum of explanation in the minimum of time. And the explanation was thoroughly well adapted to leave the Committee largely free in its operations. I think the Lord Advocate under-rated the very serious nature of the change which Scotch Members are asked to make in the administration of Scotland. It is a very serious change indeed. It is not, as in England, the extension of an existing system, but it is practically the adoption of a new one. In the counties of England there are 1,650 pensioners. In the counties of Scotland there are very few pensioners, and no recognised and legal pensioners. In the English boroughs there are 5,500 pensioners; in the Scotch burghs there are, probably, taking all the men who are pensioned in an irregular manner, less than 100. What deduction ought we to draw from those figures? Up to this time there has been to say the least, the greatest lukewarmness in Scotland towards pensioning the police. What information have the Government as to the manner in which this proposal is looked on in Scotland? I say that not only should we know, as in the case of England, what is the feeling in this and that locality, but I should be very anxious indeed to know, what I must say I feel myself at this moment very ignorant of indeed, what is the feeling in Scotland in general. So ignorant are we of that feeling, that the operations of the Select Committee will have to be, I think, of a more serious character than only examining the details of the Bill. They will likewise have to inquire what is the wish in at least some of the respective localities with regard to the main objects of the Bill. The only means that we have of judging of feeling in Scotland is by a Petition—now somewhat out of date—from the Town Council of Glasgow against the Bill for the pensioning of police constables in the year 1877. From that Petition I can gather the feeling of Glasgow, which I conclude to be likewise the feeling in some of the larger towns. They take two objections to that Bill which do not apply to this Bill. The Town Council protests that the Government ought to contribute a very sensible sum towards pensioning the police. That is done by this Bill. They likewise ask for a general system over the whole country. That is given by this Bill, rightly or wrongly. The Town Council protests most strongly and most rightly against setting up a separate police pension fund, with a number of separate contributions to it, which is not a real, true, separate fund. They object exceedingly to the number of payments which at this moment come in some shape or another into the Exchequer of the community ear-marked, and placed in a fund for the police, so as to give the idea that there are certain special funds and special sources from which the superannuation of the police may be drawn, when that merely conceals the fact that in the last resort all is to be drawn, above the contribution of the Government, from the pockets of the ratepayers. For my part, I hope the Government will consider whether this, as a separate fund, ought to be kept up, unless it is made, as my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen proposed to make it, a genuine fund with representative management, with full liberty of giving or withholding and giving largely or in a less degree. Either the fund should be made a real one, or else we ought to have the thing put before the community in its right shape, that is, that a certain contribution is made by the Government and that all the rest must come from the ratepayers. A request was made in reference to the English Bill that was very inadequately answered by the Lord Advocate. He gave us an estimate made with some care. I think it was very much too sanguine. The Lord Advocate said it was calculated that for 30 years hence no charge would fall upon the rates, but that everything would be covered by the Government grant. The only experience we have to go by is the experience in connection with the Metropolitan Police. It is now 28 years since the system of pensions was adopted for the Metropolitan Force, and already, over and above the £150,000 given to that Force, £50,000 is thrown upon the ratepayers. But the Home Secretary tells us that under the new scale of pensions—I have no doubt it is quite true—the burden will be doubled; so that in 28 years the cost of the pension system in London will be £250,000. To London £150,000 is given, and to Scotland £40,000.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The right hon. Gentleman has fallen into an error. The scale adopted in 1862 is the scale in force.

SIR G. TREVELYAN: Pensions were in force before that, of course, and so far as they were in force my argument, no doubt, is weakened. Taking the experience of London, the grant given to Scotland would in 30 years be more than balanced. I have made an estimate so far as I can for Glasgow. In London at this moment the charge for pension per man is £14. Glasgow has 1,060 police, so that at that rate the charge in Glasgow for pensions would be £14,800. If, as the Home Secretary says, the burden will be doubled in 28 years, Glasgow at the end of that period would be paying £29,600. At present she stands at £1,100 a year for pensioning 25 men, so that she will have the burden of another £28,000 a year, which she would have to make up out of the Government grant and a matter of some £2,000. I resolutely refuse to deduct any of those fines or licences which go now to the ratepayers, and which, in any case, are public money.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I did not say that I deducted them.

SIR G. TREVELYAN: I quite understand that. They are part of the funds for police pensions, and we cannot take them into account. I think the £40,000 is distributed upon an excellent system. It is given in due proportion to the amount which the different localities expend upon pensions. Under this system Glasgow will get about £12,000 a year, and the ultimate burden on Glasgow will be about £16,000 a year. In the case of a self-governing community like Glasgow the Government would do very well to inform themselves whether such a proposal is popular with the Town Council, who are the representatives of the ratepayers. There is one very great danger to which I hope the Committee will very carefully look, and I believe that the Bill contains the means to a great extent of guarding against it. The real danger is lest the police over the whole country should be a sort of military force, independent of the Local Authorities. We are not satisfied with the character of the Local Authorities charged with the management of the police. We hope that, whatever the authority is, it will have control over the police, who will look to it as their virtual paymaster. I cannot conceive anything more unfortunate, especially in the Highlands, where the authorities and the police act in unison, than that the police should be able to snap their fingers at the authorities who have control over them, because they are in no sense dependent upon the Local Authorities for either their present or future. It is no use going back to the question of whether the police ought to be superannuated, or whether they ought not. We cannot afford, and we do not intend, to throw away the £40,000 which is our share—not our rightful share, but the share which is allotted to us—of the Spirit Duty. But everything depends on the pay and emoluments of the police being kept in the hands of the Local Authorities. There are great differences in the pay of the Scotch police. The pay of a constable of four years' standing is 27s. a week in the town of Glasgow, and 24s. 6d. in Inverness and Montrose, and in the counties the pay varies from 28s. to 21s. 6d. a week. There are all these differences, and it is quite right that this variety should exist. If you once place the police in these Highland counties on the same pay as that which is enjoyed in Lanarkshire, you will get them entirely out of the hands of the Local Authorities, and, for the protection of the ratepayers and the due discipline of the police, it is most essential that the Local Authorities should be able to fix the pay so as to correspond with the rate of wages and the demand for labour in their respective districts. There is another reason why you should keep the most extreme elasticity in the machinery which the Local Authorities use. For my own part, I entertain grave doubts about pensioning many classes of public servants who are pensioned already, but the principal defence of the system is that a pension is only deferred pay. For this reason it is extremely important, when this Bill has become law, that the Local Authority should have absolute power to vary the pay of the police in such a manner as to make it, together with the pension, a due reward for the labour of a policeman. I admit that there is need of something being done. At this present moment, in England, out of 37,000 policemen, there are 2,300 over the age of 50, while in Scotland, out of 4,200 policemen, there are 480 over the age of 50. Thus, in England, one policeman out of every 17 is over the age of 50, while in Scotland the proportion is one to nine. This shows that the £40,000 allotted to Scotland can be expended with some effect. I trust we shall hear nothing more of the monstrous idea which has prevailed elsewhere of retiring a man after a certain period of service, while he is still comparatively young. The taxpayer, and the ratepayer, and the citizen, have a right to protest in the most vehement manner against a man being retired under 50 or 55 years of age for any other cause but absolute inability to serve any longer. I hope the Committee will insist that the age of 55 shall be kept as the age below which a man shall not have a right to retire. I am informed that the Head Constable of Glasgow, representing, I suppose, the feeling of the police, has stated his opinion that the age should be 55, unless the man is unfitted for service; that the age should be the same for all, and that a suitable man should be allowed to remain on till the age of 60, with a slight addition to his pay. I am very glad to hear such a suggestion coming from the police themselves, because I think it shows they are public-spirited men, who do not forget the supposed interests of their calling, and yet who recognise that they are citizens who ought to think of the public too. I believe that if the Committee vigorously keep to the cardinal points I have mentioned, the Bill will be freed from some of the great evils which I am sure will be associated with the English measure, and may be, though attended with some disadvantages, of real benefit to the police.

(7.5.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): My position with regard to this Bill is a very simple one. If the money required for the pension scheme in Scotland is only this £40,000, I am ready to support this Bill. The Lord Advocate says that for 30 years this £40,000 will suffice without any call on the ratepayers. I will put, I will not say the sincerity, but the depth of conviction, of the right hon. Gentleman to a decisive test. If there can be no demand on the rates for 30 years, why not postpone for 30 years Clause 19, which now imposes liability on the ratepayers? There are just two ways in which we can estimate the cost of this superannuation scheme, and I quite expected that the right hon. Gentleman would have adopted one of them. One way is to lay by nothing for pensions until they arise, and when and as they arise to provide the money for paying them. That is a method which is very easy for those who impose the liability. The initial cost is small, but every year adds to that cost, and no man can tell what the ultimate amount will be. The figures we have had put before us are actually derived from the imagination, because the Home Secretary (Mr. Matthews) proved in this House that the tables on which the old pension list of London was based were utterly and entirely erroneous, and the right hon. Gentleman warned us in Scotland that it was not £40,000 nor £80,000, but something more like £120,000 that would be required for this pension scheme. Well, the second mode by which we can estimate the cost of a scheme of this kind is based upon absolute data. I may represent it in this way. Supposing the Government were to ask a company to undertake the obligations that this Bill entails, the price the company would demand would be the real cost of the scheme. The Lord Advocate estimated that during the next three years quite 300 persons would come upon the Pension Fund. As a matter of fact, there are more than 400 persons now serving in the police who are over the age of 50 years, and there are nearly 200 ready to come into the category of "over 50." Why we should assume that during the next three years, out of a total of 500 or 600 men, only 300 will come on to the pension list I do not understand. If you fix your pensions by age, you know exactly where you are. A policeman will go on till that age and then receive his pension. But if you fix the pension according to the number of years' service, you make it practically compulsory on a constable to receive a pension as soon as he completes his 25 years' service, for the reason that if he continues in the force longer he is liable to be dismissed, and if he is dismissed he is dismissed without a pension. Therefore, by fixing a stated period of service, such as 25 years, you make it impossible for a man to continue in the Force beyond 25 years without risking this valuable pension. The right hon. Gentleman the Lord Advocate mentioned a sum of £15,000 or £20,000 as being all that would be necessary; but that struck me as illusory. If it were £50,000 that would be an average of £50 each. In a calculation I have made, I have taken £40 as the average amount for a pension. In the table of Post Office Annuities you find that, for a man of 20 and under 21, to undertake to pay him a pension of £40 a year after 25 years' service, at which time he would have reached the age of 46, the premium required would be £16 a year. That is the sum for which the Post Office would guarantee the pension. But the premium which is available under this scheme—assuming that you give an equal share of the £40,000 to every constable in the Force, and add 2½ per cent.—the premium would be £11 9s. 8d. Thus, at the very start, taking the constable who is to contribute for 25 years, you have a deficit of £4 10s. 4d. per annum on each constable. But this scheme is not one to apply merely to future entrances into the Force. It is to apply to men now in the Force. Now, at the age of 25 the premium rises to £22 3s. 4d., which leaves a deficit on each constable of £10 13s. 8d. At the age of 30 the premium rises to £32 16s. 8d., leaving a deficit of £21 7s. 0d.; at the age of 35 the premium is £48 16s. 8d. (against which you have only £11 9s. 8d.) leaving a deficit of £37 5s. 0d. per man. These figures show that if you were to provide this prudent investment, there would be a large deficit in the £40,000. Even supposing you had all the constables in the Force at the low premium of £16 per annum pension, there would be a deficiency of £20,000 after paying the £40,000 proposed by the Government. If we advance the deficit arising upon the classes from 20 to 35 years of age, they amount to £30,000 a year; and as to those between 35 and 45 the premiums from pensions are so large that the Post Office does not publish any tables at all. The best calculation I can make by these classes is a cost of no less than £80,000 a year. There remains the large class of constables over 45 years of age, numbering 525. To buy annuities for these would cost £660 each, and to provide pensions would consequently require £326,500. On this basis we should, therefore, require to provide half a million of money in the first year; in the second year £150,000, and that sum would diminish year by year until ultimately we should have to pay £60,000 a year. It is perfectly obvious that by paying the money in advance and accumulating it year by year we should adopt a policy ultimately more favourable to the rate-payers; and my conviction is that the figure of £120,000 given by the Home Secretary, if it errs at all, errs on the side of being under the mark. Upon the Lord Advocate's own statement these facts dispose of the Bill; and the people of Scotland are not prepared to tax themselves to the extent of £70,000 or £80,000 a year to provide pensions. This Bill proceeds upon wrong principles, and the only sound or economic proceeding is to first ascertain what our funds are, and then what pensions we can afford to pay. If the Lord Advocate had proceeded upon that principle he could never have proposed the scale of pensions which is in the Bill. I also object to the Bill on the ground that a constable would be entitled to retire on the completion of 25 years' service, and I would ask the House to compare the position of two agricultural labourers under the Bill. One does not become a constable, and has wages always under £1 a week, while his fellow becomes a constable, at once gets more than that amount, and constantly increases. At the age of 46 the constable would retire with a pension of £40, on which he could afford to live like a gentleman for the rest of his life; but he would probably take some other form of remunerative occupation, so that the labourer would have to pay rates for the superannuation of a constable who could compete with him for the more choice occupations in the country. That is adding insult to injury. There is, from the policemen's point of view, an objection of great force with respect to entrusting the payment of pensions to Local Authorities. It is to the interest of these bodies to keep down the Pension Fund, and it is to the interest of the higher officers to see that as few men come upon that fund as possible. What the policemen freely say where these pensions exist is, that when the time comes near for a pension their superiors become very strict to mark iniquity, and do not hesitate to use any excuse to dismiss the men. I very much doubt whether that prevails to anything like the extent the men believe, but by having one general Pension Fund any possibility of such a misconstruction will be removed. The Bill is also objectionable on the ground that it gives no pension for disablement from duty until after 15 years of age. Very little is gained by inserting that limitation, and I think it might be struck out. Then, I have never heard of a constable being killed in Scotland in the execution of his duty—at any rate the cases are so rare as to be scarcely worth talking about—and I would suggest to the Government that they would very much improve the attractions of the fund if they provided that, in the case of the death of a constable from any cause there should be a moderate allowance sufficient to keep the children from the poor-house until they reached the age of 15, when they would be able to earn their own living. Clause 8, dealing with the forfeiture of pension for neglect of duty, or other causes, is utterly wrong in principle and indefensible. If a man has a right to a pension he should not be deprived of that property simply because of the reasons stated in that clause. I also take great objection to Clause 21, which provides, in a qualified and unsatisfactory manner, for the return to a constable when he leaves the Force of his contributions to the fund. That is a paltry, niggling clause which, financially, is worth nothing; and I think a constable ought under such circumstances to get back his contributions. Another matter which I regret to see in the Bill is the stoppages during sickness to the resources of the Pension Fund. I think it very unfortunate that the police should have their pay stopped during sickness, and I trust that the practice may be abolished. I also hope that the words "without his default," in the clause as to pension to an officer injured in the execution of his duty, will be struck out, for no man would willingly injure himself. I must repeat that the Lord Advocate has wholly failed to show any reasons whatever for believing that the ratepayers will not be called upon to pay for the next 30 years. On the contrary, he must be wrong, for he undertook to do what the Post Office will not do. While I will vote for the Second Reading, in order that the Bill may be sent to a Committee, I will not promise to support the Third Reading unless the Bill is so modified as to make it certain that there will be no payment whatever from the ratepayers.

(7.30.) MR. E. ROBERTSON: The House has listened with interest to the speeches which have been made in great detail on this side of the House, but I must confess that the conclusions which have been arrived at by the two hon. Members who have addressed us are extremely disappointing. They justified the Lord Advocate in the assumption—which to me seems unjustifiable—that there is an apparent unanimity in favour of this Bill. I should have thought that Scotch Members would have put in, at all events, a dilatory plea against the Bill being passed at present. Is any demand made for this Bill on behalf of the Scotch people, or on behalf of the Local Authorities who will have to work it? I do not believe there has been any such representation of public opinion as to justify the Lord Advocate in his statement, except what we have heard from the hon. Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter) and the right hon. Gentleman below me (Sir G. Trevelyan). My experience is entirely in the teeth of the conclusion arrived at by these gentlemen. In the election of 1885 there was no question which excited more interest than the question of the pensioning of the police, and I can say with perfect assurance that the opinion of the working men of the constituencies is opposed in the most determined way to this principle. These working men say, "What are the police whom you propose to pension? They are working men as we are; nobody proposes to pension us. You ask us to bear the burden of providing superannuation allowances for this particular class of working men. We, being working men for whom no such provision is proposed, and for whom no such provision certainly will ever be made, entirely object to this privileged legislation which you are proposing." I sympathise strongly with that view, which was pressed upon me by representatives of working men in my own constituency in the election of 1885, and I have to consider this Bill under the obligation which I took upon myself, in 1885, to oppose the scheme, then brought forward by the Liberal Government, and which is reproduced in the present measure. The Bill proposes a wholesale pension scheme for this branch of the Public Service in Scotland. Do hon. Members opposite, does my right hon. Friend (Sir G. Trevelyan) realise the horror with which the whole business of pensions is regarded by the working classes of Scotland? I am sorry the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) is not present. He has produced good and wholesome results on the public opinion of this country, and in Scotland there is no result more permanent and more profound than that he has inspired the whole working classes in Scotland with the most utter detestation of, and disgust with, the whole system of pensioning public servants at the public expense. It is a question admitting of some doubt whether we should pay our servants by means of pensions. If we were beginning de novo, and dealing with men entering the Force for the first time, it would be a doubtful question whether we should pay them by giving them a certain allowance in the name of wages, and a certain other allowance in the name of pensions, or whether we should give them the full market value of their labour in present wages and leave them to find their pensions for themselves. If we adopt the system of pensions we must proceed upon the principle that the pension, plus wages, shall be no more taken together than the market value of the man's wages ought to be if he is hired in the open market. The Bill treats the subject in this way. It deals with a class of men who have made engagements under a system of free contract. They are at this moment getting their full wages—the wages fixed for them by the price in the labour market—but my right hon. Friend (Sir G. Trevelyan) is willing not only to give them this but a deferred allowance also. I think that, from this point of view alone, I should be justified in offering a strenuous opposition to the whole Bill. But there is another point. The Bill deals with a whole profession which has entered into contracts with the Local Authorities, such contracts making no provision for pensions. We are going to give the same amount of pension to the constable who is on the point of retiring as to the young man who is just going to enter the Force, although the man who joins the Force now will pay a deduction of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. from his pay for 25 or 30 years, while the man who is about to retire will make no such payment. There is an old parable which is quoted in vindication of the rights of labourers who come in at the eleventh hour, but receive as much wages as those who have borne the burden and heat of the day. I think common instincts are rather against the justice of the inference to be drawn from that parable. I am certain that the working men of Scotland would not submit to it as a just principle, and I do not believe the members of the Police Force in Scotland would be satisfied that those who are to make large payments during the whole period of their service are to receive no more than those who are going to quit the Service, and who will naturally make no payment at all. With regard to the financial aspect of the Bill, the Lord Advocate was unable to tell what is to be the total burden to be imposed upon the country by this pension list. It matters not where we get the money. The £40,000 from the Exchequer and the £7,500 from fees are just as much public money as the money which comes by direct contribution from the ratepayers, and I must express my regret, in regard to the speech of my hon. Friend (Mr. Hunter), because he said that if nothing was to be asked for from the ratepayers he was entirely for the Bill. I do not look at it from that point of view at all. We are putting a burden on the people of Scotland, as to which all we know is that there will be £40,000 of local Scotch money and £15,000 of other local contributions. Beyond that, there will be a sum as to which evidently no calculation has been made, but which the Lord Advocate estimated at £80,000. Therefore, what you are doing is to put on Scotland a burden which at a minimum must mean £120,000 per annum, and if we count other local contributions must amount to £150,000. Capitalised, that means a direct expense of something like £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 for the pensioning of men who have entered into contracts which make no provision for such pensions. The pension is a mere superfluity and gratuity; and the burden you are asking the Scotch Members to place on the Scotch people to pay is £120,000 or £150,000 a year. It may be said that burden is not coming into existence immediately. The Lord Advocate said the burden of £80,000 will not fall upon the people for 50 years. That, it appears to me, is an extravagant estimate. Under the Bill these men may all be superannuated at the end of 25 years, and thus at the end of that period the absolute maximum possible may be realised, and the full burden of £120,000 or £150,000 per annum placed on the people of Scotland. And all this is being proposed as something thrown in by way of gratuity to public servants with whom we have already made a contract in the open market. After the expression I had five years ago of the opinion of my constituents on the question I should have no right to vote for the Bill; but after the statements that have been laid before the House by the promoters of the Bill, I am bound to say I feel justified, without any disrespect to the police, without any desire to depreciate their character, or under-estimate the value of their services, to offer to this Bill the very strongest opposition. I should just like to ask the Liberal Members, who I fear have been induced to pledge themselves to some kind of superannuation, what their working men supporters will think of this proposal. Again, I ask, what are they going to do with the other Public Services in Scotland beside the police? Are they going to treat them in the same way? What are they going to do with men who are not in the Public Service at all, in the sense of being engaged by the public, but who render services as great and as valuable as those rendered by the men who are technically public servants? I have a case before me where a man 78 years of age, who has spent all his days upon the land, has received no public pension, but who, after bringing up his family decently and respectably, finds himself unable to do anything more. What does your law do for him? It offers him something like 2s. per week. This man may have a son, and it is this man and his class who will have to provide for the superannuation of the police. At the same time, you propose that a constable at 45 shall be entitled to a pension equal to three-fifths of his pay. It will pay a policeman well to retire at 45 on three-fifths of his salary, for the chances are that with the open market he will be able to get employment that will bring more than the other two-fifths. Summing up my objections to the measure, I may say this is an English measure, which is forced upon Scotland in the same way as English ideas have been forcibly impressed on Scotland, greatly to its disadvantage, in the matter of education. By the necessities of your position in England you are bound to formulate some scheme of superannuation for policemen, and because you are under that obligation, you think it necessary to force the same system upon us in Scotland. In the second place, I object to the Bill because it has been put forward before it is asked for, and in the face of evidence that justifies us in saying that the opinion of Scotland, if it were consulted, would be not only lukewarm, but distinctly hostile to the whole principle. That being the state of Scotch opinion, the Government are bound to give us time for consultation, and to know what our constituents and the Local Authorities who are to administer it think of the measure. Lastly, I object to the Bill from the point of view of general interest. This Bill is of the same colour as all the legislative proposals of the Government this Session. They are all tarred with the same brush—I do not know whether the brush is imposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. They are tarred with the same brush in the sense that every one of these Bills constitutes in itself a raid upon the Public Treasury for the benefit of a class.

An hon. MEMBER: The police a class!

MR. E. ROBERTSON: Yes; they are putting a burden of £120,000 upon the people of Scotland for the benefit of a class. It is what they tried to do with regard to the licensing clauses, the Land Purchase Bill, and even the Tithes Bill to a limited extent. The Western Australia Bill is, to some extent, of the same character. It is a most remarkable thing that this Government of the classes seems to be concerned in an attempt to divert a certain portion of the Public Treasury in whatever shape it may be to the benefit of some section of the community. Liberal Governments in days past have been accused of harassing the various interests. The Government of the present day has read the lesson of previous Liberal Governments in this way, and it harasses the public in order to do as much good as it can to the interests of classes with the hope that those classes will serve them in the day of trouble. I object to the Bill from that point of view, and from the further point of view that it is put forward entirely without demand, and that, therefore, we are justified in asking that time shall be given to the people of Scotland to express their wishes on the subject.

(7.55.) MR. MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright): If there is one thing quite certain it is that if the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. E. Robertson) and his friends had their way no Police Superannuation Bill for Scotland would pass. The hon. and learned Gentleman has made a great deal of the fact that there is no demand for the Bill. I have had something to do with police matters in my own county, and I am able to say that, although this is not a burning question, although men's minds are not agitated on the subject, it is a matter which everyone has regarded as one which must be brought about some day; and surely when there are so many discordant elements in the House in agreement as to the principle of the measure, it is not an inopportune time to press forward a Superannuation Bill. I have in my mind's eye constables who have continued in the Force until an advanced age in the hope that some Superannuation Bill will be passed. The Local Authorities do not care to burden the rates heavily by pensioning the men, neither do they care to dismiss the officers in a tyrannical manner. I have another case in my mind, that of a police officer who was for some years the head constable in an English county. He took a similar position in a Scotch county, with the result that, in consequence of there being no Superannuation Fund, in Scotland he will leave the Scotch Force a great deal poorer than he would have left the English Force. I think that when there is a consensus of opinion that such a measure as this is feasible and expedient, the Government are not only justified in doing something, but are called upon to do something in the matter. The hon. and learned Gentleman says that the working men are hostile to this Bill; but I doubt whether the working men who view this matter reasonably and dispassionately will protest against the measure. It must be borne in mind that the details of the Bill can be adequately discussed in the Committee upstairs. For instance, if it is found that the measure imposes large burdens on the rates, attention will very properly be called to the fact, and, if necessary, alterations made. I think that a man who serves a longer period should be entitled to a proportionately larger pension, and in that direction I should like to see the scheme re-arranged. The statement of the Lord Advocate must have done much to allay the financial apprehensions that have been raised; and I am satisfied that if the Bill is carefully considered in a spirit of generous justice, we may hope that it will be welcomed throughout Scotland, and have a good effect upon the Force.

*(8.0.) MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I think the Government have placed Members who think a reasonable case for a Superannuation Bill has been made out in a position of considerable difficulty, and for two reasons: In the first place, this is obviously a Bill upon which, in one form or another, Local Authorities ought to have been consulted. In my opinion, it was the duty of the Government to consult them directly. The Government ought to have come to the House, and to have been able to say, "We have obtained the opinions, not only of the Police Authorities, but of the Rating Authorities, who have to pay the expenses of this Bill." As they have not taken that course, at least the Bill ought to have been before the country for a considerable time, so as to allow Members an opportunity of consulting their constituents and obtaining that information which I think the Government ought to have obtained for themselves. I feel that these difficulties are very serious indeed. They do not prevent me from voting for the Second Reading of the Bill; but, so far as our opinions on this side of the House are concerned, I believe we are unanimous in thinking that our assent to the Bill must be held in suspense until we see, after the deliberations of the Select Committee, how far our objections are removed. There is another objection, that we have not authentic information—I think I am entitled to say this—as to what the cost of this scheme to the country will be. The Lord Advocate, for the first time to-night, has placed before us certain calculations, carefully made, no doubt, but they are entirely in conflict with the calculations presented to the House by my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, whose calculations have certainly a basis of fact, as they were derived from statistics of the Post Office Insurance Scheme, whereas we had no information from the Lord Advocate as to what his calculations were based upon. That lack of information, I admit, may be supplied by due activity during the investigation by the Select Committee. There is one principle of very old application which has been referred to to-night by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton—that is, that pensions should be regarded as deferred pay. That principle, I think, was rather too much lost sight of in the statement of the Lord Advocate. If, as was urged by the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. Robertson), you are going to give policemen full pay and pension over and above that as a sheer present, can you be surprised that this scheme should excite resentment and opposition on the part of Local Authorities? That is a view of the subject which has been ignored by the Lord Advocate. I will make a practical application of this view. I admit it is a difficult case; I foresee that if you establish any scheme of superannuation you can scarcely say, without causing great dissatisfaction, that men are to be entirely excluded, even though they have not contributed to the building up of the fund; but surely those men who retire to-morrow, the labourers who have only worked from the eleventh hour, should not carry off exactly as much pension as those who have contributed out of their moderate earnings during the whole of their working lives from the age of 21. That is a part of the scheme that will certainly require modification when it reaches the stage of Committee. There is another point of general principle I would also urge, and it has been touched upon by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir G. Trevelyan); it is of the utmost importance that we should give a very free hand in the administration of the scheme to Local Authorities. The Bill proposes to do that to a very limited extent. The Bill, I think, does not interfere with the power of Local Authorities to fix the pay of constables, and it also gives them power to fix the limit of age up to which a man must serve before he can receive his pension; but I think we must go still further and give power to Local Authorities to determine for themselves whether they will accept any burden upon the rates or whether they will be contented with the contributions of the men and such share as they may get of the aid afforded by Parliament. I feel there are most important and difficult questions in this Bill; and if the Bill is to be passed, it must be after it has been carefully examined in Committee and evidence taken upon it. I know that several of my hon. Friends wish to address the House, and my object now is simply to point out in a friendly spirit the very serious difficulty I feel there will be in passing the Bill as rapidly as it must be passed in the shape in which it is presented to the House. I do not agree with my hon. Friends who have indicated their opposition to superannuation altogether. It is all very well for my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee to point to the case of a man who, having worked upon the land up to the age of 78 then had nothing but a poor allowance from the Parochial Board to support him; but if the policeman fares better, all I can say is that it should not be in violation of the principle of deferred pay. A policeman should get a fair return for his work, and no more; and if he does not get more, then he need not fear comparison between the treatment he gets and the treatment of the pauper. I feel very strongly that some measure of superannuation would be a good thing, not only for the police themselves, but for the country. It is perfectly true that they have a semi-military occupation, and their value to the country only lasts during the prime of their life. The authorities cannot turn them adrift as soon as they have passed their best. It is desirable that such a scheme should be adopted, but we must be careful that it is not too lavish as compared with the remuneration of other classes in the working community. If the Government are prepared in Committee to discuss the matter fairly, and will make fair concessions, my own opinion is the Bill will pass with general assent. The country will not, I think, object to the Government taking the initiative. This is one of the Bills, and here I differ from my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee—as to which the country look to the Government to take the initiative. They can hardly expect Local Authorities to come and ask to have this burden put upon the rates, but if the scheme is a fair one they will not refuse to accept it. It is quite true that the Bill is framed too much upon English lines, but, as I have said, it is capable of modifications in Committee which will make it acceptable to the people of Scotland.

*(8.45.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, N.): I think that a case has been made out for the Second Reading of this Bill, and the adoption of the principle of the Bill, but, while I say this, I desire to have an open mind regarding the further progress of the Bill and the condition in which it may leave the Select Committee to which it is to be committed. Of course, I assume that that Committee will altogether, or almost, be composed of Scotch Members. With regard to the principle of this Bill, I think there is very little to be said logically or sternly in favour of the principle of superannuation. But the question is less one of principle than expedience, and there is, from my point of view, nothing more to be said in favour of pensioning the police than any other class of public servants, unless by a system of deferred payment or superannuation we can keep in the Force a more efficient body of men than we otherwise would have, and my support of the Bill is purely influenced by the expediency of improving the efficiency of the Force. We have adopted this principle in London and other parts of England, and in Ireland. It has frequently been represented to me by the superintendents of police in Scotland that the want of a Superannuation Fund in that country has been so felt by the men in the Police Force, that as soon as men became efficient they showed a desire to join some of the Forces in connection with which a Superannuation Fund has been established.

One of the results of this was that the best of the police in Scotland were in the habit of joining the English or Irish Forces, leaving the less efficient men at home. There is another practical difficulty which has to be got over. We have in the Force a number of men who have become, on account of age and infirmity, unfit for duty. When one goes to the superintendent of the police and represents this fact, one is constantly met with the reply: What am I to do with these men? Whether from circumstances which they could or could not control, they have saved no money, but they have been good and faithful public servants. I have the greatest sympathy with the superintendents, who deprecate the step of throwing these poor men on the Parochial Board in their latter days, and that is the reason why these men are retained for years in the Force after their efficiency is lost. But there is another circumstance which must be taken into account—these men are exposed to great temptations. They are occasionally employed to administer Acts of Parliament upon which opinions are much divided, the Games Act in the country, and the Licensing Acts in towns, for instance. These men are open to heavy temptations, which they must find it very hard to resist if they are underpaid or have no hope of a competency in their old age. A system of superannuation, it is to be hoped, would be an incentive to keep up the discipline and integrity of the Force, and to make the men independent of temptations of this kind. It is for reasons such as this that I feel that rather a strong case has been made out in favour of superannuation. But no indication has been given by the Lord Advocate that the people of Scotland will be prepared to accept the Bill on the lines in which it is drawn. For my own part, I think the working classes in Scotland will never agree to superannuate policemen at the rate of 15s. or 16s. per week, which is, at the present time, the full pay of ordinary unskilled labourers throughout Scotland, to superannuate them at the age of 45 or 46, and enable them, at the same time, to enter the labour market in competition with themselves. I hope it will be made clear under this Bill that no such allowance will be made to policemen under the age of 55. At the same time I desire that a man who is healthy, and who has contributed his share, should feel that he is entitled to superannuation, and that he will not be in the position of going and begging for it. The Member for Dundee has challenged Liberal Members to justify this principle of superannuation, but he has run away without hearing our justification. I admit that unless the employment of the policeman is different from that of an ordinary workman, there is no case made out in favour of superannuation. But I think that the police stand in a very exceptional position. I believe that we may trust the working men of Scotland to do what is fair in this matter. It must be remembered that when a man is taken away from a given trade or industry for a period of 30 years he is not then in a position to compete very successfully in the labour market, and he cannot readily adapt himself to the new conditions. I think that, for the sake of the efficiency of the Force and in the interests of discipline, a good case is made out for superannuation. Has the right hon. Gentleman the Lord Advocate calculated that he is by this Bill raising the wages of every constable throughout Scotland at once by at least £10 a year? This is a large and serious rise. If you divide the sum by the number of constables employed, you will find that this £40,000 will give an increase of something like £10 to each man. I quite agree with the Lord Advocate in thinking that the large increase spoken of, extending up to £150,000 a year, is an exaggeration of what may be expected in the near future. I do not believe that the Bill is drawn on the lines suited to the circumstances of Scotland, and the £40,000 payable from the Imperial Exchequer will be more than sufficient, for many years to come, for the superannuation of the Scotch police. It would be a great mistake to believe that the circumstances of the Scotch police are to be compared with those of the police of London. The Scotch police can live much more cheaply, the price of labour is relatively less, and in their old age a smaller sum would suffice for their maintenance than would be necessary were they living in a great city like

London. We cannot conceal the important fact that the duties of the police in London are very different from those of the Scottish police. The amount of exertion required from the London police is not to be compared with the leisurely life led by the constables of Scotland. The hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Robertson) has told us that he has given some sacred pledges against superannuation in any shape or form. I am sorry he has so pledged himself, because I think it rather unwise to give many pledges to one's constituents. So far as I am concerned, I am under no pledge whatever on this question. I have had opportunities of hearing this matter discussed in Town Councils and other bodies in Scotland for many years past, for it is by no means a new subject, and I think the Lord Advocate will not deny that among those Public Bodies there is great diversity of opinion. The Lord Advocate shakes his head, and I should be glad if he or any other Member of the Government would stand up and state that Petitions have been received from County Councils or other Public Bodies in Scotland asking for this superannuation. No such things exist. It may be that the Inspectors of police, the superintendents, and the constables have been asking for superannuation, but the large mass of constituents have not considered the question, and I know that a great many of them are decidedly adverse to the proposals. I hope, therefore, that the Government will send this Bill to a Committee with an open mind, and that, in the interests of the police and superannuation, they will not drive matters too far, because, if they attempt to hurry this proposal through Parliament too soon, they will arouse a feeling of opposition in Scotland. Public Bodies in Scotland ought, at least, to have some little time to consider the Bill and express their opinion upon it, even if it were assumed that they are in favour of its principle. It should be understood that, although most of us on this side of the House support the principle of the measure, we desire to be left free as to the action we may take when the Bill is in Committee. I believe we shall not be able to effect a satisfactory settlement of the question unless care is taken that those who come up from Scotland representing the police and those who are opposed to this superannuation proposition are called upon to give evidence before the Committee, so that the subject may be considered in all its bearings, and a hasty and premature legislation on the question be thereby avoided. This is one of the things which the Government have sprung upon the country in a sudden and abrupt manner, and without consideration. We have in Scotland been considering questions relating to public health and police for the last 8 or 10 years. The Lord Advocate cannot find time for the introduction of legislation of a sanitary character, but he asks us to find time to pass a Bill for the superannuation of the police, with regard to which no direct encouragement has been given to the Government. I support the Second Reading of the Bill because the subject is deserving of consideration, but I am anxious to put before the Government the fact that the people of Scotland are anxious to have an opportunity of further considering the question, and I think the House would best promote the interests of Scotland by refraining from forcing this measure in a hasty and hurried way upon the House.

*(9.5.) MR. SHIRESS WILL (Montrose): I think it will be admitted that the case of Scotland is very different from that of England. In England we have had growing up for many years a system more or less perfect, under which a system of pensions has grown up and now prevails generally. In Scotland, on the other hand, except in very exceptional cases no such system exists. One would have expected to have heard from the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill some justification for its introduction in the form in which we find it, especially when we find that it is in exactly the same terms and almost the same words as the Bill relating to England. Indeed, it seems to me that the right hon. Gentleman has taken the English Bill, and wherever he has found the word "England" he has struck it out and inserted the word "Scotland," and that is practically all the difference between the Bills for the two countries. It is a question whether in Scotland there is any strong desire to deal with this question of superannuation at all. I think the right hon. Gentleman will find, if he makes the inquiry, that a strong feeling is growing up against the lavish pensions proposed by this Bill under the name of superannuation. We have some evidence before the House as to what is the extent of the wants of Scotland, but the right hon. Gentleman has not referred to that evidence. I would refer him to the recently expressed opinion of the Inspector of Constabulary, laid before the House during the present year. On page 7 of the Report to which I refer, that gentleman says—

“By the passing of a much required general Superannuation Act, to provide suitable pensions on retirement for deserving and worn-out officers and men, and towards a fund of this nature the members are desirous of contributing.”

Therefore, all that is demanded is a pension for men who are superannuated in the sense of being “worn out.” But what is the object of this Bill? It is to apply to Scotland the same scale of superannuation that exists in England, and I ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether it is right or just to apply the same rule to Scotland. The average of the county constable's wages is £70, and that of the borough constable's is £71, and if you apply the proposed principle of superannuation after 25 years' service, you will find that a man at 46 will be able to retire on a pension of £46 per annum. I venture to say that in all the discussions which have taken place in Scotland on this question no one has ever had the idea that a man of 46 years of age should be able to retire on an annual pension of £46. I now come to another matter. Doubtless the finances of the right hon. Gentleman has some good basis, which, however, he has failed to disclose. We are told that the Government have taken actuarial advice on this matter. If they have, it is so much the worse for the figures, but whether they have taken actuarial advice or not they have volunteered no information to the House. Under these circumstances is it reasonable to ask us to accept the right hon. Gentleman's calculation that in 50 years the amount that will be required beyond the £40,000 already provided for will be £80,000 only? He has calculated that only 30 men would be retired in the course of three years, and that up to 50 years hence we shall not reach the maximum charge for superannuation; but he has not given attention to this, or, if he has, he has not taken it into account, namely, that according to the Returns before the House there are in the Police Force of Scotland 373 men who have served between 15 and 20 years, 272 who have served between 20 and 25 years, and 194 men who have served between 25 and 30 years, so that in a comparatively short period the whole of these men will be entitled to retire on pensions. That will absorb, say, £35,000 out of the £40,000 coming from the Imperial Exchequer. This Bill is one which the Scotch people themselves are not prepared for. The Inspector of Constabulary in his Report says:—

Mr. Shiress Will

“The factor of deferred pay might be introduced in the consideration of this most important subject.”

What is contemplated by this Bill is to pension off all those men with whom you are under no contract to pay pension, and to whom you have been paying full wages, and from whom no deferred pay has been deducted. What the Report of the Inspector General contemplates is superannuation to which the men shall contribute; and, therefore, I deduce from that recommendation that if the men who have been serving in the past deserve a pension that pension should be on some other lines than those proposed in the Bill. I am not disposed to reject the Second Reading of the Bill, because I desire to see a fair Bill dealing with the £40,000, and dealing also with the contributions referred to in Clause 16 of the Bill. As regards so much of these contributions as are derived from the Sick Funds, I quite agree in what has been said that too much stress must not be laid on them, because the system of stopping the pay of the sick has been reported against by competent authorities. I think it is extremely unwise, in most instances, to take away from a man his pay, at a time when he most wants it, when he is in sickness, which I assume is real sickness, and not malingering, which would soon be discovered by the police doctor. I will record my vote for the Second Reading, reserving to myself liberty at any subsequent stage to oppose the Bill, should I have reason to be dissatisfied with it.

*(9.20.) MR. PROVAND (Blackfriars, Glasgow): It will have been gathered from what has fallen from hon. Members that the Scotch Members are not opposed to superannuation in any form, but we are opposed to it on the extravagant terms embodied in the Bill. We are nearly unanimously of opinion, further, that this is far more a question for the Local Authority than for the Parliamentary Authority. To this view there has been only one exception—the hon. Member for Aberdeen, who also showed clearly that there is no principle whatever in pensioning constables, and that it is entirely a matter of expediency. He certainly succeeded in making a very good case indeed, on the ground of expediency, for some method of superannuation, although he, like all the others who have spoken, was against such extravagant terms as those proposed by the Bill. I should like to know why the Government in this matter have discarded local opinion with which they should have made themselves familiar. It is certain that this Bill is entirely unasked for in Scotland. No communications have reached me with reference to it. I have heard nothing from my constituents with reference to police superannuation for four or five years, and at that time the opinions of my constituents were against it. I am certain that the feeling throughout Scotland against this Bill will not be lessened when they read the startling statements made in this Debate respecting the amount that is likely to be involved in the carrying out of this measure. To the sum of £40,000, according to the Lord Advocate, is to be added £7,500 of percentages from the pay of the police, and a further sum of £10,000, making a total of about £60,000. But all this is nothing to what the hon. Member for Aberdeen has told us to expect. His calculations, which he gave in such detail that they can be checked by the Government, is that ultimately at least three times the amount will be required in Scotland that will be granted by this measure. That is to say, a sum of £120,000, and I am certain that the people of Scotland will be much surprised when they hear that the Bill will involve them in such a contingent annual liability. It has been remarked in this Debate that pension is merely deferred pay. I believe that is a definition which no one will object to; it therefore follows that those who get high pay being able to provide for the future should get small pensions. But this Bill is based on a diametrically opposite principle, because as the pension is to be proportionate to the pay, those who now receive the highest pay will also get the highest pensions. According to the terms of this Bill, those constables who retire at once will receive their pensions without having contributed anything from their pay, whereas those who join after the Bill is passed will be required to contribute from their pay as the condition of receiving pensions. It seems to be only fair that the constables who are now retiring from the Service, never having contributed anything to the fund, should receive smaller pensions than those now in the Service and those who join hereafter, because they will all contribute to the fund. I wish to call attention to Clause 16 of the Bill, providing that various amounts received for fines and in other ways should be added to the Pension Fund. I think it wrong in principle that the police should have any direct interest whatever in creating their own Pension Fund, and this clause ought to be struck out of the Bill. No constable should have a direct interest, by means of fines or otherwise, in adding to the Pension Fund. It would leave them open to the imputation that they might arrest persons in order to have them fined, and so benefit themselves. These receipts amount now to about £10,000, and that money, I contend, should go into the Municipal Fund, and from it should be granted whatever amount the Local Authority is disposed to give in aid of the Pension Fund. In this way the whole of the money which might be granted by the Local Authority in lieu of the fines and other sources of income mentioned under Clause 16, would be just as if it had been drawn direct from the rates. Notice has been given by two hon. Members to reject the Bill, and, knowing its extravagant terms, I feel that if they carry the question to a Division I must give them my support. It is not because I am against superannuation of any kind, but because I am against extravagant superannuation, that I oppose this measure. I hope opportunity will be given to the Select Committee to ascertain local opinions in Scotland. I feel satisfied that when it comes to their knowledge that this Bill may involve an ultimate expenditure of £120,000 a year, the proposal will meet with very little support. At the same time, the Local Authorities may be perfectly ready to come to terms in reference to some reasonable scheme of superannuation of which they have complete control.

(9.29.) SIR J. KINLOCH (Perth, E.): Sir, I venture to make a few remarks in reference to the speech of the hon. Member for Aberdeen for trying to prove to the House that there would be heavy loss to rates. He stated that the only means of arriving at a fair understanding of the question was to take the example of an Insurance Company and see what premium it charged for a similar annuity. He took the Post Office instance, and then cited the case of a constable joining at 21 and retiring at 46 years of age, receiving an annuity of £40 a year, after having paid an annual premium of £16. The money, he pointed out, proposed to be given by the Government was £40,000, and the 2½ per cent. to be deducted from the pay would give an annual premium of about £11 10s. Od., leaving a deficit of £4 10s., which would be the amount of the loss on the rates. Now, it seems to me rather an arbitrary thing to base your calculation upon one Insurance Company alone. If you examine the Tables of the largest Insurance Company in the world, the Mutual of New York, you will find that instead of requiring £16 in annual premiums you will require only £13 for the same annuity. This completely upsets the calculation of the hon. and learned Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter). If he can quote one Insurance Company, I can quote another; and I think the one is as good as the other. As to the rest of the Bill, I think it will be most acceptable to Scotland if, when it goes upstairs, the age limit is altered to 50 or 55. I think, however, the clause which provides that a constable may by misconduct lose his pension after he has acquired a right to it is a very bad one. When a man has paid a premium, which a constable will be doing in the shape of deferred pay, during all the time of his service I think it is a very arbitrary thing to say that he should lose the pension for which he has thus paid.

(9.32.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): My own inclination would lead me to follow the course indicated by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgeton (Sir G. Trevelyan) and support the Second Reading of this Bill. But my vote on the Second Reading must depend very greatly on assurances which are yet to come from the Government. I think that chief amongst such assurances I must put a very full and complete statement with regard to the constitution and powers of the Select Committee to which the Bill is to be referred. We are always told that on measures of a non-Party character like this the Government are disposed to give full play to the opinions, and full consideration to the wishes, of the Scotch Members. It seems to me that this affords the Government a very suitable opportunity for proving that they really carry into practice the professions which are so often made to us. I think the proposal that the Bill should be referred to a Committee consisting of all the Scottish Members is a very reasonable proposal. I would point out to the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate that by adopting it he would lose none of the power of the Government to modify or vote down—I do not use the expression in an offensive sense—the wishes of the Scottish Members in some future part of the proceedings on this Bill. I wish to say also that the Committee, whatever its constitution, ought, in my opinion, to have full power to call witnesses from different parts of Scotland to examine into the views of the people of Scotland. Otherwise the Committee would certainly not fulfil the object for which it is to be appointed. I am bound to confess that I myself am prepared to support the principle of superannuation for the police. I do not in the least mean to say that I support the details of the proposals in the present Bill, or that I admit that because certain arrangements are made in the Metropolis, or in England generally, the same or similar arrangements should be made for Scotland. The conditions and the requirements are totally different. At the same time, I do not at all agree with the position taken up by my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Robertson), when he said that the proposed superannuation of the police would be an absolute hardship and grievance to that working men class from which the police are drawn. My own view is that the duties of a policeman are peculiar ones and responsible ones. We want to draw from the class from which the police are taken the best, the most intelligent and educated men we can get. We want to make the profession of the policeman such that it shall be worth while for the best men to adopt it. But to say that these men shall be retired at the age of 45 in Scotland is, I believe, perfectly farcical, and a proposal that will commend itself to no portion of the constituencies in Scotland. The hon. Member for Dundee also said that the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) had imbued the working men in Scotland with the most tremendous hatred of all pensions. I do not quite agree with my hon. Friend in that proposition. The hon. Member for Northampton's point of attack has been perpetual pensions. To give the police pensions is only to give them the same advantage as I believe almost every other class of Civil servants already have; and I think that when a constable has done his duty, and has worn himself out in the Service, we may well provide for his declining years and his failing health by giving him a pension. I am disposed to think that the amount that will be needful to carry out a superannuation scheme has been somewhat exaggerated by some of my hon. Friends. We are led to suppose that the amount that will eventually fall on the rates in the Metropolis for superannuation purposes is the sum of £250,000. If we take it at that figure, and compare the numbers of the police in Scotland with those in London, we find that the amount that will fall on the rates in Scotland is exactly £72,150. That would be less than 1d. in the £1 on the whole valuation in Scotland. I do not assume that that amount will be thrown on the rates in Scotland, because I do not believe we shall at all adopt the scale that is to be adopted in England. For my part, I shall be prepared to support the Second Reading of this Bill if the Government give us satisfactory assurances as to the constitution of the Committee, and also assurances that they will be guided by the decisions of that Committee when it makes its Report on this Bill.

(9.43.) MR. SOMERVELL (Ayr &c.): The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has introduced a considerable amount of matter that would more appropriately be dealt with in the Debate as to the constitution of the Select Committee than on the Second Reading of the Bill. The question we have now to determine is whether the principle of the superannuation of the police is a right and proper principle. The question of the constitution of the Select Committee is one entirely for future consideration. But it appears to me that the only valid objection that has been raised as to why this Bill should not be read a second time is that it has been to a certain extent flashed on the country. I do not know whether hon. Members who make that statement have looked into the history of this question; but it would not appear that they have made themselves familiar with the long period of time during which this question of the superannuation of the Scotch police has been before both Houses of Parliament. In 1858 there was an inquiry, there was a Select Committee of the House of Commons appointed to consider the subject in 1877, and in 1883 there was another inquiry, so that it is an absurdity to say that this subject has not been ventilated in the country. It is said that the Government is departing from the principle which should be observed in dealing with this question, because it is founded on the principle embodied in the English Bill; but I say that hon. Members who make that statement have not read the Reports of the Committees who considered the question. The question whether superannuation should be granted after a fixed period of years or at a certain age was considered and reported on, and there was a large consensus of opinion—of the best and most influential description—in favour of the principle of granting superannuation after a fixed term of years. It was stated that it was essential to getting the best class into the Police Force that these payments should be given after a fixed term of years, so that there should be no uncertainty when a young man entered the Service as to the period at which he would be pensioned, that period not depending on the failure of his health. A man who enters the Service at 21 might serve 38 years without his health failing, and the prospect of a pension at the end of that term of years is not a sufficient inducement to attract men to the Service, and to keep them there when they have entered. In the Report of the House of Commons Committee of 1877 we find—

“I see from the evidence that a fixed term of service has been asked for by some of the influential witnesses, and this, which does not appear unreasonable would have as one result the advantage of enabling the conscientious constable to get the pension which was at one time obtained by the malingerer for slight, short, or even artful incapacity.”

The late Lieutenant General Cartwright, Her Majesty's Inspector of Constabulary (England), states—

“I consider age to be of little consequence compared with service, for, if it is to be based upon age, if a man enters at 40, he soon arrives at 60, comparatively, and he gets his pension. Then the men who are the best men whom we have in the Force, generally speaking, are those who come in young, about 22 years of age, and who are trained to their duties. These would have to wait 38 years before they would arrive at the age of 60, so that really the only thing to do is to strike out age and to put in service. When he has served a certain number of years, he should have a claim upon the fund? Yes; when he has served a certain number of years. I will not pretend to say what number of years, but I am sure it would be of the greatest advantage in getting the right sort of men into the Force if there was a knowledge that it was to be made a profession for life, and that after a certain period they were to have a certain pension.”

That disposes of the argument reiterated time after time by a considerable number of Members on the other side of the House. The Government in introducing this measure have not brought in a new principle, but have adopted the principle recommended by the Committee of 1887, and I think that when hon. Members have further time to consider, they will see that it is of great advantage that the pension should be granted for a fixed term of years. A policeman, especially in the mining districts, should be physically capable of coping with criminals in the prime of life, and he therefore ought not to be retained in the Force until years enfeebled him. To say, as some hon. Members seem to wish, that policemen should not become entitled to pensions until quite incapacitated by bodily ailments would, I maintain, have the effect of deterring good men from entering the Force. That a constable who is ailing, but who might recover if relieved from work, should be compelled to remain in the Force if he wished to gain a pension, until his disease should have taken a firm hold of his constitution, would be cruel and inhuman. It should be remembered that the Police Force is certainly not popular, especially in the country, where the constable is always on duty day and night, Sundays and holidays. The Force is one that requires men of self-control, and the service is one which deprives the men during the whole of their lives, of many innocent enjoyments. County police must not be regarded in the same light as burgh police. In the burghs, the men go on duty for a certain number of hours, after which they are relieved, and they have a limited amount of night duty. The case of the county policeman is different. He is never relieved; he cannot make friends, because he may be liable at any time to arrest his neighbour. He is placed in a peculiar position, and unless you hold out special inducements, you will never get good men to join, or when good men have joined, you will never retain them in the Service. In 1873 the average of retirements from the police in Scotland was 16 per cent. When wages rose in 1874 and onwards, the average retirements were 30 per cent.; and last year, according to the Report presented by the Chief Inspector, there were 115 more retirements than the year before. Why is that? To my mind it is because wages outside are good, and there is no Pension Fund, and the duties are unpopular. It is of the greatest importance that you should be able to retain men especially in counties such as Lanarkshire and Ayrshire, and in the mining districts generally, where wages are constantly going up and down. It is at the very time when wages are high, and rioting and drunkenness are most frequent, that the Police Service is most unpopular. It is at these times that the policeman can better himself by leaving the Force, and it is at these times that they do leave the Force. In the Constabulary you cannot raise and lower wages, as they do in the outside world, according to the state of trade. If you once raise wages in the Police Force they are raised for ever, so that you have to be very careful what you do; and I maintain that it therefore becomes necessary that we should offer what other inducements are open to us to get men to resist the temptation to leave the Force at such times as they find their duties unpopular. The best thing we can do is to provide a Superannuation Fund. It is said that such a scheme will entail a heavy charge on the ratepayers at some future period; but I fail entirely to follow the figures of the hon. Member for Aberdeen. No doubt in starting a superannuation scheme, seeing that it has not hitherto been in existence in Scotland, as it has in England, you will have more than an average number of men thrown on the fund, and you must expect to have a large demand made on your purse, but according to an actuarial calculation made in one of the Scotch counties, if you started a superannuation scheme just now, and stopped at this $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and had to levy a $\frac{1}{2}$ d. rate to make up the deficiency, in the course of 10 years you would find a $\frac{1}{4}$ d. rate sufficient, and in another 10 years $\frac{1}{8}$ d. It would be inevitably necessary to raise this additional sum when starting a superannuation system. There must be a number of men who cannot be said to be absolutely inefficient, and who are only remaining in the Force because there is no Superannuation Fund, and because to turn them away would be to deprive them of a means of subsistence. They have not joined Benefit Societies, for the reason that for the past 22 years they have been expecting a police superannuation scheme. It should be remembered that there is a superannuation system in England, and the effect of that is that at the present time the best men in the Scotch Police are annually being drawn away to the English police by the temptations which the Superannuation Fund in England offers. It is of vital importance to Scotland that the question should receive a final solution. I do not for a moment say that I am in favour of every provision of the Bill as it stands. I do not believe in this peddling certificate money clause, but that is only a detail which can be easily remedied. We have to consider, broadly, whether it is necessary that there should be a Police Superannuation Bill for Scotland, and I claim that I have shown that it is essential to the police and the people of Scotland that this question should be dealt with. The question we have most to consider is whether the Bill can be so improved in Committee as to satisfy the people it is intended to benefit, without undue pressure on the ratepayers. I maintain that this is such a measure. If my two premises are admitted, I say that Gentlemen on both sides of the House have no alternative but to vote for the Bill and to leave it to the consideration of a Select Committee, in the confidence that in this question Party feeling will be laid aside, and that a Member will be actuated with the intention of doing justice to the ratepayer, and at the same time giving to the police that to which they are justly entitled.

(10.5.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I regret that, notwithstanding the strong assertion of the hon. Gentleman, I have not been converted to a belief in the desirability of the Bill. I listened to the lucid statement of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate in introducing the Bill, and I was sorry that not more than half-a-dozen of his own Party were present to hear him. I was not satisfied with what the right hon. and learned Gentleman said in support of the Bill. He told us the pension system was quite a new thing in Scottish Local Government life, but that it is in existence in England, and, therefore, ought to be introduced into Scotland. I do not think that is a very strong argument, judging from the tone of the Scottish electors and Members. I think it will not be long before we refuse to take the coins contemptuously thrown to us by the English Government, and demand our full share of the Public Funds. We have not in Scotland this pension system at all, and hence we have not all the abuses that are always associated with pensions and superannuations. We are told that we cannot get good men unless we give pensions. I do not know any place in the north in which there is any difficulty in getting good men. The position of a policeman is very popular, and a dozen men generally apply for every vacancy. The best plan to adopt is to pay full salary to your men and let them buy annuities or enter Friendly Societies, and so develop thrift and foresight. We have not had any information as to a measure of this kind being asked for by Local Authorities in Scotland. I am rather inclined to doubt the accuracy of the actuarial knowledge of the hon. Member for Ayr Burghs (Mr. Somervell). The Home Secretary told us the other day that instead of £40,000 we really want £120,000. That is very much nearer the mark. Before long you may want £150,000. Moreover, by this Bill you are striking at the control of the police, and you are going to centralise the Force. And more than that, you are introducing, by means of one of the clauses, a little Coercion Act for the Highlands. One of the burghs in my county has refused to take your grant. They do not want the police to be stuck up and to be made imitation soldiers. They prefer to have their men modestly dressed and not quasi-soldiers. Orkney and Shetland prefer to have control over their police. What you want to do by the 24th and 25th clauses is to amend the General Police Act, and you want to introduce into Scotland the pension system. England wants a Bill of this kind, and, therefore, a Bill of the same type must be drafted for Scotland. The 24th clause provides that the police may be sent anywhere in the country, and it even provides that the Police Authorities may take naval and military expeditions under their control, and defray the cost out of the Police Funds. We are, therefore, to have a little mild form of coercion for the Highlands. I do not think you require either extra police, soldiers, or marines. The Bill will be costly, and is totally unnecessary, and I think that before a heavy burden of this kind is placed upon them, the people of Scotland should have some little time for consideration. I beg to move that the Bill be read the third time this day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Dr. Clark.)

(10.15.) MR. J. WILSON [Lanarkshire, Govan]: I rise to support the provisions of this Bill, so far as they are in accordance with what my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen has pointed out. There is no superannuation for the police of Scotland at present. The police of England and of Ireland, the military, naval, and civil servants of the Crown have pensions, and while I would not vote for any extravagant superannuation scheme, entailing a very heavy burden upon the people of Scotland, I think that, upon the whole, there is good ground for some police superannuation scheme for Scotland. I am very much of the same mind as the right hon. Gentlemen the Member for Bridgeton, who thinks that 45 or even 50 years of age is too early to give a man a pension. I think the right hon. Gentleman struck the key note when he placed the age at 55. In cities and large centres of population both the temper and the nerves of the police officers are sorely tried, but in the borough of Govan, where we have a very large working-class population, I am proud to say the Police Force is in such a high state of discipline that, notwithstanding that they have sometimes some very troublesome parties to deal with, there is a remarkably good feeling between the inhabitants and the police, and I am sure the Local Authority will welcome a well-devised scheme of police superannuation. I know that the superintendents of the Police Force will approve of a superannuation scheme because it will bind the men to their duties and keep them from going away to other situations. I hope the Lord Advocate will give special weight to what fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Marjoribanks) as to referring the Bill to a Select Committee composed of Scotch Members. Judging from the attenuated attendance upon the Government Benches, it is evident English Members take no interest in this case. Hence it is only right and fair that the Scotch Members should settle the matter themselves. Though the Bill is not everything we desire, I regard it as a fair attempt on the part of the Government to supply a want which has been long felt, and I may encourage the Lord Advocate by saying that so far as I know the Local Authorities, there is a very strong feeling in favour of some scheme of superannuation. I shall support the Second Reading of the Bill on the distinct understanding that we are left a free hand when we come to consider it in the Select Committee.

(10.20.) Mr. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): So far as I understand the feeling of the people of Scotland, especially in the working class centres, it is entirely opposed to anything in the nature of a police superannuation scheme. Superannuation of the police can only be defended on the ground of some necessity. Necessity may be of two kinds—the necessity of efficiency and the necessity of getting men into the Service. The police of Scotland are as efficient a body of police as can be found anywhere, and there is no want of supply. When the question of increased pay came before the Town Council of Glasgow, it was said that any number of men could be got to join the Force, and the Council felt that under such circumstances it would be most unreasonable to give increased pay. Then it is said that this £40,000 is a present to Scotland, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer says, "If you do not want it, leave it, or take it for the superannuation of the police." It is perfectly obvious that this money must be given to Scotland, apart altogether from the question whether it is applied to police superannuation or not. This £40,000 belongs to the Scotch people, and if it is not used for the purpose of superannuating the police, it must be used for some other Scotch purpose. What do the people see at the present moment? There are 40,000 policemen in Scotland. They get about £300,000 a year. They are perfectly content with their wage, and the Local Authorities receive as many as 10 applications for every vacancy. The average wage is about 27s. a week, besides clothing, which is considerably more than the average wage of the working man, and yet in these circumstances we find the Government proposing to give £40,000, or £10 per man more. But it is not only the £40,000 that has to be considered. The £40,000 may have to be increased to £120,000, as the Home Secretary pointed out. The right hon. Gentleman has no interest whatever in magnifying the sum. In this case you have got selected lives, men who have been taken into the Force on account of their specially good constitutions. After 25 years' service these men are to enjoy pensions. Who are the policemen in Glasgow, for instance? They are the hardest men in Scotland, and it is impossible to find a more healthy body of men anywhere. They are the very men who, retiring at 45 or 50 on pensions of 16s. a week, are very likely to live until they are even 90 years of age. Everyone knows that the longest lives are those of annuitants, and in this case we are dealing with selected lives. It must not be supposed that because a man in Scotland is 50 years he is not fit to be a policeman. It is not brute force that makes a man a good policeman; tact and discretion are of far more importance than brute force. Young and strong men are, no doubt, required in those parts of a city where rowdiness is rampant; but there are many opportunities of utilising the services of policemen advanced in years. I think the Government are making a great mistake in raising this question. The people of Scotland consider that the policemen in Scotland get an ample wage, far above what the ordinary working men get, that the wage is steady, and that the employment is comparatively light. They have, no doubt, to stand in the streets a considerable time, but the omnibus conductor is required to stand for long hours together. If you try to convert the police into a military Force, the result will be to destroy the friendly feeling which exists between the police and the public in Scotland, and which distinguishes the case of the Scottish people from that of the English Metropolis. Of course, where you have a mere handful of police in proportion to the population, it would be utterly impossible to maintain law and order unless the police were supported by public opinion, and the more you endeavour to make the police a military body the more will you estrange them from the people. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton (Sir G. Trevelyan) that you must take the present pay of the police, and regard the superannuation as deferred pay, in order to arrive at the market value of the policeman. It has been shown that in Scotland the market value of the policeman at the present moment is exactly the pay he receives. There are a dozen applicants for every vacancy, and the men are all thoroughly efficient. There are no complaints of want of men or want of efficiency, and, this being so, no case is made out for introducing this superannuation proposal, except as an extra gratuity to the men. And I am quite certain that the people of Scotland will look very much askant at the proposal to set aside for superannuation purposes the large sum of £40,000 per annum, especially when that is coupled with the probability of its being increased by £80,000 at no very distant future, making a total of £120,000 a year as a superannuation provision for 4,000 policemen. It seems an extraordinary thing that the Government can provide £120,000 a year for police pensions, and yet be unable to devote the modest sum of £10,000 or £20,000 for the relief of those who are suffering from agricultural distress in Scotland.

(10.34.) MR. W. P. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): In proposing to create a new fund for the purpose of giving a pension list to Scotland I think we ought to take great care that we should act upon sound principles. It seems to me that both in the English and Scotch measures the soundness of the principle on which the police pension fund is to be created is in considerable doubt. The fund is made up of contributions from different sources. One of those contributions comes from the police themselves. It is generally assumed that the deduction from the pay of the police will be $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of their wages. This is in the nature of deferred pay, and to this is added contributions from other sources, including the £40,000 from the Imperial Exchequer. The policemen's contributions, being in the nature of deferred pay, ought to be obtainable by every policeman at the end of his period of service, under whatever circumstances he may leave the Force, even in the case of misconduct, which I put as a severe test. If the pension is derivable from funds of this character he has a right to his share in consideration of the contribution he has made. On the other hand, the pensions derivable from such a fund as the £40,000 payable from Imperial sources should be regarded as an act of grace and a reward for meritorious service. I think great difficulty will arise from the mixing up of those different cases of funds as the source from which the pension is derivable. It seems to me that much of the trouble arising in London and other places is due to the confusion of mind occasioned among the recipients of pensions as to the fund from which the pensions are obtained. In so far as the policeman's pension is derived from his own pay, or deferred pay, he has, in my opinion, an absolute and unalienable right to it, even, as I have said, in case of his dismissal for misconduct; and this ought not to be confused with any other sort of superannuation given as a reward for meritorious service. I trust that when the Bill is in Committee the question of the character of the fund will be carefully considered. Otherwise I am afraid it will be found, as has been stated by the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark), that abuses are always associated with pensions.

(10.40.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I think the date of this Bill shows that the Government have introduced it without due consideration. The origin of the Bill is by no means satisfactory, because the House has been asked in the first place to vote money, and then to pass a Bill to appropriate it to this purpose. It would have been far better if the Government had first asked the House to pass a Bill to provide for police superannuation, and then to vote the money necessary for carrying the provisions of such a measure into effect. The Lord Advocate has observed that Scotch Members are in considerable doubt about this measure, and the reason of that is because the Local Authorities have not been able to express any opinion with regard to the superannuation of the police. Had there been any strong desire on the part of the Scotch Local Authorities in favour of this proposal, they would certainly have made their voices heard. The hon. Member for Dundee has put the case very strongly against all superannuation, but I confess that I am not prepared to follow the hon. Member to that length. It has already been pointed out that superannuation, as far as it merely means deferred pay, involves no injustice to the working men. It is impossible to avoid superannuation in some form or other, and if it must exist it ought to be the subject of a certain system, so as to induce steady and respectable men to enter the Force, and insure that there should be no jobbery with regard to it. In these circumstances I confess that I do not see how hon. Members are to refuse to read the Bill a second time, unless they agree with the hon. Member for Dundee and object to the principle of superannuation altogether. If everybody can be heard in Committee who can represent the feelings and wishes of Scotland, I do not see that there is anything in the Bill so objectionable as to prevent us giving it a Second Reading. I, therefore, propose, and I believe it is the view of most of us who are discontented with the Bill, to support the Second Reading of the Bill, trusting that ample opportunity will be given in Committee to ascertain the wishes of Scotland.

(10.46.) MR. ARTHUR ELLIOT (Roxburgh): I think the great majority of us are pretty much agreed on the principle of superannuation; but I must say I was a little alarmed when my right hon. Friend (Mr. Marjoribanks) suggested that the Committee should take evidence, and go into an elaborate inquiry, which might possibly have the effect of throwing this measure over to another Session. My right hon. Friend, when he began his remarks, attributed to the Government some sort of sudden inspiration in taking up this subject, as if they were legislating in a new way. The genesis of this measure has not been in the minds of my hon. Friends opposite within the last few months. Again and again during the last 10 years I have heard proposals by Government after Government, to institute police superannuation for both the English and Scotch Forces. I come from the Borders, and I have heard it again and again alleged that constables are leaving the Scotch for the English Force, in which better terms exist as to superannuation. That is a state of things which requires to be remedied. My right hon. Friend spoke of aged policemen, as, on the whole, rather beneficial to a Force, as if they were the Nestors to their rural friends around them. I do not think that is the case. In Scotland, in the big towns especially, we want active, strong, energetic men. It is quite true that the police are a popular Force, especially in the part of Scotland from which I come, and I think we have a right to complain if the men are drawn away to the English Force by reason of the better terms which exist there. My hon. and learned Friend (Dr. Hunter) made some observations as to the forfeiture of deferred pay. My hon. and learned Friend said that we are treating those who are really members of the working classes in an unjust manner, not in the manner in which other members of the community would be treated. He said that forfeiture long ago was given up as a barbarous remedy, and he asked us not to act in that retrograde fashion. But in regard to the Army, Navy, and Civil Service, if my hon. and learned Friend will take the trouble to refer to the Act, he will find forfeiture of the pension is provided for in case of felony. This Bill acts in direct conformity with that principle, and we are only dealing with police pensioners as with any other pensioners in the Public Service. But the real question in connection with this Bill is whether or not we are making a very bad bargain, or, in fact, making a good bargain. It is clear that we cannot properly thrash out that question here, and I believe the Committee will be able to go into the figures of the right hon. Gentleman (the Lord Advocate), and see whether they are right. I shall vote in favour of the principle of superannuation, and I have no doubt the Bill will be referred to a Select Committee.

(10.55.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwickshire has raised, perhaps, the most tangible question. He has spoken of the Second Reading as a matter of course, as did the majority of hon. Members opposite who have addressed the House. Not more than two or three of the speeches were in a tone of inexorable hostility to the Bill, and to the principle of superannuation. The hon. and learned Member for Dundee spoke in a very stern tone, and the Motion of the hon. Member for Caithness is made in the same spirit. But beyond these objections, I am not aware that any voice has been raised to the progress of the measure. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwickshire, as I said, raised the question of the constitution of the Select Committee. That Committee will, of course, be struck by the methods known to the House, and I have not the least doubt that on both sides of the House there will be a desire that there should be a preponderance of Scotch Members on the Committee, though, at the same time, there will be no wish to preclude either side of the House from putting upon the Committee any Members who have a special knowledge of the circumstances of the case. As to the number of the Committee, it will be something like 17.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: Twenty-one.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Well, these are matters which my hon. Friends are more conversant with than I am. As to the scope of the operations of the Committee, we come across some political phenomena which are worthy the attention of the House. Complaint is made that we do not know the feeling of Scotland. The hon. Member for St. Rollox uniformly uses the phrase, "The people of Scotland," but what are hon. Members from Scotland here for unless it be to represent "the people of Scotland?" The right hon. Gentlemen the Members for Bridge-ton and Berwickshire, and other hon. Members, cannot escape their several responsibilities. I greatly deprecate the suggestion that the Select Committee is to inquire into the feeling of Scotland, and if the opinion of every Local Authority were to be sought the inquiry would be extended far beyond the limits which would permit of the Bill being passed this Session. The scope of the inquiry will rather be directed to matters of technique, to questions of management of the Force, and to actuarial calculations. The hon. Member for Aberdeen has raised the question of actuarial calculations, and I am glad to find that he has not insuperable confidence in the figures which he has given, and that he takes them not from the point of view of his own authority, but rather as being for the Committee to examine. Then, I understood the hon. Member for East Aberdeen to say that £40,000 was more than sufficient for many years.

*MR. ESSLEMONT: Without the other funds, I think it is sufficient provided the age is fixed at 55, not as the Bill now stands.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Yes, Sir; that is a satisfactory answer to the point I put to the hon. Gentleman. We have no intention of urging on the House the scale set out in the Schedule or the number of years service to be insisted on before a pension is granted. These are matters which must be considered with special reference to the general opinion of Scotland, and we hope to derive that opinion from the hon. Gentlemen who sit upon the Committee. I gather from my hon. Friends who sit behind me that they concur in the view that the figures in the Bill need not represent the ultimate decision of the Committee, but there are reasons for taking them as the maxima and minima. In the Committee there will, I hope, be a candid examination of the whole subject with the full assent of the Government. This, I think, affords a solution of some of the difficulties put forward by various hon. Members. The Committee will have an opportunity of examining the actuarial calculations. I hope that I have made it plain that the desire of the Government is to pass the Bill during the present Session, and the Government will enter the Committee, not with the view of exploring all the regions of local opinion upon the subject; but, relying for Scotch opinion upon the members of the Committee, they hope that evidence will be taken only of that kind which will inform the Committee on technical matters, and that the rest of the work of the Committee will be in presenting its opinion to the House. I have no doubt we shall arrive, before the Session closes, at a happy conclusion, both for the police and for those whose interests are guarded by them.

(11.5.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I think that only a little more is wanted to make the understanding with regard to the Committee perfectly clear. We desire that this inquiry should be as complete as possible. There is no desire to go through the whole field of Scotch opinion, but it would not be at all unreasonable that a few typical Public Authorities—Clerks of Supply, Clerks of the Peace, Town Clerks, or others representing municipal authority in Scotland, and possibly some representative Chief Constables—should be brought before the Committee in order that our information may be complete. We have only had this Bill before us a week, and when we are taunted, as we have been, with confessing our ignorance of Scotch opinion upon it, the explanation is that the measure has so recently been laid before us that we have had no opportunity of ascertaining the views of the people of Scotland upon it. I trust that the evidence to be laid before the Committee on technical matters will include some proof of the basis of the actuarial calculation, because we all know that serious errors sometimes creep into calculations of this kind. It must be borne in mind that this proposal is an entirely new departure in Scotland—new not only in the sense of its being a scheme for the general superannuation of the police, but a departure in that it is the first introduction of the principle of pensioning the servants of Local Authorities. I admit the proposal to refer the Bill to a Committee composed exclusively of Scotch Members is somewhat novel; but if that cannot be conceded, I hope the Committee will be so predominantly Scotch that there will be no apprehension on the part of the Scotch Members that their opinion will be overriden by their Colleagues of other nationalities.

(11.10.) MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): I think that the Lord Advocate is perfectly correct in his reasoning when he assumes that if the Bill be referred to a Select Committee there is no meaning or propriety in the desire that that Committee should inquire into the feeling of the people of Scotland in regard to it. If the Bill is to be read a second time, then I assume that the principle of it is to be taken for granted, and it seems to me quite ridiculous to expect a Select Committee to address itself to the question of the feeling of the people of Scotland. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman who last spoke, that this is practically a new question for Scotland. Certainly the hon. Member for the Ayr Burghs denied that this Bill had been flashed on the country, because he said that in 1868, it was fully before the country. But may I remind the hon. Member that 1868 is a long time ago, and entirely a fresh class of voters has grown up, and is composed of men who know nothing of what was done in 1868?

MR. SOMERVELL: I also stated that in 1883 a Bill was introduced in the House of Lords on the subject.

MR. WALLACE: I know the hon. Member mentioned what was done in 1883, but I am not aware that the public attention of Scotland was at the time very much drawn to the subject. I repeat that the question of the superannuation of the police has not been prominently before the people of Scotland. I consider that the proper course for those who hold that this matter has not been sufficiently before the people of Scotland is to vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Caithness, as I propose to do if the hon. Member goes to a Division. The question has not been one of those which have been prominent as political questions in Scotland, and it is far too soon to call upon Scotch Representatives to carry out a mandate from their constituencies. For my own part, I have no mandate from mine, yes or no; and if I am compelled to come to a conclusion, it is that it is too soon to read this Bill a second time. I am simply in the position of desiring that the people of Scotland shall have more time to consider a question which has never really been put before them up to this time.

(11.15.) The House divided :—Ayes 226 ; Noes 51.—(Div. List, No. 171.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee."—(The Lord Advocate.)

*MR. D. CRAWFORD : I should like to ask whether the Committee will have power to send for persons, papers, and records?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON : I have already mentioned that we propose that shall be within the scope of the inquiry.

(11.34.) MR. E. ROBERTSON : I have an Amendment to the effect that the Committee shall be composed of the Members for all the Scotch constituencies, but I do not think it is suitable or desirable to detain the House now, and I believe I shall be equally in order in proposing my Amendment on the Motion for the nomination of the Committee.

Mr. Wallace

DR. CLARK : Will the hon. Member be in order then ; will he not have to move alternative names?

*MR. SPEAKER : If the nomination of the Committee is set down for the commencement of business the hon. Member will have considerable difficulty in moving an Amendment of that character.

(11.35.) MR. E. ROBERTSON : Then I will move the Amendment of which I have given notice. I only wish to point out that a Motion similar to this was proposed at the beginning of the Session of 1889 with reference to a most important Scotch Bill ; but that Motion was imperfect and incomplete, inasmuch as the terms of the Motion only proposed that the Committee should consist of a preponderating proportion of Scotch Members, admitting the presence of English Members. It is no secret that this was not what the Scotch Members desired. There was a meeting of Scotch Liberal Members, in which the proposal was unanimously supported that Scotch Bills should be referred to Committees composed of all the Scotch Members ; but in deference to the views of right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench, the Motion was altered and submitted in a mutilated form. Now, I propose to renew the Motion which in 1889 received the support of the whole Scotch Liberal Party. At this stage I will not trouble the House with argument in support of my proposition, but there is one point I must advert to. English Members have been very much blamed because they have voted down the majority of Scotch Members on Scotch questions, but I have always thought there was a fallacy in the complaint. English Members are called upon to express an opinion by going into the Lobby, and they are condemned because they voted against the Scotch majority, which, however, cannot be known until the Division is declared. I have always thought there was something unfair in the complaint. But I do think the House ought, in reference to a Scotch Bill, to inform itself as to Scotch opinion, and should respect that opinion. This Bill is exclusively Scotch in its subject. Hardly an English Member has considered it worth his while to occupy a seat on the opposite Benches throughout the discussion. I am sure there is no English Member who on this subject would not respect the opinion of the Scotch majority—and I offer them the opportunity of informing themselves of what Scotch opinion really is by referring the Bill to a Committee composed of all the Scotch Members. I appeal to our leaders on the Front Bench to withdraw the ban they placed on this proposal 18 months ago, and allow us to go to a Division on the Motion.

Amendment proposed, at the end of the Question, to add the words "consisting of all Members representing Scottish constituencies."—(Mr. Edmund Robertson).

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

(11.40.) MR. MARJORIBANKS: My hon. and learned Friend has not exactly stated what took place in regard to the proposal for Committee on the Local Government Bill for Scotland. The proposal made in the House was not to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, but to a Grand Committee; and the proposal was, I think, that the Committee should consist of all the Scotch Members, with 40 Members added.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: That was the proposal in the House. I was referring to a proposal in the meeting of Scotch Liberal Members upstairs which was received, if not unanimously, nearly so, that it should be an exclusively Scotch Committee.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: I will not discuss what took place at a private meeting of Scotch Members, but I may say that the question of a Select Committee was not raised; what was referred to was a Grand Committee to take the place of Committee of the whole House and totally different from the position of a Select Committee, which, as my hon. and learned Friend knows, does not take the place of Committee of the whole House. Therefore, I think my hon. and learned Friend stands on firmer ground in moving that this Bill be referred to a Select Committee representing all Scotch constituencies, because the House itself does not forego one of its stages, and any alterations made by the Select Committee will be subject to the revision of the House in Committee. The proposal of my hon. and learned Friend is open to far fewer objections than the proposal of last Session; he stands on firmer ground, and ought to receive far more general support from all sections of the House. For my own part, I trust the Government will assent to the proposal, and I shall support it.

(11.42.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I may say at once we cannot accept this proposal. When the subject was alluded to in a somewhat incidental and cavalier way earlier in the discussion, it was waived aside by a right hon. Gentleman opposite as an impractical suggestion, to be mentioned only to be discarded. I can only say, as I have said formerly, that all the reasons which animate the conduct of business in this House are arguments against the proposal. What would the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwickshire say if, on an English question, it were proposed that the Committee should consist entirely of English Members? Would he consent on a question of general political and administrative importance such as this to have the matter determined upon by English Members alone? If he did he would receive more than the measured degree of condemnation this Motion received from his Colleague earlier in the evening, and would stand alone—

MR. MARJORIBANKS: The right hon. Gentleman has put a question directly to me, and perhaps he will allow me to answer it directly by saying that if it were a measure referring as entirely and completely to English interests and English money as this Bill refers entirely and completely to Scotch interests, all I can say is, that I should be only too glad that English Members alone should deal with it.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Yes; but there would, I imagine, be near the right hon. Gentleman those with subtle minds to discover fine distinctions, who would show that the measure was not so completely and peculiarly English as at first sight it seemed to be. It has been evidenced during the previous Debate that the House is desirous of approaching this subject as a matter of business, and I can only suppose that this Motion is made for some collateral purpose, but not directly concerned in a settlement of the question of the superannuation of the police. We are anxious to carry the Bill to a successful issue, and cannot accept the Amendment.

(11.44.) MR. HUNTER: I desire to point out that when the Bill comes back from the Select Committee it would have to go through a Committee of the whole House, when Scotch Members who were not on the Select Committee will be fully entitled to take advantage of their position to criticise the Bill. To assent to the Motion would be to obliterate one of the most difficult stages of the Bill and hasten its progress. I would seem that the Lord Advocate does not really desire to pass this Session the Bill which the Government have flourished in the eyes of some 4,000 police.

*(11.45.) MR. D. CRAWFORD: I regret very much that the Lord Advocate should have adopted such an aggressive tone towards this proposal. I may remind the House that if the proposal were accepted, it would not be following an entirely unprecedented course. In the Committee on the Burgh Police Bill of 1888, of the 24 Members, there were only two or three who represented English constituencies, and these were nominated for form sake merely, and did not attend more than once during the whole two months the Committee sat. I do not think the Lord Advocate is entitled to oppose the general wishes of the Scotch Members. I supported the Second Reading of the Bill, although there is much in it open to criticism. As a matter of fact, the Bill is drawn too much on English lines, and needs adapting to the circumstances of Scotland. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that if he is really desirous of expediting business, the right method of doing so is not by imputing motives and making offensive insinuations, but by complying with the reasonable proposals and wishes of the Scotch Members.

(11.50.) The House divided:—Ayes 118; Noes 185.—(Div. List, No. 172.)

Main Question proposed, "That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee."

(12.0.) MR. HUNTER: On this question I would ask the Government to agree to a Motion to adjourn the Debate—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

It being after Midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Thursday.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE.

*(12.8.) MR. SPEAKER: I have to explain to the House that this being a private Members' night, Motions ought to have been put down on the Paper before the Orders of the Day other than Government Orders. In future, while the Resolution of the House allowing Government Orders to be taken on Tuesday before other business remains in force, I propose to give directions that Notices of Motion shall be printed on the Order Paper after the Government Orders and before those of private Members.

M O T I O N .

ENDOWED SCHOOLS ACT (CHRIST'S HOSPITAL).

*(12.9.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: I rise to move—

"That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to withhold her consent from the Scheme of the Charity Commission now before the House for the administration of the foundation commonly called Christ's Hospital."

I am aware that an hon. Member who brings forward a Motion of this kind after 12 o'clock at night is voted a great nuisance. ["Hear, hear!"] I listen to those cheers, and I confess, if I may say so without impertinence, that they do not raise my opinion of the Members who utter them. Last night we had four Divisions—caused by the tactics of hon. Gentleman on the other side—between 12 and 1 o'clock, and on other occasions the House gives hours at this period of the night to the discussion of personal matters; but when it is a case of a public charity which has been conducted for 350 years in a manner that gives satisfaction to those who receive benefit from it, and against the administration of which very little has been alleged and scarcely anything proved, and when the law says that no charity scheme shall become law until it has laid on the Table of the House for two months, so that it shall be open to any hon. Member who may wish to do so to object to it, if a Member, in the conscientious discharge of his duty, brings forward, at the only time open to him, a Motion to protect the rights of the public and of his own constituency, and asks the House to consider whether the scheme is a good one or not, he is considered conceited, and a nuisance, and a bore. The period at which I bring on this question is the only period open to me for the purpose. In as few words as I can I will explain the matter, and I hope I may be successful in showing to those who have not studied the scheme that there is a good deal to be said against it, and that it would be well to send it back to the Endowed School Commissioners for re-consideration. I do not mean to say that the scheme contains no good points. It certainly contains one good point, though that is open to argument on the other side—the proposal that the site of Christ's Hospital in Newgate Street, consisting of five acres, which is supposed to be worth half a million of money, shall be sold and the hospital removed into the country at a short distance from London. But that is not a necessary part of the scheme, and might be carried out apart from it, and without the drastic changes in the constitution of the charity which the scheme proposes. When I look for the reasons put forward for adopting the scheme I find them in two papers. One is issued by the Endowed Commissioners themselves, and, very unfairly, this paper has not been sent to Members of the House generally, but only to those who are believed to be favourable to the scheme. The other paper is put forth anonymously, and I am not surprised at this, because it contains libels upon myself and the present Governors, unjustly accusing them of jobbery. First, we are told that the scheme is the result of 12 years' work, which will be wasted if it be rejected. My reply is, that 12 years is nothing in the life of a charity born 350 years ago. Sat cito, si sat bene. If the scheme has the faults which I believe it has it would be better to send it back to the Commissioners to be amended. We are told that it is accepted by the Governors. It is true that they have accepted it, but they have only accepted it because they are told that if they do not they will get a worse one some day from a Radical Government—and this is a reason why I might appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite, but I will not do so as I desire to see this question dealt with on its merits. Then it is also said that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has passed the scheme. No doubt they have, but they look at the matter from a legal point of view, while I and others look at the question from a broader standpoint; we viewed it as a matter affecting the whole charity, and indeed the whole country. It is further said that the President of the Council and the Government have adopted the scheme. But this is not a Government scheme. It is proposed by a body outside the Government, and the mere fact that the President of the Council had to sign it ministerially—

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): No, no.

*MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: That does not seem to me a reason why the scheme should be adopted. This is rather like a private Member's Bill, which Her Majesty's Government regard with benevolent neutrality, but did not introduce as their own. It is the scheme of the Endowment Commissioners. Then we are told that the Royal Commission of 1877 reported against the present hospital system, and that, therefore, it is necessary to have this radical scheme. But the removal of the school could take place without the scheme. The removal of the school was brought before the Governors some years ago, and the question was lost by a majority of 14. The Royal Commission of 1877 reported that all the defects in the management complained of would disappear under an able and judicious headmaster of the school if it were removed to a spacious site in the country. But that suggestion did not carry with it all the other changes which this scheme recommends. I do not think, therefore, that there is much in that objection; because the evils, owing to the division of government out of school hours between the Headmaster and the Warden, have been cured by the action of the present body. Moreover, no general reason is shown for the scheme, and no jobbery whatever has been proved in any way. Who has ventured to say that the Governors have been guilty of jobbery in the exercise of their patronage? The School Board of London, in 1883, went into the whole question with the view of seeing who had been admitted to the school. They found that during the then last three years 515 children had been admitted, and of those 60 were the orphans of professional men and officers, 132 were the children of professional men and officers, 84 the orphans of tradesmen and clerks, 209 the children of tradesmen and clerks, and 30 were children taken from a lower rank of life. They also found that the average income was very small indeed, that only one parent had an income of £400 and under £500, and this was the case of the widow of an officer with six children. I doubt very much, therefore, whether we could improve upon such nomination under the present scheme. But the present scheme introduces a totally different mode in regard to the larger proportion of children filling up the vacancies. It proposes that the 1,200 should be reduced to 1,170, that out of this number 503 should be filled up by nomination and the remainder by competitive examination. Personally, I believe that there is scarcely any worse way of filling up vacancies in a charity of this kind than by competitive examination between young boys and girls of 13. The result too often is to bring forward children who are crammed; cramming means good coaching; and that means expense, and so, as at Eton, the children gain the scholarships whose parents least want the help. I admit that clever children should have an opportunity of rising; but I know that under the present system the Governors have taken pains to send in children who will be a credit. The Governors have appointed in many cases the children of poor parents whom they know personally, and it frequently happens that children without any knowledge of a Governor at all, but simply because they make out a strong case, have obtained presentations from perfect strangers. I have done that myself as a Governor, and I know that in this way deserving children do get admission to the school under the present system, but when admission is to be by competitive examination matters will be altered. I greatly fear the result of the present scheme will be that there will be no new donation Governors, and that the school will sustain a loss of £5,000 or £6,000 a year from not getting their contributions. I ought here to explain to the House that the scheme is divided into two parts. At present there is a hospital for 1,200 boys and girls. The London School Board passed a resolution some time ago, by a majority of two to one, against the day school scheme, and proposed instead that the number of children in the hospital should be increased to 2,000. By this present scheme the number in the hospital is to be reduced gradually to 1,000, and two great day schools are to be set up—a boys' school and a girls' school. The day schools are to be entirely for the benefit of London, and unless children reside in London with their parents or near relatives, they are not to be admitted into either of them. Now, 179 of the appointments are to be competed for by children who attend public elementary schools in London. I should be the last man in the world to say a word against holding out the right hand of fellowship to the elementary schools; but I maintain that in the case of children living with their parents and near relatives in London, and whom it is desired to pass on to receive the benefits of the institutions, they ought to be sent to the day schools, and not at double cost to the hospital. At the present time the proportion of children from the lower ranks of life who are in the hospital is comparatively small, but it is proposed to increase that number to about one-third. We know perfectly well that these children have a very bad time of it. A number of them, who come from Berkshire, are called "the Newbury blackguards," and have a very bad time indeed. It seems to me to be by no means clear that professional men, officers, and men distinguished in science, will approve of the close relationship, in dormitories and otherwise, of their children in the proportion I have mentioned with children of the lower ranks of life, who have not unlearned the habits of their class. That is a consideration which I am aware has great weight in the quarters referred to, and it constitutes a not unreasonable objection. We are now, for the first time, going to introduce a system both in the boarding school and in the day school of some of the children paying and others not paying, and that seems an objectionable feature in connection with a school of this kind, because it will produce invidious distinctions between the boys themselves, and tend to upset the good working of the school. It may affect the feelings of the masters; and it will affect the feelings of the boys towards each other. You will have not only an investigation as to whether the parents can afford to send their children to an ordinary school or not, but an investigation into the comparative means of the parents. The greater part of the income of the masters is to be derived from capitation fees, and it will, therefore, be to the interest of the masters to lay themselves out for the benefit of the paying children at the expense of the rest. Again, under the existing system, which has worked well for over 300 years, the benefits go equally to the whole of England and Wales, but under the new scheme the advantage of the day schools, and of, at least, 179 berths in the Hospital, will be confined to the Metropolis, which will also get its share of the other berths, and the result will be that London, which is only entitled to share equally with the whole country, will get two-thirds of the benefit of a charity which was meant for all. This may please the Metropolitan Members, but it ought not to please the Irish or the Scotch Members, or the Representatives of English constituencies generally. I am sorry I have taken up so much of the time of the House. I have tried not to try the patience of hon. Members; and I think I have shown that there is, at all events, something in my objections to the scheme, and that they are not based on the vested rights of the Governors, about which I have said nothing. I beg to move the Motion which stands in my name.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to withhold Her consent from the Scheme of the Charity Commission now before the House for the administration of the foundation commonly called Christ's Hospital."—(Mr Sydney Gedge.)

*(12.30.) SIR R. FOWLER (London): I beg to second the Motion, and I do so because I think that by agreeing to this scheme we shall kill the goose that lays the golden egg. Governors now pay £500 on their appointment, and they enjoy the privilege of a nomination every four years. The scheme will reduce that by one every six years, and the result will be that gentlemen will think twice before paying money to become Governors. The hospital will be so much the poorer, and it is already in some difficulty owing to the depreciation of its landed property. The liberality of people is likely to be materially checked by the scheme, and on that ground I second the Motion.

*(12.32.) MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): I do not think the House will complain that this question has been brought before it. Of course, the endowment dealt with by the scheme is a very large one. The interests affected being so extensive, it is right that the House should consider a scheme for the alteration of the destination of the endowments before it is allowed to pass into law. At the same time, I think the House would have grievous cause of complaint if the Motion of the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Gedge) were agreed to. This matter has occupied the attention of the Governors of the hospital and of the Endowed Schools Commissioners for some 12 years. Numerous investigations have been made into the circumstances of Christ's Hospital, and the scheme of the Commissioners now before the House embodies the chief points which have been recommended by all the Committees and Royal Commissions that have inquired into the matter. The hon. Member for Stockport has advanced two arguments which, I think, are mutually destructive. First of all, he said that no scheme was wanted, and that it was only necessary to remove the hospital into the country; and subsequently he urged the House to reject the present scheme, in order that a thoroughly good scheme might be introduced at a future time. The scheme has been accepted substantially by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, after an investigation extending over five days, and since that acceptance the Governors, as a body, have not done anything in opposition to it. Therefore, the scheme comes practically before the House as an arrangement assented to by all Parties. The hon. Member for Stockport has based his opposition to the scheme chiefly on the ground that patronage has produced very admirable results in the past. In reply to that, it will be sufficient to point to the recommendations of the Schools Inquiry Commission and the Education Commissioners against the continuance of the system of patronage. The Schools Inquiry Commission reported strongly against it in these words—

"We should wish to fill the school with scholars selected by competitive examination from all public schools of the 3rd Grade in England and Wales."

The Education Commission reported as follows:—

"We have only to recommend that it, benefits should be bestowed, not by patronages but, as far as possible, by merit."

I think these two Reports are a sufficient answer to the hon. Member's argument. If any further answer be required I may say this: The patronage Governors, under the existing system, give £500 each to the funds of the hospital, and are entitled to nominate children in turn. An actuarial calculation was made by the Schools Inquiry Commission, and it has been found that in return for his contribution of £500 a donation Governor receives back, in the space of 12 years, nearly £1,000 worth of patronage. I believe the actual amount is £913.

*MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: How does he get it back?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: By the education of the children whom he nominates to the hospital. Another point the hon. Member made was that too much benefit is going to be given to London and too little to the country. If we remember the origin of the foundation, and bear in mind that part of the site upon which the hospital now stands was the original site given to the institution in the time of Edward VI., and recollect the close connection that has always existed between the Corporation of London and the management of the hospital, and the many endowments given to it by Londoners, I think it may very fairly be held that London has a large claim to share in the benefits of the institution. The Schools Inquiry Commission reported that the benefits of Christ's Hospital have never been confined to London, but that Londoners may fairly claim a share, and a very substantial share, in this splendid endowment. The Educational Commissioners in like manner reported—

“There can be little doubt that the benefit of London was the primary object of the founder, and of a long series of civic benefactors.”

At present the places for London boys are limited to 49; under the scheme they will be increased to 179, and in addition there will be the day schools, accommodating 1,000 London children. I have had a calculation made, and I find that London will get the benefit of about half of the total income of the hospital. It is true that the Charity Commissioners are responsible for this scheme, but the Government are primarily responsible. As the hon. Member no doubt knows, these schemes have all to go before the Education Department. They are thoroughly sifted by the Education Department, and if the Department chooses to approve of them they become responsible for them. I think the House will hesitate long before it rejects this scheme and denies to London and to the children generally the great advantage which the scheme may fairly be said to offer.

(12.40.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I think the House generally will agree with my hon. Friend who so well represents the Charity Commissioners in this House, that there has been far too much delay already in respect to this scheme, and will not agree with the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Gedge) that further delay will be advantageous. I do not say that we on this side of the House agree with every single point in connection with the scheme, but we are obliged to recognise that this is a very large and far-reaching scheme. The hon. Member for Stockport laid great stress on the fact that nominations are to go by competition, and he said that competition would do harm, because the right class of children would not compete to enter the hospital. I think the House ought to remember that the one necessary qualification for every child entering the hospital is under the principal Act that his parents shall be in such a state of poverty that it is essential for him, in order to obtain education, to get into the hospital. Finally, I must enter one protest against the remark of the hon. Member—that this scheme will knit together the different classes in the school, and in that way be pernicious. I think that is one of the best points in the scheme. I am very glad that it recognises that this hospital is intended for the different classes of the community so long as they have the common bond of poverty, and that we shall obtain, as we have obtained in many other parts of our educational system, that which is of great value, namely, a true mixture of classes; that we shall, by means of competition, give the opportunity to the best children to obtain this valuable education, and to rise to better things. I trust the House will accept the scheme as it stands.

*(12.45.) MR. S. HOARE (Norwich): As a member of the Governing Body of Guy's Hospital, I desire to say that the Governors, as a Body, have one great objection to this scheme. We believe that by this scheme that great hospital, in which I am sure many in the House are deeply interested, will suffer a loss of the sum of £400 a year. I am not, however, prepared to vote against this scheme. The Governors of Guy's Hospital feel that Christ's Hospital is one of the great institutions of London, and we are anxious not to do anything which may prevent the scheme being carried through. We feel that to increase the number of children who will get the benefits of that hospital to 2,200—nearly double the present number—will be such a great advantage to London that we cannot take upon ourselves the responsibility of opposing the scheme.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeen, W.): From a hygienic point of view, I must give a most uncompromising opposition to the Motion. Every school is much better carried on in the country than in a town. There is better accommodation, and the children are healthier. Of this, I cannot produce better evidence than that afforded by the Charter House, which a few years ago was moved to the country, which since has taken a fresh lease of life, and which now is one of the best, healthiest, and most progressive schools in England.

(12.50.) THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE COUNCIL ON EDUCATION (Sir W. HART DYKE): As this is the second occasion on which a discussion has taken place on this scheme in the House I shall be pardoned if I refrain from entering into the details of it. I can assure my hon. Friend that I take no objection whatever to the manner or matter of his speech, still less to his bringing forward a matter of this importance. No more difficult matter than this scheme has occupied the attention of the Lord President and myself. When this scheme came before the Department in 1888 some opposition was offered to it by the Governing Body, but its educational advantages weighed so heavily in the balance that the Lord President and myself expressed our approval of it. But the House is now in a different position. Since that time an appeal has been made to the Privy Council, and that body has given a decision in favour of the scheme. Therefore, the House has to-night only to decide on the educational advantages of the scheme as it stands, and I feel sure that the House will endorse this excellent scheme.

Question put, and negatived.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 2nd July, 1890.

MR. SPEAKER entered the House at 10 minutes after 12 o'clock, but some time elapsed before a quorum was made. At 12.35, Mr. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox), drew attention to the fact that there were not 40 Members present. The bell was rung, and, on the House being counted, Mr. SPEAKER declared that there were 40 Members present.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

DIRECTORS' LIABILITY BILL.—(No. 300.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

* (12.40.) MR. WARMINGTON (Monmouth, W.): In moving the Third Reading of this Bill, I am sorry to find that there is evidently a desire on the part of some hon. Members that the Bill should not pass. It has already been discussed upstairs, and on three consecutive Wednesdays the Report has been considered in this House. The principle of the measure has been affirmed time after time, and its various provisions have been thoroughly discussed. I am therefore afraid that there must be in the minds of those of my hon. Friends who propose to re-commit the Bill some little misunderstanding. The hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) and the hon. Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) propose that it should be re-committed in respect of Clause 4. It is a mistake to suppose that there is any desire on the part of those who are in favour of the Bill to delay its operation for a single hour. The date of the 1st of October this year was inserted as a convenient date, representing the time at which it was thought probable the Bill would pass. At the same time, there is every wish that the measure should come into operation as soon as it has received the Royal Assent, and with that desire I will undertake that a representation to that effect shall be made in another place, in order to secure the insertion of a provision to that effect. Another Amendment stands on the Paper for the re-committal of the Bill in respect of a new clause, in the name of the hon. Member for East Donegal (Mr. A. O'Connor). If this were the Committee stage of the Bill I should be glad to accept the view expressed in the hon. Member's clause; but if I were to accept any Motion for the re-committal of the Bill to-day, I am afraid the effect would be to destroy the measure altogether. For that reason I feel myself compelled to oppose any Motion for the re-committal of the Bill. There is also a Motion in the name of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Camberwell (Mr. J. Kelly); but its acceptance would involve not only a new Bill, but a new Bill which would take an entire Session and the whole force of the Government adequately to discuss and pass into law. The other Motions on the Paper are decidedly hostile to the measure, and I trust that they will not be pressed, or, at any rate, that they will not receive the assent of the House. I have no wish now to discuss the merits of the Bill. Its provisions have been so often explained that it is not necessary to say a word more about them. All I can do, in moving the Third Reading, is to offer my acknowledgments to hon. Members on both sides of the House, and especially to the President of the Board of Trade, for the assistance they have given me in the discussion of the clauses of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a third time."—(Mr. Warmington.)

(12.45.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The statement which has just been made by the hon. Member in charge of the Bill leaves me in no doubt as to the course which I ought to pursue. My Amendment to re-commit the Bill in respect of Clause 4 is in no way hostile to the Bill, which I am anxious to see passed, as a means of preventing the most disgraceful and destructive kinds of fraud now known to society. The Bill is, in reality, directed against men whom I regard as the highway robbers of the 19th century—men who are more cunning and more cruel than those who took to the road a century ago. I gather from the hon. Member's remarks that some of the Amendments on the Paper are hostile to the Bill, and that, in regard to the rest, if the Bill were re-committed it would have to be postponed for another year. Now, I think that such a measure is urgently required. In the course of the last five years not less than an average sum of £20,000,000 a year has been applied to the promotion of companies which have brought nothing but ruin to ordinary investors who have embarked their money in them, and nothing but gain to a certain class of schemers. Therefore, I cannot on the present occasion incur the responsibility of assisting the designs of hon. Members who hope to defeat the Bill. I take note of the declaration of the hon. and learned Member in charge of the Bill that he will use his best exertions to get Clause 4 omitted, and I will not, therefore, move my Amendment.

*(12.47.) SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): The hon. and learned Gentleman in charge of the Bill has classified the notices of Motion on the Paper for the re-committal of the Bill, and I am sorry to observe that he regards the Motion which I have put down as altogether hostile to the Bill. Its only hostility to the Bill is that it endeavours to point out that the measure is incomplete, and would be nugatory in its operation as it now stands. Another notice of Motion exactly similar to mine has been put down by the hon. and learned Member for East Donegal, and in regard to that Motion the hon. and learned Member in charge of the Bill says he does not regard it as hostile to the measure. Now, the only difference between the two Motions is that one is moved from this side of the House and the other from the Benches opposite. Both equally endeavour to enlarge the scope of the Bill; both aim at amending the law on points in which the law is not clear. I challenge the hon. and learned Gentleman to deny that upon the points dealt with by those two Motions the law is not notoriously uncertain, and requires amendment. I am, therefore, compelled to express my sincere regret that the hon. and learned Gentleman should have classified my Motion in a different category from that in which he includes the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for East Donegal. The clause proposed by the hon. and learned Member provides that a waiver, or affected waiver, of the provisions of Section 38 of the Company's Act of 1867 shall be absolutely void. My clauses define that the word "director" shall include promoters, vendors, and all who are to derive pecuniary benefit from the floating of a company; and that where a Director shall have received payment in cash or shares to induce him to allow his name to appear on a prospectus, or where he shall not have bond fide paid for the shares which constitute his qualification, the fact shall be regarded as prima facie evidence of fraud. The House is asked to settle whether a Director shall be allowed to accept remuneration for joining a company, and promoters, vendors, or founders are added to the Directors and made equally liable for any error or misstatement contained in a company's prospectus. I maintain that the tendency of such Amendments is not in itself hostile to the Bill, but is calculated to make the measure more perfect and complete upon points which it is admitted notoriously require amendment. Looking at the form in which my notice of Motion has been placed upon the Paper, I am not quite sure whether, at this stage, I should be in order if I were to venture to recommend to the House the particular clauses in regard to which I wish to move the re-committal of the Bill. If, however, I am wrong in proceeding to speak upon those clauses, I presume that you, Mr. Speaker, will stop me, and, of course, I shall at once submit to your ruling. The first new clause which I propose to add to the Bill, if the House consents to the re-committal of the measure, is in the following terms:—

"Provided that the word 'director,' wherever it occurs in this Act, shall include the promoter or promoters, vendor or vendors, and all who are to derive pecuniary benefit from the floating of the Company, whether their names appear on the prospectus or not."

It is notorious, and a point which cannot be controverted, that where bogus companies are started, where fraudulent misstatements have appeared in the prospectus, and where the object of floating the company is to put money into the pockets of persons who ought not to receive it—that in most of such cases the persons who fraudulently receive the money are not the Directors, who have themselves been misled—sometimes honestly misled, and sometimes, possibly, I am afraid, dishonestly misled. At any rate, Directors are the persons who are put in the forefront of the battle, though they may have been misled by the fraudulent misrepresentations of persons who notoriously are not touched by this Bill in the slightest degree. The Bill will undoubtedly, in some respects, if it be amended as I should like to see it amended, make Directors more careful as to the statements they accept from promoters. In that object, I, for one, and my hon. Friends who act with me, heartily co-operate. It has been, undoubtedly, the case that occasionally Directors of position and reputation have foolishly allowed their names to be associated with enterprises into the details of which they have not exercised sufficient examination and to which they have not devoted sufficient care. I think that the hon. and learned Gentleman is right in directing the attention of such Directors to the responsibility they incur by allowing their names to go forth in the front of the battle, and pledging their reputation to statements which are sometimes not substantiated when due inquiry is made. But what I do maintain is that such cases are absolutely unusual and exceptional cases. I maintain that in 9 cases out of 10 of the successful floating of bogus companies by means of the names of responsible and respectable gentlemen attached to the prospectus, the Directors have been misled by the cunning arts and devices of those who gain pecuniarily by the floating of such companies; and those Directors, I contend, are not, and should not, be held to be morally responsible for the harm which has been done. The object of the clause which I propose to add to the Bill is in all cases to attack the persons who are really morally responsible. The object of legislation should be to get at the real delinquents, and I venture to think that that object would be attained, as far as it is possible for legislation to overcome the cunning of fraudulent persons by the clause which I propose, and which I hope the House will consent to add to the Bill. I will now, if I am in order, pass on to the 2nd clause, which I propose to submit, and which is as follows:—

"Provided that where any Director shall have received any payment, whether in cash, or in shares, or otherwise, to induce him to allow his name to appear on a prospectus, or where he shall not have bona fide paid for the shares which constitute his qualification, the fact shall be regarded as prima facie evidence of fraud." I think I am right in saying that this Bill has been largely called for by the litigation which occurred in the well-known case of "Peek v. Derry." The point in that case, and it is one which was dealt with in various Courts, was whether, through the influence of a promoter, vendor, founder, or anyone else, a Director should accept remuneration in cash or shares, or in any other shape, for lending his name to a company. I believe that in that case there was hardly a doubt as to the bona fides of Mr. Derry and the other Directors. It was not disputed that they had acted in good faith, and one of the points which came up was whether the prospectus did not contain misleading statements. The one point which undoubtedly influenced the Judges who had to decide the case, and the public also—a point which rightly told heavily against the Directors, although they appear to have acted in good faith—was the fact that, in ignorance of the law, or rather because of the uncertainty of the law, they had accepted shares from the promoters in consideration of their names appearing on the prospectus. That clearly pointed to the possibility of these gentlemen having looked with a kindly eye upon statements in the prospectus which were of a doubtful character, and which, if the Directors had been perfectly independent, they might possibly have criticised much more severely. Now, I maintain that the general result of the litigation in that famous case made it evident that it was advisable in the future interests of Limited Liability Companies, carrying on the commercial pursuits of the country, that the law upon such matters should be perfectly clear, and open, and distinctly laid down by the Legislature. I have no wish to press the matter more than it is pressed by the hon. and learned Member for East Donegal, but I do think it is one which it is absolutely necessary the Legislature should decide. These clauses cannot be regarded as in any way hostile to the scope of this Bill by those who are anxious that the measure should not really harm and cripple the great cause of limited liability. The importance of this matter to the future commerce of the country has been well pointed out in an article I have read this morning, which contained most powerful arguments—an article in the Financial News. [Laughter.] The hon. Member for Stepney (Mr. Isaacson), and some other hon. Gentlemen, laugh at the mention of the Financial News. It is not for me to go into the merits of the Financial News as a paper; but this I will say: that having for some time past read that paper pretty freely it seems to me that there are few, if any, hon. Members in the House of Commons who can justly lay claim to have done so much in the way of exposing fraudulent and bogus companies as the Financial News has done, and has proved its right to do, by proceedings in the Law Courts. I, therefore, fail to see why the hon. Member for Stepney should laugh derisively at the mention of this article. I would invite the hon. Member, instead of deriding articles that appear in the public Press, to read them with a dispassionate mind. As I read the article in the Financial News this morning, it seemed to me to prove conclusively that if this Bill were allowed to remain in its present state it would do incalculable harm to the future of limited liability. The hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) has talked about the amount of money that has been lost on bogus companies, but this article ought to cause him to look upon the other side of the ledger. It would show him that the actual enrichment of this country by Limited Liability Companies during a few years past has amounted to vast sums of money, in comparison with which any sums that can be mentioned as having been lost are absolutely infinitesimal. It is proved by the article how Limited Liability Companies have given employment to large numbers of the working classes throughout the country, which they could never have hoped for, and never have dreamt of, if limited liability had been crippled in the way in which this Bill will undoubtedly cripple it if Amendments are not made in its provisions. I would ask Gentlemen who support this Bill to consider what would have happened to the commerce of this country if the £3,000,000,000 which is the nominal amount of the capital registered at Somerset House during the past few years had gone to find its outlet in France or Germany, and if French or German capital had been employed, for instance, in the exploitation of India and of the colonies and of South America, and of other parts of the world to which English capital, under the system of limited liability, has gone. The working classes of this country would have felt the pinch to a degree which I am sure hon. Gentlemen opposite would have sympathised with, and which would have been most detrimental to every class in this country. The House ought to think also what limited liability represents in the shape of valuable investments for the small savings of shopkeepers and clerks and others in a comparatively humble sphere of life. I admit that the gains of individual enterprises, such as those of the hon. Member for Stepney, are sometimes cut down by the free competition of Limited Liability Companies; but I maintain that the compensating advantages of limited liability are so great that it would be most deplorable if any check from any source whatever were placed upon its future development. In the hope that the clauses of which I have given notice may contribute to make this Bill a full, complete, and good measure; in the hope that the Bill, when passed, may turn out to be a real advantage in stopping fraudulent operations, and at the same time not to interfere with proper and legitimate commercial enterprise, I beg to move that the Bill be re-committed.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "now read the third time," in order to add the words "be re-committed in respect of certain New Clauses,"—(Sir Roper Lethbridge),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'now read the third time' stand part of the Question."

*(1.6.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): It is very difficult to reconcile the hon. Member's speech with his Motion. In his speech he inveighed against the stringency of the Bill, and yet he proposes to make it more stringent.

*SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: Not the stringency; the incompleteness of the Bill.

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I think the hon. Member's friends of the Financial News will hardly thank him for that. He says he looks on the Bill with a kindly eye. I can only say that no basilisk could ever have looked at the Bill with a more damaging eye than the hon. Member, because the effect of the Motion which he proposes would be to kill the Bill altogether. It is perfectly clear that if re-committed the Bill could not pass this Session. The new clause which the hon. Member proposes is so loose and vague that it comes to nothing. It would include the solicitor, with his bill of costs, the printer, the printer's boy, the messenger who takes it round, and in fact every person who is paid a farthing for any work connected with the prospectus of a company. I am extremely thankful to the hon. Member for West Belfast for withdrawing his Amendment; and I believe I am right in saying that my hon. Friend the Member for East Donegal (Mr. A. O'Connor), who presided with such distinguished ability over the consideration of this Bill when before the Grand Committee, will not move his Amendment. We have spent several Wednesdays over this Bill, which has been thoroughly threshed out in the Committee upstairs, and the House should therefore proceed at once to the Third Reading.

*(1.9.) SIR R. FOWLER (London): It seems to me that this is a Bill to smash limited liability. I cannot help contrasting the attitude of the House today with its attitude 30 years ago upon the question of limited liability. I remember 30 years ago a distinguished friend of mine, the late Mr. Cubitt, then Lord Mayor, losing his election for the City of London because he was supposed to have voted against the Limited Liability Bill. That shows the very strong feeling there then was on the question of limited liability in the City, and I believe throughout the commercial community. Now, public opinion seems to have taken an entirely different course. What some years ago was a most popular craze appears now to be an equally unpopular craze. Some men who, no doubt, deserve very properly to be punished have taken advantage of the limited liability law, and have cheated the public to a very large extent. The result has been to raise a great cry in the House of Commons, and to cause the hon. Member for Monmouth (Mr. Warmington) to bring forward this Bill. The House by this legislation is going directly contrary to the view that Parliament took 30 years ago. I do not wonder that the Bill is favoured by the legal profession, as it must throw an immense amount of money into the hands of legal gentlemen, both inside and outside the House, and provide them with a lucrative business for years to come. It will raise legal questions, which can only be settled by the highest tribunal in the land. I do not, however, very much care about the Bill, except in so far as it affects the community to which I belong. As I understand the Bill, there are words in it referring to "other persons," and this is supposed to include bankers. I understand the Attorney General said that bankers would not be included; but there are other high legal authorities who are of opinion that bankers will be included. If so, and if the Bill had been in force when the failure of Overend and Gurney took place their bankers, Burday and Co., would have been liable equally with Overend and Gurney. I am afraid that this question of the liability or non-liability of bankers will lead to litigation, which will only be settled after an appeal to the House of Lords. That is why I look with great apprehension upon the Bill. As regards the part of it which refers to Directors, I think the effect will be of a very doubtful character. Every wise man, after this Bill passes, will abstain from being a Director of a company. Men of position will decline to go upon the Boards of companies, and their places will be taken by gentlemen who will not mind leaving the country when they get into trouble. Whereas, hitherto, respectable men, and men of very high position, have gone on companies, hereafter the position of Director will be left to men of an inferior class—men who may, perhaps, have handles to their names—and who may even be Members of the House of Commons, but who, if the worst comes to the worst, will be prepared to go abroad. The House is, evidently, very much in love with the Bill. I can only hope that the result of passing it will be more favourable than I anticipate.

(1.17.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): The object of the Bill is to give a right of action to any person who has sustained damage by reason of an inaccurate or misleading statement in a prospectus or notice.

*MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I rise to order. I wish to know whether, on a Motion for the re-committal of the Bill to insert new specific clauses, we can discuss its general principles?

*MR. SPEAKER: There is a good deal of principle involved in the new clause, and it is very difficult to separate the principle contained in the clause from the principle in the Bill. Undoubtedly, after the question of re-committal is settled, the Third Reading will come up, and that will be the time to go into the general merits of the Bill.

(1.19.) MR. A. O'CONNOR: On this question of the Bill being re-committed, I wish to recall to the mind of the House the fact that the object of the Bill is merely to give a right of action to men who have been wronged, and possibly plundered, by means of a misleading or inaccurate prospectus, against those who are, or ought to be, responsible for that prospectus. The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down said that this is a Bill to smash limited liability industries. It appears to me, on the other hand, that the Bill is one to which every honest man may be expected to give assent. By Section 38 of the Companies' Act of 1867 it is provided that every prospectus of a company, and every notice inviting persons to subscribe for shares, shall specify the date and the name of the parties to any contract which has been entered into by the company, or promoters, or Directors, or Trustees, before the issue of such prospectus, whether it is subject to adoption by the company or otherwise, and any prospectus or notice not specifying the same shall be deemed fraudulent on the part of such promoters or officers of the company issuing the same, unless any person taking shares shall have had notice of the contract. However, having regard to the extremely wide terms of the Act of 1867, it has been found practically impossible to enforce it in all cases, and that is the reason why what is known as the "waiver" clause came to be adopted. The "waiver" clause, which is reasonable, and inevitable in certain cases, has yet been used by those whose business it is to seek loopholes of escape in the Liability Company Law for the purpose of committing the grossest possible frauds. Suppose an unfortunate shareholder has sent an application for shares, subject to the conditions shown in the prospectus, if there is one provision which waives Section 38 of the Companies Act of 1867, when the shareholder has parted with his money, and it has been divided among a lot of plunderers, he will find he has signed away his right to recover. It is for this reason that in a Bill like this it would have been of practical utility if a clause had been included shutting the door to fraud, and I should have liked the Bill to have gone further in this regard. I feel that to proceed with any Motion to re-commit the Bill would have the very serious and deplorable result of gravely imperilling the Bill. I should be sorry to incur that responsibility, and, therefore, I shall not support the Motion for re-committal.

(1.26.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I think the course which has been adopted by the hon. Member (Mr. A. O'Connor) is one which will be taken by every Member who desires the success of the Bill. I should be very glad to see the Bill come into operation at once, but we have to consider whether we will carry this Bill or lose it, and I hope nobody who is friendly to the Bill will persist in Motions that will have the effect of delaying it, or imperilling its chances of passing into law. I am not quite sure whether the hon. Member opposite (Sir R. Lethbridge) proposed the Motion he has upon the Paper with a view to securing the success of the Bill—

*SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: The completeness of the Bill.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Yes; the completeness of the defeat of the Bill. It is always advisable to use words that will represent the true meaning of a proposal of this kind. People with any Parliamentary experience can read between the lines of Motions of this character, and I should say that the wiser course would be for those who desire the success of the Bill to support its Third Reading pure and simple, and reject all these Amendments. The hon. Member for Longford (Mr. T. Healy) and another hon. Friend of mine, who have had Amendments on the Paper on this subject, do not, I believe, intend to press them, for fear of losing the Bill altogether. I hope all the friends of the Bill will pursue a similar course, so that we may have a straight issue on the Third Reading, and give a final stroke to that which, I think, is a very necessary and useful piece of legislation.

*(1.30.) MR. J. R. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I am sincerely hopeful to see this Bill pass. I take a warm interest in the Bill, but when it was read a second time it commended itself far more to my judgment than as it now stands. Then it gave a certain right to bring actions, with a certainty of winning them in the case of fraud, for it included the "warranty" basis. I am surprised to hear the hon. Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) talk of the Bill having been thoroughly threshed out before the Standing Committee. I had not the good fortune to be a member of that Committee, though I tried to be placed on it. I look upon the Bill as one of the most important introduced by any private Member for years. There can be no doubt that the Bill was not properly threshed out by the Standing Committee, for three hours only in all were given to it there, and the original Bill was, in fact, never discussed. I believe if it had been properly discussed it would have been shown that the Bill is far from touching the great majority of frauds at present practised on the public. The hon. Member for the City of London (Sir R. N. Fowler) said the Bill was peculiar, as it has obtained the favour of all the lawyers in the House, and that that was a good reason why the House should look on it with grave suspicion. It is said that the Attorney General rejected the warranty; but the Attorney General in this matter did not act for the lawyers of the House, but as the mouthpiece of the Government. I am sorry the hon. Member in charge of the Bill cannot give us an assurance that he will endeavour to make the Bill operative from the present time. I wish to say one word with regard to the argument used by the hon. Member for North Kensington (Sir R. Lethbridge). He has quoted a paper which no doubt is exceedingly influential, and which, of course, never on any occasion has been directly or indirectly connected with any black-mailing. I would only say that that paper has a statement to-day which is intended to show that, so far from people having been plundered by companies at all, the result is that they have had their fortunes increased by them by something like 30 per cent. A friend of mine recently made some close calculations on the subject, and they showed, instead of a profit of 30 per cent., a loss of 25 per cent. to the investors. I believe that, inasmuch as he made a most careful investigation, his figures were alone trustworthy. I must say one word by way of warning. If hon. Members suppose that this Bill will put an end to company frauds they will be grievously disappointed. It is not by words in the prospectus that the principal frauds are perpetrated; it is by the system of underwriting and rigging the market. I was told the other day that there is no man in the City who knows his business who would not by far prefer a notice in the paper that letters of allotment and regret had been posted, followed by a notice that the shares had gone to a premium of 10 per cent., to the most cleverly drawn prospectus, bearing the best possible names. The fraud is not in the prospectus, but it is perpetrated afterwards, and by means, to no small extent, of the columns of the very pure financial papers. But I cannot be a party to jeopardising the interests of the Bill, and, under these circumstances, whilst acknowledging that it is so weak and poor that it may do little good, I feel bound to take the one course open to me, which, at any rate, will relieve me of any responsibility as to being associated with those men who have the slightest sympathy with the Directors and promoters of fraudulent companies; and it is because I wish most clearly and emphatically to state that I will not be associated with them in any manner that I feel it my duty to withdraw the clauses of which I have given notice.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question again proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

*(145.) Mr. J. M. MACLEAN (Oldham): We have now reached a stage when the principle of the Bill can be discussed. The hon. and learned Gentleman in charge of the Bill has rebuked us for the way the discussion has been carried on. He says the Bill has been discussed in Committee on three successive Wednesdays. The cause of that is that until now we have had no opportunity of discussing the principle of the Bill. It was read a second time at a late hour, when there were probably only a few Members present, and at once referred to a Grand Committee. I may point out, in regard to that, that the House is in utter ignorance of what was done in that Grand Committee; there is no record kept of the proceedings, of the Amendments moved, or the discussions on those Amendments. Various definitions have been given of the object of the Bill. I am not prepared to say that the time has not come when the whole condition of the law of Limited Liability should be reviewed by this House, but it is a matter that should be taken up by the Government of the day in a comprehensive spirit. We want to see that law consolidated and improved, and the whole subject considered in a fair spirit, so as to put Joint Stock enterprise on a sounder and better footing than it has been on before. I should have been delighted if the President of the Board of Trade had taken it in hand this Session, but he is apparently satisfied with doing nothing more than extend a benignant and patronising sympathy to this Bill. The hon. Member in charge of the Bill wants to prevent frauds being perpetrated by Directors upon shareholders, and he considers that the present law is not strong enough to protect shareholders. I should say that the Bill is one to enable shareholders to speculate without risk to themselves. The hon. Member for West Donegal told us what a scandalous thing it is that people should be asked to subscribe to certain undertakings, and then be asked to waive their right to examine the contracts of the company. But when a shareholder waives that right he knows perfectly well what he is doing. What is the practice in these matters as a rule? When a good thing is started, anybody who has any influence with any of the Directors almost goes down on his knees to get a large number of shares allotted to him, then if things do not turn out quite as they are expected to do, of course, there are some shareholders who are ready to get up and say that they have been thoroughly misled. But, as a rule, shareholders are perfectly fair towards Directors; they recognise that there must be some risk, and are prepared to stand their share in the loss. There is a great misunderstanding abroad as to the real relation between Directors and shareholders. The Director is supposed to be a Trustee, who has charge of all the money subscribed by many shareholders, and the promoters of this Bill, and those who wish for more stringent measures, come down and say that as Trustee he must be punished for any error in the management of those funds. The real position of a Director is not so much that of a Trustee as of a managing partner; the shareholders are associated with him in the enterprise, and they must bear their share of responsibility. Under the present state of the law, one of the highest authorities has said that no Director has been held responsible for an innocent mistake, unless it has been accompanied by a fraudulent intention. But the hon. and learned Gentleman proposes to change all that, and to say that for any perfectly innocent mistake, for any slight oversight or slip, in the prospectus, where there is no moral guilt to be brought home to the Director, the whole law shall be changed, and he and his whole fortune shall be held liable for any mistake that he and his co-Directors may have made. If there is to be a change in the law in matters of this kind, why not apply a similar change in the law to other professions? Let us take, for example, the profession of the law. Let us suppose, for instance, that a distinguished counsel—to use the language applied to Directors—a legal guinea pig, through a slight mistake, although he has pocketed his fees, has damaged or lost the case of his client, through, perhaps, being over-worked on the part of other clients, what an uproar there would be among the Bar of the United Kingdom if it were sought to make him answerable to the extent of his fortune for the damage sustained by his client. That is a parallel case to what we propose to do in the case of Directors. The Member for West Donegal spoke of the Bill as using the language that any person being responsible for “inaccurate and misleading” statements was liable, but that is not the fact. The Committee, thinking the word too strong, substituted the word “untrue” for “inaccurate,” so that the clause now reads—any untrue or misleading statement. If we could have the word “misleading” qualified by the phrase—deliberately or fraudulently made, then we would not object to the clause, but there is no definition of what is meant by misleading. A great philosopher, Coleridge, has said that before beginning a controversy we ought to make sure of our definitions, and having got these right you will go on safely afterwards. But here, in this House of Commons, we pass Bills without giving any clear definition of the terms used in them, and leave it to the House of Lords to interpret the language of our enactments. I could understand a Director being made liable if he makes intentionally an untrue statement, but the House of Commons is in this plight—it holds a Director liable for a statement which is misleading in fact and not in intention, that is to say, for an incorrect or inaccurate statement, although it has already refused to adopt the word “inaccurate,” in reference to the statements contained in a prospectus. Then the Bill places the onus of proof on the Director that he acted in good faith. The Director will have to convince the Judge and the Jury of the fact that he believed the statement in a prospectus was accurate at the time that he was a party to its being issued. There was a very important letter in the Times newspaper recently, which describes the result of the changes in the law which the hon. and learned Gentleman desires to make. The letter, signed by Mr. S. J. Wilde, a distinguished Parliamentary draftsman, is to this effect:—

“On reading the other day the Report of the Committee I have come to the conclusion that, if the Bill be passed, no prudent or responsible person can ever again safely join in issuing any prospectus, and the mischief lies in the word ‘reasonable,’ for who is to determine beforehand what a Court may deem ‘reasonable’? In my own case of Peek v. Derry, Mr. Justice Stirling, after carefully cross-examining all the defendants, was of opinion that we had reasonable cause for our belief that the statement in our prospectus was true. In the case of De Smisen v. Derry, on the same prospectus, Mr. Justice Mathew summed up very strongly in our favour, and the Jury concurred. On a new trial being granted in consequence of the decision of the Court of Appeal, Mr. Justice Hawkins, who also cross-examined all the defendants, not only said that we had reasonable ground for our belief, but, further, that, in his opinion, the statement as to power to use steam was true in fact. Yet the three Judges in the Court of Appeal decided in strong language that we had no reasonable ground for our belief.”

That just shows what a conflict of opinion may arise in Court if words of this kind are put into an Act, and I am sure, as Mr. Wilde says, that no person who has any large amount of money to lose will run the risk hereafter, if this Bill passes, of allowing his name to appear on a prospectus. That is a great fault I find with the Bill. So far as the object of the hon. and learned Member is concerned the Bill is childish and futile, but, on the other hand, it will do an immense amount of mischief in a direction I am sure its promoters do not wish it should. I have heard it said over and over again by hon. Gentlemen in these discussions that the men they want to get at are the “guinea-pigs,” the men who, Members of the House of Lords, or Commons, or others, give their names as Directors, in order to attract money from the public, do nothing, receive their fees, and have nothing to lose whatever may happen. Well, I think these wonderful gentlemen who are Directors of companies and receive fees, doing no work at all, are mere creations of hon. Gentlemen’s imaginations. I think any Director who does not do his share of work will soon be turned out of office by his fellow Directors; and I think that any Member of Parliament who associates himself with shady or bogus companies is likely soon to be sent to the rightabout by his constituents, and to lose, what Members value far more highly than any number of Directorships, a seat in this House. If that is the case, I think hon. Gentlemen may, with easy consciences, mind their own business, and leave the Directors to be dealt with by the constituents who send them here. However, the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman will not, so far as I can see, have the slightest effect in preventing reckless persons from hereafter accepting seats on Boards of direction of new companies. What does it matter to a man who has nothing to lose that he is liable to the extent of the whole of his fortune for what may happen? Cantabit vacuus. He will simply turn his pockets inside out, and laugh at a Legislature that passed such an idle, useless Bill. On the other hand, it has been pointed out by several men of business, who, for the first time have been able to take part in the discussion upon this Bill, for hitherto discussion has been confined to lawyers and men of sentiment—it has been pointed out by men of business to-day, who have taken part in the discussion, that nobody who has means and substance of his own will hereafter allow his name to appear on the prospectus of a Joint Stock Company. Well, there may be hon. Members who may say that this is a very good thing. There has been shown an amount of hostility to joint stock enterprise that has perfectly amazed me. We know the motives that induce attacks upon Directors, envy, malice, and disappointed greed, but attacks on the principle and working of limited liability spring from a much more serious source, from utter ignorance of the present conditions of society, and of the very important material and social changes worked by industrial enterprises under the principle of limited liability. I do not propose to quote statistics from the Financial News, to which my hon. Friend the Member for North Kensington (Sir Roper Lethbridge) has referred, but I could not understand the jeers at the fact that that newspaper has given some interesting figures to show the great value of the majority of the properties now quoted on the list of the Stock Exchange. That paper gave a list of 222 different companies, under a variety of heads, brewing, shipping, tramway, telegraph, financial trusts, a great variety of industrial and commercial undertakings, and these 222 companies represented an amount of subscribed capital of £113,000,000, and the market price to-day is £170,000,000 in round figures, showing an appreciation of nearly £57,000,000, or 50 per cent. as nearly as possible. When you get a Return of that sort on the survey of a very wide field and a large number of companies, you may fairly come to the conclusion that the principle of limited liability is working beneficially for the nation at large. But I will quote an authority who cannot be open to any of the suspicions which hon. Members feel in regard to the Financial News. I was looking the other day at an essay by Mr. Robert Giffen, and there will be no question, I think, that he is a high and an impartial authority. It is very difficult to give the figures as to the real amount invested in all the Limited Liability Companies existing, but Mr. Giffen attempts to get at it in this way. He takes the Income Tax Returns on the profits of companies at different periods, and then he estimates the capital by taking so many years' purchase of profits, as shown in the Income Tax Returns. He gets in this way a sum of £350,000,000 sterling invested in Joint Stock Companies in 1875, and he finds in 1885, the last year given in the essay, that the amount had nearly doubled, being £695,000,000—or say £700,000,000 sterling—all paying large profits, all assessed for Income Tax. Well, we all know that an immense stimulus has been given to Joint Stock enterprise in the few years since 1885, and I do not think it would be an unfair estimate to say that there must now be profitably invested in such undertakings money to the amount of £1,000,000,000 sterling. This is an enormous amount of capital to be brought together and invested in industrial and commercial enterprise, and I think it would be generally admitted by the public—for I do not agree with the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London (Sir R. Fowler) that there is any strong feeling in favour of this Bill outside the House, but, on the contrary, business men are alarmed and indignant at what is contemplated by the House of Commons—I think it will be admitted, and the feeling is shown everywhere by the way in which people rush to take up shares in the companies, that the action of limited liability has worked a great social revolution for the benefit mainly of the working classes. In relation to the working of the law of limited liability, I may mention that the Royal Commission on the Depression of Trade, in 1886, took evidence as to the effect of the system upon trade, and the only recommendations made were—that the bona fides of promoters should be as far as possible ensured, and that the fee for registration should be increased. These are practically the only recommendations, and we want to provide for the bona fides of promoters, but not to make them liable for unfortunate mistakes. As to the increase of the registration fee, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has taken up that suggestion very eagerly indeed, as was only natural, and I may point out that we owe a very large proportion of the increased revenue from stamps to the heavy taxation we have imposed on limited companies. It is a very great burden, in some respects a very unfair burden, to put on Limited Liability Companies; for, bear in mind, companies are formed to compete with great private employers of labour, and it is not fair that they should be taxed more heavily than their rivals. As a matter of fact, a great deal is now done by the authority of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to restrain the free employment of capital in these industrial enterprises. That is a mistaken policy, because in this same Report of the Royal Commission on the Depression of Trade this remarkable statement occurs:—

“There is no feature in the situation which we have been called upon to examine so satisfactory as the immense improvement which has taken place in the condition of the working classes during the last 20 years. While wages have risen, profits have fallen.”

I contend that this principle of limited liability has been of the very greatest value, has been one of the principal agents in bringing about this important result—a more general distribution of wealth among all classes engaged in developing the industrial resources of the country. In the old days, before limited liability, private employers concealed from the world the profits they were making. Working men knew nothing about this; employers might be making 100 per cent. profit, wages being kept down to a minimum all the time. Now, under the law of limited liability, requiring the publication of accounts from time to time, and with the periodical declaration of dividends, working men have every opportunity of knowing exactly what profits are made in the particular industry upon which they are employed, and directly they see that Capital is obtaining a larger rate of interest than they think it is entitled to, they at once come forward and demand a rise in wages, in order that they may have their share in the increased profits. I can speak from experience in my own constituency, where the law of limited liability has been applied with freedom, boldness, and success, making the town of Oldham one of the most prosperous in the country. The working classes have felt the greatest benefit from the system, and would resist any attempt on the part of this House to fetter the working of the law of limited liability. I feel obliged to the House for having listened to me so long. It is a subject in which I have felt the greatest interest for many years. So far as the Bill is concerned, I do not think it very much matters whether it passes or not, so far as Directors are concerned; but it will do, I believe, a very great deal of injury to the very important development that has taken place in our industry and commerce. It will make it almost impossible, I will not say for legitimate trade, but for that legitimate speculation which accompanies and gives fresh impulse to commercial prosperity, to be carried on. It is on that ground I move the rejection of the Bill, in the belief that it will restrain the fair freedom of speculation in the country, and that it will have a tendency to take the control of important joint stock enterprises out of the hands of substantial, honourable men, and throw it into the hands of needy, unscrupulous adventurers. I move, therefore, that the Bill be read a third time this day six months.

*(2.15.) MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman cannot now move that; he can vote against the Motion for Third Reading.

(2.31.) MR. W. MORRISON (York, W.R., Skipton): The Bill is, no doubt, based on good intentions, but these do not form a sound basis for legislation. I have observed that the hon. Members who advocate the passing of the Bill labour under a misapprehension of its scope. They seem to think it will only apply to companies registered after the passing of the Act, but, as a fact, it will also apply to all prospectuses and notices inviting the subscription of new capital issued by existing companies; indeed, there is no provision restricting its operation, and whether a company be prosperous or insolvent, however old established it may be, and however high may be the character of the Boards of Directors, it will come within the provisions of this Bill. Then, again, hon. Members advocate the Bill because they think it will suppress or materially reduce the class of Directors called "guinea pigs." I call a "guinea pig" a man who joins a Board of Directors for the sake of the fees, and has no substantial interest in the company. But the Bill will have little terror for the pure "guinea pig." He may have had his qualification found him by the promoters, or he may have found it himself, but he must be a gainer if the fees he receives amount to more than he invested in the company, while, if an action is brought against him in respect of his action as a Director, it does not matter to him for what sum judgment goes against him, because he cannot pay the amount, and the responsibility will be thrown on the Members of the Board who are not "guinea pigs." For my own part, I define the Bill as one for the encouragement of "guinea pigs." It is not necessary to argue as to the great advantages conferred upon the country by Limited Liability Companies, the capital of which is now larger than the National Debt, and is rapidly being paid off at a rate which, if continued for 61 years, will extinguish it. It must be admitted that it would be a serious matter to check this form of investiture for the savings of all classes of our countrymen, and it is important that heads of companies, present and future, shall be composed of men of substance and character, and if they have any administrative capacity, so much the better. It would be a serious matter if these men were driven off the Boards, and their places were taken by men who go on Boards for the sake of their fees. I do not so much object to the 3rd clause, which enacts that Directors shall be responsible for statements made by them in prospectuses or notices, and, indeed, I apprehend that is now the law. Still, even this part of the Bill bristles with obscurities and difficulties. The word "notice," for instance, is a very wide word indeed, and it is difficult to say to what it may not extend. This Bill applies to every prospectus and every notice. I apprehend that it would include verbal notices, possibly a conversation in the street, and that it would include a letter written in response to one from a shareholder inquiring about some proposed issue of new capital. It would also, I presume, apply to a speech made by a Director at a meeting of the company. It may be that at the meeting 20 reporters attend, and one of them makes a mistake—a perfectly honest one—on some material point. Yet, in the event of the company proving unsuccessful years afterwards, and the shareholders swearing that the words given in the inaccurate report were, in fact, used, the Director might be called upon to prove that he did not utter them. There is a great risk when the liability is unlimited, and this Bill will make Directors responsible to the last penny of their fortune. Then, the hon. Member for Oldham has very properly called attention to the vagueness of the word "misleading." I should have no objection to the phrase "calculated to mislead" but a statement might, as the Bill stands, be held to be "misleading," not because it was calculated to mislead a man of ordinary intelligence, but because a shareholder swore and persuaded a Jury that he had read it in a certain sense, and had been misled by it. But my most serious objection to this part of the Bill relates to the provision with respect to the guarantee by Boards of Directors of the statements of experts. It is pretty notorious that experts, especially civil engineers, are often mistaken in their calculations, both as to engineering difficulties and as to the probable cost of public works. Then Directors are to be bound to guarantee that a Report is made by the person whose name it bears. But it is possible that honest Directors may be the victims of some conspiracy on the part of persons in foreign countries, who pass off upon them a Report bearing a false signature. It has, indeed, been suggested that that difficulty could be overcome by requiring the signature of the expert to be attested by a British Consul. But there are many districts in which there is no British Consul, and it is no part of the duty of the British Consul to guarantee the signature of a civil engineer, whom possibly, moreover, he may not know. Besides, the signature of a British Consul might be forged to the attestation, as has been done in the past. Then, although a Board of Directors might take every care to assure themselves of the competence of a civil engineer resident in a foreign country, whom they might employ to report, it is possible that they may be mistaken. This Bill, however, makes Directors guarantee that they have made reasonable inquiry into the competency of a man employed by them. And I am afraid that when there is a discrepancy between the estimate of a civil engineer and the final cost of works, it would constitute a prima facie proof of the man's incompetency. Then, again, attention has been drawn to the words "inquiry and examination." I am at a loss to understand what is the meaning of "examination." It may be held that the Directors are bound to examine work done by the experts in other places, or it may be anticipated that they must put an engineer through such an examination as he would have to pass if he were a candidate for a place before the Civil Service Commissioners. Very possibly a Board might appoint an expert who afterwards turned out to have an interest in the property being sold at a high price. In that case the Board might be thought not to have shown reasonable diligence in ascertaining such a fact, and might be made answerable accordingly. The Bill actually provides that every person is to be made responsible to the utmost extent of his fortune if his name appears on a prospectus, unless he can prove that the name was put on the prospectus without his consent. Now, it is known not to be an uncommon thing for names to be put on prospectuses without the consent of the persons to whom they belong. Surely it is monstrous that a person should be called on years after to prove negatively that he never gave his consent. An hon. Member opposite has indeed said that on this matter we may trust to the common sense of the Judges. But it would hardly be creditable to us as legislators to rely on the Judges to give an interpretation to phrases we may have carelessly adopted in this House. It will be a serious thing for the country if we are to drive honourable and high-class men off the different Boards of Directors. I am afraid this Bill will have exactly the opposite effect intended by its promoters and supporters. If it should turn out that the better class of Directors refuse to join new Boards the consequences may be serious to us as a commercial nation. The formation of companies for the development of the resources of foreign countries may then pass from us to Berlin and Paris; and trade or the supply of railway plant or machinery for new undertakings will to a large extent follow the domicile of the new companies. I happen to be Chairman of a railway in South America. I am nearly the largest shareholder in it. It is a prosperous undertaking, and I know that we spent an enormous amount of money for railway material and plant in this country. Again, I have in my mind a company connected with the Argentine Republic. That company is domiciled in Paris, and I know that all its orders for rails and plant are placed in France. It is only natural, but it affords an argument for making this country the domicile of new companies. I do not apprehend that there will be an immediate exodus from the Boards of existing companies of the Directors who now sit upon them, but there may be such an exodus in consequence of the interpretation given to the Act, and I am afraid that men of character will be shy of joining Boards hereafter. Generally Directors are not guinea pigs, but honest and substantial men. This Bill will not put down fraud in the establishment or in the direction of existing companies or of new companies. Since attention has been called to the measure, the newspapers have shown how a clever man can run a coach and six through its provisions in half a dozen ways. The Bill will play into the hands of schemers at the expense of honourable and respectable men on the Boards of companies, and I am afraid that if it passes into law without serious alteration many of those who invest their money in companies will rue it.

*(3.55.) MR. JENNINGS (Stockport): I should like briefly to state the reasons which will induce me to vote for the Third Reading of this Bill. In the first place, I support it because I believe it will have a tendency to check the reckless speculation that goes on at the present time. The excessive and inordinate multiplication of Joint Stock Companies is a real injury to trade, and renders very difficult the legitimate enterprise of private firms. The Member for Oldham has said that in his own constituency the principle of limited liability is exceedingly successful. I should not like to contest any statement made by the hon. Member about his constituency, but I have read in journals of good information and authority that the percentage of profit among the Oldham Mills is exceedingly small—not much exceeding 3 per cent.—and that even this will not often bear close analysis and examination. Therefore, I contend that the excessive multiplication of Limited Liability Companies does harm to genuine trade, and if it is carried on as at present it will eventually sap the foundations of the old commercial industries of this country. Another reason for supporting the Bill is, that it will have a tendency, to some extent at any rate, to put a restraint upon Members of Parliament becoming Directors of public companies. I see no reasonable objection to Members of Parliament becoming Directors of companies if they stand in the position of the hon. Member who has just spoken, who says he is one of the largest shareholders in the company of which he is Chairman; but a Member of Parliament who is a Director of 10, 12, or 14 companies is not in that position, and is not able to devote such a degree of personal attention to the companies as will make him a useful and responsible Director. In these cases their names are used as a lure to induce the ignorant portion of the public to enter into speculations which often turn out disastrously. How can a man pay the requisite attention to his duties, not only as a Member of Parliament, but as a Director of 10, 12, or 14 companies? It is a sheer impossibility, and it threatens to be a considerable reproach to the House of Commons that some of its Members should thus enter wholesale into the Directorship business. Moreover, at the time of private business Members are frequently called on to decide questions materially affecting railway, mining, and other companies, and how is a man with a dozen fees in his pocket as Director in a position to consider these matters in the interest of the whole community? His opinion will naturally be influenced by considerations affecting the companies to which he belongs. That is a form of bribery which has been growing up in modern years. I suppose unless a man has capital he is not often asked to become a Director. I was never asked to become a Director until I was elected a Member of this House, but since I have been a Member I have often been asked to assume that position, not because of any qualification I possess, but because of my vote here. I do not see why a Member of Parliament should not be a Director of one, two, or three companies; but when it comes to 12 or 16, surely it passes the bounds of reason. Therefore, I confess that I look with gratification upon a Bill which I think must have a tendency to stop people from giving their names as Directors, in order that others may be enticed into speculations which after a time prove to be rotten. I must say I think the practice of modern years has been to assume that it is not wise on the part of a Member of the Ministry to become a Director. It is a good thing that Members of the Government should be free from any claims of that sort upon them. Therefore, it was with regret I noticed, in a list recently published, the name of one Minister who is a Director in seven companies. I look upon that as a great mistake. I venture to hope that the Bill will be passed, and that such defects as may be found in it will be corrected in another place. The Bill will have the effect, not of deterring men of honour from becoming Directors, but of deterring men who have no capital and who have no knowledge of business from lending their names to companies about which they know little, in order to allure people who know less.

*(3.25.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN Sir, the hon. Member (Mr. Maclean) gave us a long list of companies which had improved their position by something like 50 per cent., but he did not mention the hundreds and thousands which have come to utter ruin, and in which the shareholders have lost every farthing. I am not a man of sentiment nor a practising lawyer, such as has been described, but I have seen quite enough of these things to know that it is absolutely necessary that the law on this matter should be more stringent. I can assure my hon. Friend behind me that no honest and competent Director such as he is has anything whatsoever to fear from this Bill. In an able and ingenious speech he endeavoured to show that the Bill would bear hardly on honest men. But I think that I can show that his fear as regards one matter is absolutely unfounded. He supposes the case of a man having his name published as a Director without his knowledge, and that years afterwards he may be made liable. If he had looked at the Bill he would have seen that the Bill provides that if he can prove he never consented to become a Director, and that he never acted, that would make an end of his whole liability. There are three classes of directors. First of all the fraudulent—men guilty, if not of fraud, of such gross negligence as to be equivalent to fraud. As regards such men, I do not think this Bill is wanted. The law is quite strong enough to reach them, not only civilly, but criminally. Then, again, there are men who take Directorships who go into undertakings, because they are perfectly competent to act, and who take a large share in them. Such men have nothing to fear from this Bill. If I know anything of the English Bench of Judges I am certain that they would strain every point to relieve men who had taken every reasonable care to ascertain the truth of the representations made to them. But there is a third class of Directors, who I do not say enter upon undertakings with fraudulent intentions, but who, finding it difficult to make both ends meet, and "their poverty not their will consenting," go into the City and sell their names and titles in order that they may make an income. This is what happened to myself after I became a Member. One day I was sitting in my chambers when a gentleman, very much bejewelled, and wearing a hat which shone as I never saw a hat shine before, was introduced. He asked me to become a Director of a Law Bank. I informed him that I might know something of law, but that I knew very little of banking, which required an apprenticeship. He answered me that did not matter, and that all he wanted was my name, for that there were other Directors who would do the work. It is needless to say that I sent him about his business. But will anyone say that, if I had consented to his proposal, and the undertaking had proved rotten, I should not have deserved all the penalties which this Bill provides. The men whom this Bill is intended to hit are the men who lend their names to companies, simply because they will look well on the prospectus, and who know nothing of the undertakings into which they enter. If the Bill does hit them I think they have no reason whatever to complain. I am anxious to see this Bill read a third time, and any slight defects which are in it can be remedied in another place. I believe the Bill is an honest attempt to deal with a crying evil, and I do hope the House will allow it to pass.

(3.12.) MR. ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): Sir, I have listened to the arguments of hon. Members, and especially to those of the hon. Member for the Skipton Division of Yorks, all addressed to the point that this Bill will destroy the principle of limited liability, which has worked beneficially. Now, to my mind, if limited liability wanted anything to back it up, this Bill would do a great deal towards promoting what I may term the future stability of limited liability. Of late years I have been amazed at the number of rotten companies foisted on the public through people who have been graphically described as having "handles to their names which look well on a prospectus." A financial paper has been sent round to every hon. Member this morning, containing an article giving a list of bona fide companies, but carefully abstaining from giving a list of those companies in which people have lost their money. I find that the paper gives the total amount of money in such companies at a much higher figure than is given by Mr. Giffen, who has stated £70,000,000 to be the amount. I believe that the result of this Bill will be to cause men of sterling character and of wealth to go on the Boards of companies in which they have a substantial interest, and in which the public can have confidence. I am certain that will be the result. I am not altogether in favour of the Bill. I do not think it goes far enough, and I think it certainly ought to include others than the Directors who are concerned in the promotion of bogus companies. I gladly hail the introduction of the Bill, however, as being for the benefit of all classes. My hon. Friend the Member for Oldham stated that the Limited Liability Act was very much approved in his district. I have had a paper sent to me, from which I should like to read an extract, proving exactly the contrary. It goes so far as to say that through the introduction of so many Limited Liability Companies the trade of the locality has been impaired. In this article it says—

"At the end of 1889 Oldham shares stood on an average about 12½ per cent. discount taking good and bad together, this on £3,500,000 share capital is equal to £437,500. During the five years named the Lancashire Spinning Company has gone into liquidation with a loss to shareholders of over £112,000. The Abbey has done the same with a loss of over £35,000, and the Industry with a loss of over £45,000. These amounts added to the £437,500 give a total of £529,500. This is without taking into account loss of capital caused by re-construction of concerns. In one case alone this amounted to £40,000. The total loss from this cause cannot be far short of £100,000. The depreciated value of shares only has been taken into account in these cases. Thus we have on the one hand £567,945 gains against £629,500 losses to shareholders, which means that had shares been realised at the share list prices of December last the capital would then have been working five years for nothing, and sustained a loss of itself to the amount of £61,555, and this with the best mills and machinery and also the most efficient workpeople in the world."

This is taken from a reliable source, and I do not think that the argument of my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham (Mr. Maclean) is in any way supported. There is another matter on which I would say a word, namely, the section of the Limited Liability Act under which Directors can be formally sued. No doubt actions against Directors have been tried over and over again under this section, and I do not think they have in every instance succeeded, but I know of several instances in which Directors have been proceeded against and have had to pay heavy penalties for their wrongdoing. This Bill, however, is a great deal more drastic than the existing law, and will enable the public to take precautions such as they have never yet been able against those who try to cheat them out of their money. I shall most cordially vote for the Third Reading of this Bill, although I should have been glad if the hon. and learned Member in charge of the measure had introduced other persons besides Directors so as to render them amenable under the provisions of the Bill. In this respect I think the Bill might with advantage undergo a certain amount of re-construction; but as that is not the case, I do not intend to vote against it, believing that, as far as it goes, it will prove a great boon to the public, for which we all owe a debt of gratitude to the hon. and learned Gentleman.

*(3.18.) MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): This is a Bill which we are told is brought forward in the interests of morality, but I confess I do not see much evidence of morality in the Bill itself. The hon. and learned Gentleman who has brought forward the measure has indeed committed in regard to it the very offence for which, when committed in regard to a company's prospectus, he would render the Directors liable. What, I ask, is the impression given to the House of this Bill by him and his supporters? The hon. Member has himself, although of course quite unintentionally, made misleading statements with regard to it. I am not going to enter into a general argument of what a misleading statement is, but I remind the House that the hon. and learned Gentleman was supported the other day by another hon. and learned Member, the Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), whose whole speech was directed to this point, that the Bill was a Bill to convict Directors of fraud; and he did not attempt to show that the hon. and learned Gentleman was in error, although I feel convinced that if anyone had risen to order, you, Sir, would have ruled that the hon. and learned Gentleman was not in order in making that speech. It was evident that hon. and learned Members supporting this Bill regarded it as a very useful means of bringing grist to the mill of members of the Bar. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members say "Oh," but I assert that it is so, and I speak with some knowledge of the subject. I say it is a measure that will bring much grist to the lawyers' mill. Well, then, what is the idea produced outside of what the Bill does? I have in my hand an extract from one of the most respectable commercial papers of the day, which has published a highly moral article on the delinquencies of Members of Parliament who join Boards of Directors. That article congratulates the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Warmington) on his success in carrying through Committee of the House of Commons the Bill which he has introduced, and it goes on to say—

"It is a fundamental principle of the Bill that punishment shall only follow where, and in so far as, the shareholders of a company suffer loss arising from either fraud or culpable negligence."

Is this true? Nothing of the kind. Fraud and culpable negligence in the representations of a prospectus are already provided for by the Common Law. This has been laid down by the highest legal authority of the land. It has been laid down by all the tribunals of the country, and sanctioned by a decision of the House of Lords, that

"In an action of deceit, fraud is proved when it is shown that a false representation has been made knowingly, or without belief in its truth, or recklessly without caring whether it be true or false. A false statement made through carelessness and without reasonable ground for believing it to be true may be evidence of fraud, but does not necessarily amount to fraud. Such a statement, if made in the honest belief that it is true, is not fraudulent, and does not render the person making it liable to an action for deceit."

Under these circumstances the Director is exempt under the existing law. But this Bill intends to carry the law of personal liability of Directors a great deal further, and to turn mere inadvertence into crime? But, if Directors, why not others also? I would ask if you are going to make a Director, why not also a barrister, liable for an honest misrepresentation such as he may make in the conduct of his client's case, simply because he has received for work done a few paltry fees? If that is the intention of the House the whole law of deceit should be altered and made applicable to every class. Why should not brokers, bankers, and merchants, who inadvertently make mis-statements, honestly believing them to be true, be rendered liable under this law in the same way as Directors. Why is this drastic provision to be made applicable to one set of persons, while the rest of the mercantile world is left untouched. The hon. Member for Stepney (Mr. Wootton Isaacson) has referred to a list of companies, showing an enormous amount of depreciation. He asserted that £180,000,000 of money has been lost in bogus companies. Why, Sir, the loss of £180,000,000 would have produced such an effect as has never been witnessed in this country from time immemorial. It may be that £180,000,000 is the total figure of the nominal, but not the real, share capital of companies which have not been successful; but if you examine into the matter, I think it will be found that the amount of loss sustained has been considerably exaggerated, and that when these bogus companies are wound up the actual money capital lost is but a few thousands, and in some cases a few hundreds each. We all know that the "galled jade winces," and that the man or woman who is heavily hit screams out much louder than the thousands who are reaping a regular profit. I ask hon. Members: how far is it proposed to carry the principle of this Bill? The Bill is one for the abolition of the principle of caveat emptor, and will enable careless and thoughtless individuals who read prospectuses promising high percentages to put their money into concerns without thought or examination, take their profit if they can "stag" their shares, and if they do not succeed become a perpetual worry to the Directors—they mark out a good man, and say, "If I can't make him liable I will pursue him to the day of his death with litigation." We know that worries of this kind are worse than verdicts in Law Courts. This is a Bill for the manufacture of litigation. Moreover, it sweeps all into one net of condemnation, and draws no distinction between the Director, the banker, the solicitor, the barrister—who is an expert and settles the prospectus invariably—the accountant, and the promoter, although the real responsibility as between those classes of persons and the promoter is vastly different. The Director does not—or he cannot legally or properly—take anything beyond the remuneration prescribed by the printed Articles of Association, or by vote of the shareholders, for his additional trouble and responsibility, including the responsibility of the prospectus. He cannot do so unless it is stated in the printed Articles of Association. That is clear; and all the Director can demand are fees for his attendance after, and not before or during, the issuing of the prospectus. But the promoter or the vendor is the founder of the company; he is the person who makes the large profit; and he is the person who ought to be made responsible for statements made in the prospectus for the purpose of launching the enterprise. I do not say that Directors should be exempted from all liability. They should be made liable for culpable negligence, and are so by the existing law. I do not care to what extent they are made liable for that, as it ought to be regarded as fraud, which in fact it is. But I do think that in a Bill giving a subscriber the right to recover, you ought to discriminate, as regards degree and proportion, the liability between the parties who have contributed to mis-statements according to their culpability. In the case of the admission of an inaccurate statement on the part of an engineer, or a reckless statement on the part of a Director, it cannot be said that that would be a grave charge, or one that ought to involve the same pecuniary liability as an intentional mis-statement on the part of a promoter. We ought to draw a distinction between a Director who, though honest, has by carelessness been led into a mistake, and a Director or promoter who deliberately gets the plunder out of a company by fraud. But besides the remedy which the Common Law gives in the case of fraud and culpable negligence, other remedies are given under the Companies Acts of 1862 and 1867. The former Act gives a remedy against any Director who by misfeasance or culpable negligence, loses a company's money, and it summarily calls on him to supply the money so lost; and under the latter Act referred to by the hon. Member for Donegal, Section 38, there is a distinct penalty for fraud imposed on every Director, promoter, or officer of a company issuing a prospectus from which particulars of contracts are omitted, whether the contracts are adopted by the company or not. I consider that the hon. Member in charge of the Bill has somewhat misled the House by neglecting to point out the extent to which the measure will alter the existing law. If he will point that out, I have no hesitation in saying that he will show that we shall be landed in endless confusion if we pass it, as the law will be utterly unconstruable when the Bill is read side by side with the existing law. When the Bill comes to be considered by the judicial minds of the House of Lords—assuming that it passes this House—I shall be exceedingly surprised if they do not, whilst giving the Commons credit for the best motives, declare that the measure is badly-constructed, and is one which, if placed on the Statute Book, would be constantly coming before the Judges to have legal constructions put upon it at the expense of the public.

*(3.41.) SIR C. RUSSELL (Hackney, S.): I take an entirely different view of the Bill to that of the hon. Member who has just sat down, and I do not think he gives himself credit for the amount of intelligence which I know he possesses when he tells us that he does not clearly understand the provisions of the Bill. I do not propose to follow the hon. Member into the somewhat discursive matters referred to in his speech, but I wish to remind the House of what is the principle of the Bill, and then to ask whether there is anything in the application of that principle repugnant to good sense and to honest fair dealing. The principle of the Bill is that a man shall be responsible for the statement which he makes in order to induce others to act upon that statement. Is there anything repugnant to common sense in that principle? Why is not a man to be held responsible for the assurances that he is party to putting before the public in order to induce members of that public to embark their moneys in his speculative or commercial undertakings? But it may be said that a man may have committed himself to a statement which he honestly believed to be true, and which he had taken some reasonable pains to inform himself about, and that it would be very hard, in such a case, that he should be made, civilly or otherwise, responsible for the mis-statement he honestly made, and which he was led into making without any culpability on his part. I agree that that would be very hard. But it is not what the Bill provides. The Bill deals with two classes of statements. It deals entirely with statements which are put forward to the public with the view of inducing members of the public to subscribe for shares, debentures, or Debenture Stock of a company, and it restricts the application of the Act, first, to persons who are Directors, or who are named as parties to be Directors; and, secondly, it includes persons who have authorised, or who are responsible for, the issue of a prospectus or notice.

*SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: What if the name does not appear on the prospectus?

*SIR C. RUSSELL: It is a question of fact which has to be established, like all statements of fact, by evidence. What are the safeguards? A man is challenged for having been party to putting before the public a statement which proves to be untrue. Now, that statement may be either one of two things. It may be a statement which purports to come from an expert. The Bill in that case provides that a person prima facie putting forward a statement of an expert shall not be responsible for the untruth of that expert's statement, provided he has taken reasonable pains to inform himself as to the grounds on which it has been put forward. Is that too much to expect? Surely not. Then there is a second class of statement—a statement, coming, not from an expert, but from those who are issuing the prospectus, as to the position and working of the particular enterprise, or any other important facts bearing upon its probable success or non-success. What is the protection in that case? It is as clear as it can be; there is no liability attaching to the promoter, Director, or other person putting forward any such statement provided he has made reasonable inquiry and has reasonable ground to believe it. I maintain, therefore, that there is a sufficient mantle of protection thrown over the action of honest men, and there is a very important safeguard to the public injuriously affected by the action of culpably careless and negligent men. I was rather surprised to hear the exaggerated language used in the Debates on the Bill, and to hear it stated that the effect of it would be to injure the operation of Acts which I admit to have been, on the whole, beneficial—I mean the Joint Stock Acts. The Bill, however, will teach men—many of whom are in this House—more, perhaps, than there ought to be—and many who are outside this House—who have carelessly, I will not say from any dishonest design, assumed a position which they ought never to have assumed—a position in which they have allowed themselves to be nominated, and to lend their name and reputation to enterprises of which they know little or nothing, and which turn out to be of a doubtful character.

*(3.48.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I had not the pleasure of listening to the whole of the speech of the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Jennings), but that portion of it which I did hear I heartily endorse with regard to the temptations that are held out to Members of this House to join the Boards of Directors of companies. There are few poorer men in this House than myself, and though before I had the privilege of a seat in this House I was never invited to become a Director of any company, since I have been here I have been offered a seat on the Board of a Joint Stock Company, the inducement held out to me to join being that the emoluments of a Director were £200 a year, and that the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy had already given his sanction and approval to the scheme. [Laughter.] The House will learn, if it will permit me to continue, that the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy had done nothing of the kind. It was an infamous fabrication on the part of the promoters of that scheme. I was rather too cautious to fall at once into the trap, and I waited until I saw the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy. I asked him, knowing that he was an exceedingly cautious man—and that he came from that part of the United Kingdom where men are said to be more cautious than any others—how it was that he could lend his name to such a company, and he expressed his astonishment, and said he had never heard of the company. I then saw that I had been right in exercising caution, and in not replying to the communication. Is it right that temptations of this kind should be put in the way of poor Members of this House? I have heard it stated that there are Members of this House who are Directors in 16 or 17 companies. For my own part, I think that it would be best to commence by paying the Members of this House, and then to prohibit them from identifying themselves with companies of the character of that to which I have just referred, and thus to protect the British public from being gulled and humbugged into the belief that such companies are honest and bonâ fide ones. I believe that this measure is a healthy step in the right direction; and although I should like to see it made more drastic and its scope enlarged, I shall most heartily vote for the Third Reading.

*(3.53.) Mr. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge): As one of the Members of the Grand Committee to whom this Bill was referred, while I entirely sympathise with its object, I must oppose the measure, because I think it will have the opposite effect to that which is intended, and, instead of bringing honest and respectable men on to the Boards of these companies, it will have the effect of driving them away. One of the greatest safeguards for the companies is that men of good standing and means should join these Boards; but if this Bill passes, no man of character will in the future join them. In the future the greater part of the trade of this country will come to be conducted by Joint Stock Companies, and therefore Parliament ought to adopt the course of strengthening the Boards of such companies instead of passing measures of this kind, which will tend to drive away from them men of good position and of known honesty. The hon. Member for Stepney says that £180,000,000 has been lost in these Joint Stock Companies, but Professor Leone Levi has put the amount at only £55,000,000.

Mr. ISAACSON: Professor Leone Levi based his calculations on a much shorter period than that I have taken.

*Mr. DIXON-HARTLAND: In any case, the hon. Member must have taken it for granted that the whole capital of the companies which have failed has been paid up, and also taken into account companies which, although they may not be paying dividends just now, are gradually improving their position, and will probably eventually become prosperous concerns. Companies which at first have to struggle, but eventually become successful, cannot be called bogus companies. If the Bill is passed it will introduce an entirely new principle into the law, as the burden of proof will be transferred from the plaintiff to the defendant. At present when a case is tried the plaintiff has to prove that he has been injured by some mis-statement on the part of a Director, but under the Bill, if there is a mis-statement, the Director has to prove his innocence, which will be a condition of things which will prevent respectable people from becoming Directors. In England, the presumption of the law has always been that a man is innocent until proved to be guilty, and that presumption should hold in the case of Directors of companies. Do hon. Members who support this Bill believe that it is in the power of the House of Commons to protect, by legislation, those people who are grasping at a high interest? The measure will be inoperative as far as rogues and dishonest men are concerned, and it will only deter honest and respectable men from joining these Boards.

(4.1.) Mr. FLYNN (Cork, N.): All the arguments against this Bill seem to assume that it is directed against the principle of Limited Liability Companies. I take it, however, that the Bill is directed, not against that principle, but against scoundrels, and abuses which have become notoriously frequent of late. The hon. Member for Haggerston has given the House his experience in this case, and I dare say that the majority of Members of this House have had similar temptations held out to them by companies not formed on an honest or bonâ fide basis. The hon. Member who has just sat down says the Bill will operate to the advantage of people who are on the look out for interest, but surely that is what the House is constantly doing. The Bill will diminish the temptations placed in the way of ignorant and inexperienced people, who are deluded by artfully drawn prospectuses, and for that I maintain that the hon. Member who is in charge of the measure is entitled to the thanks of the entire community. As to the statement of the hon. Member for Oldham, that the House was left in darkness as to the meaning of the Bill owing to the fact that the decision on the Second Reading was taken late at night, I would remind the House that by reason of the way in which Private Bills have now to be dealt with private Members are obliged to get them through in the best way they can—openly if possible, but if not by stratagem. I regret that the measure is not of wider scope. We have all had experience of the large number of companies which are annually floated, principally in London, and those who know anything of them see that they are absolutely nothing but traps for ensnaring the money of the public. In my opinion this measure has been amply discussed, and I shall vote in its favour.

(4.7.) SIR G. HUNTER (Hackney, Central): I intend to oppose the Bill, because I believe it to be a monstrous one, for the reason that after it becomes law no man of standing or of substance will dare to become a Director, while the provisions of the measure will not tend to prevent fraud in any way. Hon. Members of this House are asked to join companies which no honest man would care to associate his name with; but I can inform the hon. Member for Haggerston that it is easier to get a seat in this House than to get a seat on a good Board of Directors of a sound company.

*(4.9.) MR. C. GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I intend to support this Bill, on the ground that it will make the promotion of these Joint Stock Companies more difficult than it is at present, and so prevent the burden of the dividend-paying working man from being increased in the future. I will not go into the personal aspect of the case—as to whether Members of this House join Boards of Directors rashly. I do not know whether that is the case; but if it is, I do not wish to be oppressed here by the grunting of innumerable swine, even although they are of Guinea. In the House of Commons one would rather expect to sit amongst choice company; and as every Joint Stock Company, no matter how honest or dishonest in its inception, is in the nature of gambling, and as in the House of Commons we might at least sit “unelbowed by a gamester, pimp, or player,” I shall support the Bill.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*(4.22.) DR. FITZGERALD (Longford, S.): The 6th clause, which I now propose to omit, seeks to abolish the power of the Society called the Pharmaceutical Society of Ireland, and to replace the Society by a very different body of persons. This is done for reasons which I suppose will be explained by the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton), who, I regret, is one of the principal supporters of the Bill, and without whose powerful aid the Bill would not have had the least chance of passing. The Pharmaceutical Society of Ireland was established by Act of Parliament for the specific purpose of the education and training and examination of a body of men who were to dispense medical prescriptions, and otherwise deal in poisons and keep open shops for the sale of drugs in general. This was a small body, and they carried out their professional purpose to the letter of the law. It has never been charged against them that they have done any illegal act, either collectively or individually, as members of the Society; but who are the other persons whom my hon. Friend wishes to endow with the particular claim of this Society to dispense poisons and deal in drugs. They are a body of men of whom many have been pronounced by Judges to have been guilty of illegal practices, and some have been visited with severe penalties in consequence. I have the disadvantage of having to speak before my hon. Friend (Mr. Sexton), and I do not know what will be the contention of my hon. Friend why these 3,000 men, who have been acting in defiance of the law, should now have their actions legalised. I cannot by anticipation say what blandishments my hon. Friend may use on behalf of this body of men. Perhaps my hon. Friend may say that the number of qualified chemists in Ireland are too small a body of men, and do not live in those remote districts in which it is necessary to obtain these poisons and medicines; but will he contend that because in some districts in Ireland and Scotland persons have to go from 14 to 20 miles for a doctor, and because in these districts there are a certain number of old ladies with whom my hon. Friend is very well acquainted, who are called "knowledgeable old women," who think they know more of medicine than all the doctors, will my hon. Friend be ready to qualify these interesting old dames as M.D.'s and Fellows of the College of Surgeons? I do not know what arguments my hon. Friend may put forward to support the claims of these men, whom he seeks to put in the place of qualified chemists, except an unaccountable craving among persons in the North of Ireland to poison themselves and everybody else. If this clause passes we must be prepared to find in the shops of small general dealers, side by side on one shelf, to be sold by men who have had no practical training, oxalic acid and washing soda, arsenic and baking powder. I cannot but think my hon. Friend is influenced by this particular class of traders within his own constituency, and that is natural, perhaps, on his part; but I cannot foresee upon what plea the Attorney General for Ireland will support this claim. My hon. Friend may introduce some statistics to the House in order to further the claims of these persons in the North of Ireland. I am quite prepared, should I ever arrive at a more exalted place, to find my hon. Friend demonstrating to archangels, upon incontrovertible statistics, that the electors of West Belfast ought really to have all the front places. But I do not think the House of Commons will be persuaded by any statistics to-day to do what, to my mind, will be a very dangerous thing—to legalise the acts of unqualified men who have continued to trade in defiance of the law. I do not think that all the legal acumen of the Attorney General for Ireland will persuade this House to allow these persons, who have had no experience whatever in dealing with these drugs, to mix up these things with the food of the people in their shops. On these considerations I move the omission of a clause for which I do not think my hon. Friend can have much to urge.

Amendment proposed, to leave out Clause 6.—(Dr. Fitzgerald.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'every chemist and druggist' stand part of the Bill."

(4.35.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I understood my hon. Friend was about to move the insertion of the words "and styling himself as such," of which he has given notice. He has certainly dealt with a simple point, in an eloquent and amusing speech, in defence of the Pharmaceutical Society. I can assure my hon. Friend that the Society will still remain the Governing Body in all matters connected with the Bill; we only propose that these chemists and druggists shall elect seven members on the Board, and the Society will still have 14, or two-thirds of the governing power. The English Pharmacy Act had the effect of establishing two bodies, the Pharmaceutical Society and the body of chemists and druggists. Members have been appointed upon different examinations, and these two bodies have pursued their respective functions in a manner satisfactory and convenient to the public. But, unfortunately, the powers given to the Pharmaceutical Society of Ireland under the Act of 1875 to create a second grade of chemists have remained unused. The Society have excluded from the provisions of that Act all those who are not members of the Society. The Council by their culpable inaction have omitted to create a second grade of chemists and druggists, and the consequence is that, except in the larger towns, such as Dublin, Belfast, and Cork, duly qualified chemists are not found, and to supply the public need there has sprung up a class of traders, numbering now some 2,000 or 3,000, who, in different parts of the country, supply such drugs and medicines as farmers and others may require for their families, or for their cattle, at a more reasonable rate than if the trade remained in the sole possession of the pharmaceutical chemists. It is obviously unfair that these persons who have come into the trade in consequence of the default of the Council should be driven from the trade. The main portion of their business is the supply of drugs, sometimes of a poisonous nature, to farmers, for use in regard to cattle; and the efforts of the Pharmaceutical Society have been directed to prevent such sales, with the result that a man has been fined £5 for selling a pennyworth of laudanum, though the sale was conducted in strict conformity with all the precautions required. The Magistrates, while inflicting the penalty, said they greatly regretted and condemned the state of the law that obliged them to enforce the fine. This is a condition of things which should not be allowed to continue. What I propose is that those who have been in the trade since 1875 should be allowed to be registered as qualified. I am willing that hereafter there shall be examinations, but those who have conducted business, hitherto, with great convenience to the public and without casualty of any kind, should retain their position. My hon. Friend represents a constituency of farmers. Can he maintain that a farmer of Longford who requires to purchase some substance necessary for the treatment of his horses, cattle, sheep, or pigs, shall write to Dublin, Belfast or Cork, and, after long delay, pay double price for the article? I trust my hon. Friend will not persist in his Amendment.

*(4.40.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): The hon. Member who has moved the Amendment has expressed some curiosity to know upon what ground I could support a Bill in the interests of certain persons whom he represents as breakers of the law; but I support the Bill not in the interest of such a class, but in the interest of the general public. A great public want has been proved to exist, and it is no answer to a Bill which proposes to supply that want to say that certain persons are supplying the want in a manner by which they have rendered themselves obnoxious to the law. That is the manner in which the subject presents itself to my mind. I need not detain the House, because the hon. Member for West Belfast has clearly and accurately stated how the present state of things has arisen since the Act of 1875. I do not enter into motives; but, as a matter of fact, the Pharmaceutical Society have not availed themselves of the powers conferred upon them by the Act of 1875 to create another grade of chemists and druggists, and so this legislation is necessary. As has been pointed out, there are substances used in veterinary medicine which are more or less poisonous in their character, and those compounds are largely required all over the country; to say, for instance, that the poisonous compound known as sheep-wash shall only be purchased of one of the few pharmaceutical chemists in the country is, in my opinion, an absurd state of the law.

(4.41.) DR. FITZGERALD: I am content to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, Clause 6, lines 27 and 28, to leave out "half-a-guinea," and insert "one guinea."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. SEXTON: At the end of Clause 6, I propose to add the sub-section transferred from the end of Clause 7. It will be observed that, appearing where it does, the sub-section is out of place. Clause 7 provides for examinations of various persons, and the sub-section provides for a class of persons who are not to be subject to examinations, and, therefore, should take its place at the end of Clause 6.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 6, page 2, after line 28, insert the following sub-section:—

"(4.) A person who has, prior to the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-nine, served as an assistant or apprentice and assistant for a full period of seven years to a chemist and druggist who has registered under this Act, or who, had he survived or continued in business, would have been entitled to register under this Act, shall be entitled to be registered as a chemist and druggist without examination on complying with the other provisions of this section."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. SEXTON: I may explain that as Clause 7 stands, it provides that every person who goes into business after the 1st January shall be subject to certain examinations, but it might be doubtful if he would be so subject if he goes into business after the passing of the Act, and this Amendment is to make the drafting clear.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 7, page 2, line 32, to leave out "and before the passing of this Act."

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made, in Clause 7, page 2, line 34, after the word "become," to insert the words "or who, had he survived or continued in business, would have been entitled to become."—(Mr. Sexton.)

MR. SEXTON: It is a fact that it would be unfair for a person who has failed at the first examination that he should present himself for re-examination without payment at any time whatever, and so I propose to insert the limit of 12 months.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 7, page 3, line 14, at end, to insert the words, "within twelve months."

Amendment agreed to.

Other Amendments made.

Bill to be read the third time tomorrow.

PAUPER LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND)
(OFFICERS SUPERANNUATION)
BILL.—(No. 353.)

(5.10.) MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, W.): I hope the House will be good enough to allow the Third Reading of this Bill.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I am sorry to do anything to obstruct the passage of this Bill, but to my mind it does not go quite far enough, and I therefore propose to move the omission from Clause 3 of the words "whose whole time has been devoted to the service of such asylum." Now, this Bill proposes to impose taxation on the country for the benefit of certain classes of people connected with lunatic asylums, but it does not include clergymen or doctors who attend to the unfortunate inmates of these institutions. I cannot see any reason for such exclusion, and, therefore, I move the Amendment, the adoption of which will secure the end I have in view, while it will leave it with the Governors to decide whether a clergyman or a doctor, who has spent many years among these poor creatures in asylums, shall have a superannuation allowance. I hope the hon. Member in charge of the Bill will accept this Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, lines 11 and 12, to leave out the words "whose whole time has been devoted to the service of such asylum."—(Mr. Crilly.)

(5.14.) MR. JOHNSTON: This matter has been discussed on previous occasions, and though I agree with the hon. Member that there is much to be said in favour of the proposal, yet I cannot accept the Amendment, because those who give only a portion of their time to the service of an institution cannot be said to stand on the same footing as those whose whole time is devoted to the work.

(5.15.) MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): This Bill is not a compulsory one. It merely gives the Board of Governors power, under certain circumstances, to give increased pensions. I think the minimum of service is 15 years, and it strikes me that the surgeons and chaplains who hold the appointments in these institutions would never come within the scope of the Bill, for they do not put in anything like 15 years' service. Their average runs from five to eight years. Now, the object of the Bill is to assimilate the law in Ireland to that in England. In the latter country pensions are not given to those who only render partial or casual service, and if, by this Amendment, you introduce a new disparity into the law, you will defeat the purpose of this Bill.

(5.18.) MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I am not disposed to agree with the arguments of the hon. Member who last spoke. In my opinion, if you deviate from the law of England in this respect you will set an example which may be followed hereafter in England with very beneficial results. I do not see why a clergyman who has spent 15 or 20 years in such a service as this should not be entitled to a pension. I think it grossly unjust to exclude such cases. I am in entire sympathy with the objects of the Bill, and have no wish to delay it passing into law, but I do think the Amendment should be accepted, and, if it is, I have no fear that the House of Lords will take it upon themselves to throw out the Bill.

(5.20.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I hope that my hon. Friend will press this Motion to a Division, and I do think the hon. Member for South Belfast ought to assent to so reasonable a proposition. If it is carried it will remain within the discretion of Boards of Governors either to grant or to refuse superannuation allowances in these cases. The present state of law presses very hardly upon Roman Catholic clergymen. Again, many doctors who have but a small private practice, remain for a long period of years attached to asylums, and render very valuable service. Why should they not be entitled to superannuation allowances? I know, too, a case in which a Roman Catholic clergyman, attached to a large district asylum, complains that the salary he at present receives is not sufficient to cover his car hire. This man is performing onerous and responsible duties at an actual pecuniary loss to himself; he has occupied his post for many years, and yet this Bill will disentitle him to a pension. Surely if one class of officials attached to an asylum is entitled to a pension all classes should be put on the same footing.

(5.25.) MR. STOREY (Sunderland): This is a Bill providing for additional superannuations, and the object of the Amendment is to enlarge the scope of the measure still further. To judge from the discussion which has been going on for the last half hour, one would think that hon. Members of this House were in favour of using public money for this purpose. Now, I am utterly opposed to the whole principle of this Bill, and I shall vote not only against the Amendment, but also against the Bill itself. This money is to be taken out of the pockets of the ratepayers of Ireland, and what control, I will ask, have the ratepayers over the Grand Juries, which will have the distribution of it? Apart from the general question, when we come to the specific Amendment I think we English Radicals have a right to feel annoyed that that should have been proposed. One has good reason to object as a matter of common sense, I mean Parliamentary common sense, which is very different from ordinary common sense.

Mr. JOHNSTON rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but Mr. SPEAKER withheld his assent, and declined then to put the Question.

Debate resumed.

MR. STOREY: I am obliged to the hon. Member. What is the question before the House? It is a common sense proposal to give superannuation allowances only to those who have given the whole of their time and their duties in connection with the asylums.

MR. W. JOHNSTON: The Bill comes from the other side of the House.

MR. STOREY: Then I withdraw the compliment I was about to pay the hon. Member. I cannot understand a proposal to superannuate a man who has been only partially engaged.

*(5.30.) MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

It being half-past Five of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed to-morrow.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

On the Motion for adjournment:—

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether the Scotch Police Bill will be taken to-morrow; and, if so, whether it will be early or late on the list?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): No, Sir; I do not think the Scotch Police Bill will be reached to-morrow. The Army Estimates will be the main business.

MR. CLANCY: Will there be any opportunity in the Debate on the Estimates of discussing the Railways Purchase Bill?

MR. JACKSON: There will, I apprehend, be some opportunity when we reach the Bill, and when the sum is taken for the purchase.

MR. CLANCY: Is that the sum of £50,000?

MR. JACKSON: Yes.

MR. SEXTON: I hope the Government will find it convenient, as well as constitutional, to delay the final sanction to the Bill.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): As the Motions on the Paper are likely to be somewhat confusing, will the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury inform the House in what order the Army Estimates are to be taken?

MR. JACKSON: Yes, Sir; Vote 5 is the first group and Vote 10 is the second group of Army Estimates, and for the convenience of the House, and for the purpose of affording an opportunity of discussing at the same time the Report of the Royal Commission, of which the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale was Chairman, it has been arranged to take Vote 10 the Army Estimates and Vote 12 the Navy Estimates together, so that hon. Members will have an opportunity of discussing questions both of the Army and the Navy. The subsequent notice which appears on the Paper was put down in order to give the House a clear understanding as to what would be the next Vote taken after the Vote to which I have referred.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Are we to understand that the Army Votes and the Navy Votes will be before the Committee simultaneously?

MR. JACKSON: Yes, Sir.

MR. STOREY: Can the right hon. Gentleman state what business will be taken on Friday?

MR. JACKSON: I cannot say.

MR. STOREY: Will it be other business than the Estimates?

MR. JACKSON: I am unable to say.

MR. BRYCE: Can the right hon. Gentleman state when the Scotch Police Bill will be taken?

MR. JACKSON: I am not in a position to say now.

House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 3rd July, 1890.

LORD CARBERY.

Petition of William Charles Baron Carbery in the Peerage of Ireland, for leave to amend his petition, claiming a right to vote at the elections of Representative Peers for Ireland (presented on the 22nd of May last); read and referred to the Lord Chancellor.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING ACTS AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 122.)

Returned from the Commons with the amendment agreed to.

COMPANIES (MEMORANDUM OF ASSOCIATION) BILL.—(No. 110.)

House in Committee (on re commitment) (according to order).

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I have only a few words to say in explanation of my now moving the Amendments which appear on the Paper. The fact is, that those Amendments were only delivered at 3.40. p.m. on the day on which the Committee met, and the result was that neither I nor the noble Lord who is in charge of the Bill had the opportunity of dealing with them, or I should have done in Committee what I propose now to do in your Lordships' House. I hope that these Amendments, together with those which are proposed by my noble Friends, will bring the Bill more into harmony with the Bill as it came from the other House. A practically new Bill would, I think, be in peril of not passing into law, which, I am sure your Lordships will agree, would be a matter of regret. I thought it right to explain that, because I should be very sorry if it should be supposed I am doing anything to impair the efficiency of the Grand Committees, or that would be disrespectful either to the Committee or to my noble Friends, who have taken great pains to put the Bill into shape.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, of course the Amendments which are proposed by my noble and learned Friend will be carefully considered, but I feel bound to say a word or two with regard to what my noble Friend has just said. The truth is, that when this Bill came from the House of Commons, it was in many respects rather a sketch of a Bill than a Bill. There has been no single word introduced into it in this House which has been intended in the slightest degree to affect its principle or its scope. The only object has been to make a perfect machinery where, before, a very imperfect machinery existed, and to remove the probability of difficulties and litigation, where, according to the judgment of many, those probabilities were before very great. I must confess I cannot myself think so badly of the House of Commons as for a moment to suppose that when a Bill of this sort goes back to them, with no single principle interfered with, but only the machinery made more effectual, they will dream of rejecting the Bill simply because it is made rather longer than when it left that House. Of course, if we had altered the scope of the Bill, or in any way made it a different measure in that sense to that which it was before, I could understand the view taken of it by my noble and learned Friend and those who take the same view; but unless they can show either that those provisions are unnecessary, or will be mischievous in their effect, I cannot believe that the House of Commons will reject the Bill simply because it has been made a better one in respect of its machinery.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I think the language of Clause 1 becomes extremely awkward and inconvenient unless the words are used which were originally in the Bill—"in England or Ireland by the High Court, and in Scotland by the Court of Session." If my noble and learned Friend's Amendments are taken, it would, I think, become necessary to make other provisions.

LORD MACNAGHTEN: On the contrary, I propose to use the definition of "Court," which is used in the Act of 1869; that is, the Superior Court which has jurisdiction to make an order for winding up the company. That will include the Chancery Court of the Duchy of Lancaster. That Court does continually make winding-up orders.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: That is true, but it is not a Superior Court; on the contrary, it has always been excluded from the definition of a Superior Court.

LORD MACNAGHTEN: Then leave out the word "superior," and say "a Court which has jurisdiction to make a winding-up order." That is the definition of the Act of 1869.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I would not object to the words leaving out the word "superior."

LORD HERSCHELL: I think it would be an improvement, because, of course, the noble and learned Lord opposite intends to follow that up by another Amendment relating to the Court of Chancery in the County Palatine of Lancaster. I think there are strong objections to the clause which the noble and learned Lord opposite is about to propose which will be entirely covered by accepting the Amendment of my noble and learned Friend, because the "High Court" may apply as regards companies within the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery of the County Palatine, and that leaves it uncertain in the case of what companies the Court of Chancery of the County Palatine might exercise its jurisdiction. I do not know what is meant by "being within their jurisdiction;" being within their jurisdiction for the purpose of winding up is quite intelligible. My noble and learned Friend confines it to that, and I think that is a proper mode of dealing with it, whether in the County Palatine or elsewhere. I think that would avoid the necessity of the Amendment of the noble and learned Lord.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Leave out the word "superior" and insert the words "which is authorised to make an order for the winding up of the company."

Amendment moved, in page 2, at the end to insert—

"(6.) The power by this Act given to the High Court may, as regards companies within the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster be exercised by that Court."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

On Question, agreed to.

LORD MACNAGHTEN: After the words "entitled to object," in line 20, I propose to insert the words—

"And who signifies his objection in manner directed by the Court, or by rules of Court."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: If the noble and learned Lord would omit the words, "or by rules of Court," I have no objection to that Amendment.

LORD MACNAGHTEN: Certainly.

Amendment moved, in line 20, after the word "object" to insert the words—

"And who signifies his objection in manner directed by the Court."—(The Lord Macnaghten.)

On Question, agreed to.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The Amendment I here propose is to take the place of my noble and learned Friend's. Clause 3—

"Provided that the Court may in the case of any person or class of persons for special reasons dispense with the notice required by this section."

The Amendment proposed by my noble and learned Friend is to add that—"The Court may on special grounds dispense with any notice required by this Act."

I think that is too wide.

LORD MACNAGHTEN: I quite agree. I think it would come in better as the Lord Chancellor proposes.

Amendment moved, after line 23, to insert the words—

"Provided that the Court may, in the case of any person or class of persons, for special reasons, dispense with the notice required by this section."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

On Question, agreed to.

*LORD ZOUCHE OF HARYNGWORTH: In Clause 1, page 2, line 2, I propose to leave out from the word "creditors" to the end of the clause, and perhaps I may be allowed to explain to your Lordships in a very few words the object of this Amendment. The part of the clause which I am moving to have struck out is, I think, an innovation upon the Bill, as it was when it came up to us from the House of Commons. The Bill was referred, as your Lordships know, to the Standing Committee on General Bills, and a very long discussion took place upon it, extending over two days. A great deal of the discussion turned upon this very important question, and upon the important principle which is contained in it. Your Lordships are, of course, aware that this Bill provides for the alteration of a Memorandum of Association of a company; and in order to enable companies to vary the conditions on which they trade, it is provided that the new objects are to be cognate or ancillary to the original one. Then it was proposed that if there were dissentient members, they might apply to the Court to be paid off, and to have their names accordingly removed from the register of members. That is to say, if they did not approve of the proposed change in the objects of the company, they could go to the Court and say that the constitution of the company was being altered to something else, something different to what it was when they embarked in it and took their shares, and that they wanted to be paid off. It was impossible not to see the justice of that proposition, and that some provision ought to be made for those dissentient shareholders: but again and again when the question arose in the Committee, it was never quite fully answered how that proviso was to be carried into effect, because this difficulty at once arose: out of what funds are the dissentient members to be paid? It was pointed out by one or two noble Lords on the Standing Committee that they could not very well be paid off out of the existing capital, because it is against the provisions of the present law that companies should buy their own shares; companies are not allowed to purchase their own shares, and consequently they would be using the capital of the company in an absolutely illegal manner. Well, then, are the dissentient shareholders to be paid out of the profits of the company? If that were to be done it might seriously hamper the company, who might be otherwise benefited by the change. Then there was a third proposition suggested in the Committee, namely, that the assenting shareholders—that is to say, the majority—or the winning side in regard to the proposed change of aim, should in some way contribute out of their private means, or make up something in the nature of a private purse in order to pay off the dissentient shareholders. The amount to be paid might possibly represent one-fourth of the capital. I think under the Companies Act, with which this Bill is to be read, there are certain provisions laid down as to the manner in which special resolutions are to be passed, namely, that the resolution must be passed by a majority of three-fourths, and then that it must be subsequently confirmed, though on that occasion there need only be a bare majority. In any case, the one-fourth of the shareholders, who might possibly represent as much as or even more than one-fourth of the capital, might go to the Court and say, "We object to the proposed change, and we ask the Court to order that the other shareholders who have beaten us shall pay us off." At once the question arises, how is that to be done? I need hardly point out to your Lordships that if there were any idea of the majority making up anything like a private purse to pay off the dissentient shareholders, that opens out a most dangerous innovation, and would practically do away with the safeguard of limited liability, because those people who would be called upon to provide possibly very large funds in that way would, in point of fact, be saddled with a liability far greater than that which they undertook when they subscribed for or bought their shares. I think, my Lords, I have said quite enough to show the great difficulties in which this proposition would land us; and I may further say that those difficulties were very apparent to the Standing Committee. There was, as I have said, a great deal of discussion upon it, and at last the Committee came to a Division; in fact, there were several Divisions, and in the last Division this proposition was only carried by a majority of 3 in a Committee of 33; that is to say, there were 18 for the proposition, which, I think, was moved by my noble Friend Lord Balfour, and 15 against. I venture to express a hope that the House may think fit to accept the Amendment, after what has been said by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, when he said it was desirable that this Bill should, as far as possible, be kept in the same shape as when it left the House of Commons. I beg, my Lords, with these few words to move the Amendment.

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 2, to leave out from the word "creditors" to the end of the Clause.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Lord BALFOUR of BURLEIGH): My Lords, I hope the House will not consent to omit these words. The noble Lord who has moved their omission has given a very full and, I believe, accurate account of what took place in Standing Committee on the subject. It is not, therefore, necessary for me to go over the same ground. I concur entirely in saying that it would not be right that the dissentient shareholders should be paid off either out of the capital of the company, or out of any profits made by the company. I do not share the opinion of the noble Lord that the majority will suffer any hardship by being obliged, in the discretion of the Court, to find from their private means a fund whereby the dissenting shareholders can be paid off. It seems to me that if they desire the alteration to be made at all, it is not unfair to prove them by such a test as this. And I would point out that it is not to be an absolute order that they shall have to find this money; but it is only if the Court, in its discretion, shall think the objections of the minority so reasonable and well-founded that they ought to be allowed to give up their shares and to be compensated for them. As to the point that it does away with limited liability, I cannot concur in that view, because it is a matter of choice for the shareholders; there is no compulsion upon the majority to take the action which they are to be presumed to have taken before this state of matters can arise; and if their liability is at all increased, it is increased by their own action and for their own purposes, the value and benefit of which to themselves they have presumably fairly and properly considered. My Lords, I go back to the general ground on which this Bill was promoted. It is desired by this measure to relax the hard and fast conditions which prevent the alteration of any Memorandum of Association of a company except by the sanction of Parliament: but I think the House will agree that while you relax it; is not desirable that it should be unduly or excessively relaxed, but that certain conditions should be attached. That seems to me to be reasonable, and I hope, under all the circumstances, that the House will not assent to this proposal to reverse the decision of the Standing Committee.

LORD HERSCHELL: This was a provision which was inserted in your Lordships' House, and, therefore, we need not have any tenderness in dealing with it, as we have been warned by my noble and learned Friend to have as regards the provisions contained in the Bill as it came from the other House. The noble

Lord who has just sat down has said that under this provision there would be no power to pay off dissenting shareholders out of the capital of the company. I do not know why the noble Lord says so. It appears to me perfectly manifest that if the Bill is passed in this form it will be understood that there is authority to do that. The provision is that when the company is applying for this alteration, the Court may order that any shareholders dissenting from the alteration may be paid off. Who are to be the subjects of the order? The application is made by the company.

*LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: The alteration and the application to the Court are made by the majority.

LORD HERSCHELL: But it is made on behalf of the company, and when it is provided that the Court may order that the dissenting members shall be paid off, undoubtedly it would be understood to be out of the capital of the company. It must be so, because otherwise it would enable the company to diminish its capital. But that is not the case, and the Bill is clearly so drawn as that it would not be so understood. But I think the form in which it is drawn is ineffectual. Upon whom is the order to be made? Clearly against somebody. If the Court makes the order, it involves that the order is directed against somebody for the purpose of compelling them to pay. Really, what I understand by this provision is that the Court shall not confirm the new arrangement unless the dissenting shareholders are in some way or other arranged with. I would submit to my noble and learned Friend opposite that the proposal which my noble Friend Lord Macnaghten has on the Paper really meets the case, because that provides that, at the instance of the dissenting shareholders, the Court may adjourn the case in order to give an opportunity for an arrangement to be come to. That hangs the matter up until an arrangement is made, and gives the Court a control over the whole thing, so that they are not bound to carry out the arrangement unless they think fit to do so. If the people who propose the alteration think it worth their while to go on, it would, surely, be worth their while to arrange for paying the dissenting shareholders, and then the matter could be completed. That is surely a much better way of doing it than by saying the Court can make an order that these people shall be paid off without saying how the order is to be enforced.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I think, even with my noble and learned Friend's Amendment, there may be some little difficulty about it, because the Amendment, as it stands at present, does not say that the Court is to make the order if an arrangement has not been made. It is, I think, rather vague language—that the Court may “Adjourn the proceedings in order that an arrangement may be made to the satisfaction of the Court for the purchase of the interests of dissentient members.”

If the meaning of the section is that the order is not to be made unless that is done, I can understand it. Words to that effect might, perhaps, be added to get rid of the objection.

LORD MACNAGHTEN: You might add that if the Court is not satisfied it may dismiss the application. But I think that is unnecessary, for it seems to me it follows. Evidently it is quite within the discretion of the Court whether it will confirm the order or not, and if no arrangement was made, of course the Court would reject the application. I think, therefore, that would meet the case; but I should not object to adopt the Amendment suggested by the Lord Chancellor.

*LORD ZOUCHE OF HARYNGWORTH: The House will understand that I had not the opportunity of reading the Amendments to be moved by the noble and learned Lord Macnaghten. I must say that I think it would be better for that Amendment to be adopted instead of mine. In fact, mine would be quite covered by that; and therefore I would ask the House to allow me to withdraw my Amendment, on the understanding that the noble and learned Lord's Amendment shall be considered.

LORD HERSCHELL: I think it would be better to leave the words exactly as they stand, and not to add the further words now.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The language is rather vague.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

LORD HERSCHELL: Then you might add—

“And the Court in the event of no such arrangement being come to, may refuse to confirm the alteration.”

The Court would not sanction the scheme.

LORD MACNAGHTEN: As my noble Friend Lord Zouche has withdrawn his Amendment I will move mine.

Amendment moved,

In page 2, leave out lines 3 and 4, and insert “adjourn the proceedings in order that an arrangement may be made to the satisfaction of the court for the purchase of the interests of dissentient members; and the court may give such directions and make such orders as it may think expedient, for the purpose of facilitating any such arrangement or carrying the same into effect; Provided always, that it shall not be lawful to expend any part of the capital of the company in any such purchase.”—(The Lord Macnaghten.)

Agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I propose to omit this clause, but I think it is rather a matter of drafting as between my noble and learned Friend and myself. What I propose is, that something should be added later. I quite understand the object of his clause is to take care that the proceedings taken for the confirmation should be made public, but I think it is possible to provide for this in another form. I entirely sympathise with that view, and I think if, at a later stage of the Bill, one were to put at the end, “being confirmed by the Court upon petition,” or some similar words, that would effect all he desires much better. The reason I object to the 2nd clause as it stands is that it imports that any application to the Court must be by petition. As my noble Friend knows, an application by petition is a much more expensive form of procedure than an ordinary application to the Court, and I think his object would be carried out by omitting this clause and putting in the words I have suggested at a later stage of the Bill.

LORD MACNAGHTEN: I quite assent to that.

Amendment moved, “To leave out Clause 2,” agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

Clause 4.

LORD HERSCHELL: I would ask my noble and learned Friend to consider at a later stage whether, with regard to the framework of the Bill, especially in view of the provisions with regard to alterations, it might not be well to make this an additional sub-section of Clause 1. It is really a consequence of the other provision, and would, I think, be much better put in there. It would also be more in conformity with the Bill as it came up to this House, and would read better altogether.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I think so.

LORD MACNAGHTEN: I have an Amendment upon this clause, at page 2, line 18, after the word "Company" to insert "or to restrict or abandon any of the objects specified in the memorandum of association;" but I do not know that it becomes necessary now.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Then the next Amendment I have is to move to leave out lines 19 and 20, in this clause. They are the last two lines of that clause, that the Court may, by order, confirm the alteration in the cases mentioned,

"or in any similar or analogous case where the Court thinks it reasonable and proper that the alteration should be confirmed."

I confess I am very jealous of those words: I do not know what is "similar" or what is "analogous"; and I do not know what it is that the Court may "think reasonable or proper," under the circumstances. That seems to me to leave a wide field open. My noble and learned Friend has, it appears, gone through the whole matter with great care, and he appears to have swept up a great deal in those general words, leaving to the Court the duty of their interpretation. I suppose this is inserted in substitution for the expression "cognate and ancillary," which I think some of us have had great difficulty in understanding. I think it is much better to leave out these other words, which are, I think, too wide, and would, it seems to me, cause great difficulty if the Judge is to be called upon to interpret them.

LORD MACNAGHTEN: I believe I included everything I could think of, but, of course, I was not vain enough to think that I had included everything which might occur. I would point out that the words to which the Lord Chancellor has objected occur in the Companies' Act, 1862, and they have always been interpreted without any difficulty; but if my noble and learned Friend thinks they had better be omitted I have no objection.

Amendment moved, "To leave out lines 19 and 20."—(The Lord Chancellor.)—Agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I propose the omission of this clause. The only reason I object to it is that no such authority is required. Does my noble Friend not know that by order the Court can deal with costs? The Court has complete authority over costs and everything else.

LORD MACNAGHTEN: I am sorry to say I know quite the reverse.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Then it becomes a serious matter, and a matter of substance if Order 65 of the Judicature Act is supposed not to give complete and absolute authority to the Court as to dealing with costs. I think it does; but certainly if there is any doubt to be thrown on Order 65, it ought not to be disposed of in effect by this Statute, but by some amendment of the Judicature Act. In my view, however, absolute discretion in that matter is given already to the Court.

Amendment to leave out Clause 5.—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD MACNAGHTEN: I am sorry to say that the Court of Appeal has taken a different view to that which my noble Friend takes in the case of re Mill's Estate. That was a decision of a very strong Court, consisting of, I think, Lords Justices Cotton, Bowen, and Fry. There it was held that the rules of the Judicature Act and Order 65 of the Supreme Court do not enable the said Court to order payment of costs by a person who before that Act came into operation, could not have been ordered to pay them; and then it goes on to say—

"The effect and intention of those orders being not to give any jurisdiction with regard to costs, but only to regulate the mode in which costs are to be dealt with in cases in which the Court had, antecedently, jurisdiction."

LORD HERSCHELL: I think that makes it rather too doubtful for us to leave any doubt upon the matter. I have not carefully considered the matter, and, therefore, should not like to bind myself to an opinion, but it seems to me that when you are giving a new and independent jurisdiction to the Court, and have to deal, therefore, with an entirely new matter, it is very doubtful whether the general words of the Judicature Act would enable costs to be given. I would suggest to my noble and learned Friend, as I can understand his desire not to alter the Bill more than is necessary, that he might in that clause say, "subject to such conditions as to the Court may seem fit, and the Court may on any such application make such order as to costs as to the Court may seem right," and then add the provisions as to costs to the 3rd sub-section of the 1st clause.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I confess my object was not so much in regard to lengthening the Bill as to casting doubt on Order 65. However, I will accept that as being the decision of the Court of Appeal at present. Whether it is a decision which would commend itself to your Lordships when sitting in another capacity I cannot say; but, in order to get rid of any difficulty on the subject, I think, what my noble and learned Friend opposite has suggested would be sufficient.

On Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill," agreed to.

Clause 6 agreed to.

Clause 7.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: It is quite unusual, I think, to make a penalty absolute, I propose, therefore, to insert the words "not exceeding."

LORD MACNAGHTEN: I think they were all fixed penalties in the earlier Act.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Probably it would be better not to allow that to remain.

Amendment moved, in page 3, line 8, to leave out the word "of" and insert the words "not exceeding."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

Agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 8 agreed to.

Clause 9.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Now, my Lords, I move to omit this clause. It is entirely beyond the scope of the Bill. Some of the persons who introduced the Bill into the House of Commons have written to me to say they entirely object to this clause, and several of your Lordships have called attention to the absurdity of it. I quite agree that my noble and learned Friend has reduced it into something like sense; but the reason I object to it is that it is entirely beyond the scope of the Bill, and I think would give rise to very serious discussion. I, therefore, propose to omit it, because it has no reference to the matter which was before the Joint Committee. They did not desire to make such an alteration in the law, and it appears to me undesirable to introduce a provision which is alien to the object and purpose of the measure.

Amendment moved, "To leave out Clause 9."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD MACNAGHTEN: I only desired to retain the clause in order to make other parts of the Bill intelligible, but if the Lord Chancellor thinks it should be omitted I assent.

LORD HERSCHELL: I, too, should agree if we could be perfectly sure that the other House would not dissent from our striking out this clause. I have no wish to see it, and certainly, in the form in which it came before your Lordships' House, it would not be worked. I think this has now been made a clause which would work, but I quite admit it is not one which is very close to the purpose and object of this Bill, and striking it out will also reduce the Bill more to the proportions which it had when it went to the House of Commons, which, according to my noble and learned Friend, is a desirable object. I, therefore, should assent to its being left out.

On Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill," negatived.

Title.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I have an Amendment to the title. It is to insert after "certain" the words "instruments under which they may be constituted or regulated," leaving out the words "memoranda of association." I am sure I do not know whether

"memoranda" has so far become a word in the English language as to justify its being used in that way.

Agreed to.

Bill reported, with Amendments.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: Would it suit the noble and learned Lord opposite to take the Report of Amendments on Tuesday next?

LORD HERSCHELL: Yes.

IMMIGRATION OF ALIENS.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN, in moving for a Return of the number of vessels arriving at the Port of London from the Port of Hamburg between 1st January and 1st July, 1890, stating in how many cases Reports were furnished respecting aliens; and to ask Her Majesty's Government what information is given in such Reports, and what steps, if any, are taken to ascertain whether aliens are on board in cases where no Report is made, said: My Lords, I scarcely think it is necessary for me to trouble your Lordships with any remarks in justification of the notice of Motion and the question which appears on the Paper in my name. Her Majesty's Government stated last Session that steps would be taken to obtain statistical information as to the number of aliens coming into this country, or, at any rate, coming into certain ports in this country, and I presumed that information would also be obtained as to the destination, origin, circumstances, trades, and conditions of those aliens. It appears to me that it would be convenient to the House and to the country, and desirable that Returns giving such information as has been gathered should be furnished for the past half-year. It is very desirable that information of this kind should be collected; but I need not point out to your Lordships that in a matter of this kind statistics are not only useless, but are much worse than useless; they are absolutely misleading, unless they are full and complete, and, above all, accurate. There must be no possibility of exaggeration on the one side, and on the other side nothing should escape the official eye. I do not think, my Lords, that this House or the other House has been given any information as to the Returns which masters of vessels are required to furnish, or as to what steps are taken to see that Returns are furnished in all cases, or further, whether any steps are taken to ascertain whether aliens are on board vessels or not in cases where no Returns are given. I beg, therefore, my Lords, to move for a Return of the vessels mentioned in the notice. I have confined my Motion to the ports of inquiry to the Ports of London and Hamburg; but I need not say that if the Government can supply us with wider information embracing other ports, I shall have no possible objection to their doing so.

Moved, "That there be laid before this House a return of the number of vessels arriving at the Port of London from the Port of Hamburg between 1st January and 1st July, 1890, stating in how many cases reports were furnished respecting aliens."—(The Lord Kenry, E. Dunraven and Mount-Earl.)

*THE EARL OF MEATH: My Lords, I am very glad to hear the noble Earl ask this question, but I wish he had included some other ports. I understand the reason he has only asked for a Return as to London is that, I believe, some 90 per cent. of the immigrants do arrive in the Port of London; but still there is another 10 per cent. to be accounted for, and I think it is of importance we should have information with regard to those who arrive at Leith, Glasgow, Liverpool, and Hull. I believe that the noble Earl desires a good deal more than actually to obtain the information he has asked for. I presume his object is to seek some further legislation. Of course, I am not aware whether that is his desire, but at all events it is my desire, and I sincerely hope that something will be done to stop this immigration of foreign paupers into this country. We have had a good deal of evidence before the Sweating Committee with regard to the evil effects of the immigration of these paupers from Russia, Germany, and Poland; and although the Report which was presented to your Lordships' House does not lay as great stress as I should wish it had done upon this particular point, I think it will be conceded that a great deal of suffering is entailed upon the working classes of this country owing to the competition which they have to meet in consequence of the immigration from Russia, Germany, and Poland. The average number of immigrants who land in this country annually is, I believe, 30,000, and the bulk of that number are Polish Jews, who come here with scarcely any money in their pockets. A great deal of very useful information has been obtained in this matter by a gentleman who appeared and gave evidence before the Sweating Committee of your Lordships' House—I allude to Mr. Arnold White. He took a great deal of trouble in going down to the East End of London and to the Docks to find out all he could with regard to the immigration of these foreigners, and upon one occasion he brought up to the Committee of your Lordships' House 50, chosen at random, who had just arrived from Hamburg. Out of those 50 men, there were 15 who had arrived on these shores without a penny in their pockets, and there were 14 who had arrived without a knowledge of any trade whatever. Now, is it fair upon our own working men that these victims of oppression, for, as a general rule, they come from Russia and Poland, and have been driven out by persecution, being Jews, should be allowed to make use of this country as an asylum, if by doing so they create poverty and misery among our own working people? Of course, I know the argument put forward will be that the traditions of England will not permit us to refuse an asylum to any individual; and I am perfectly willing to accede to that as long as by receiving these people we do not do an injustice to our own population. But I believe that charity begins at home, and that as long as it can be shown—and I think it can be clearly shown—that our working people are suffering from the immigration of these foreign paupers, we ought to put sentiment on one side and consider their interest first. The wages of some 160,000 families (and supposing each family to consist of five persons, that represents some 800,000 people) are depressed from the very fact alone of the influx of these 30,000 foreign paupers annually. Not only do they cut down the wages of our working men and women—and it is the women that I principally feel for—to starvation point; but besides that, their habits are not such as our working classes are accustomed to, and I think it will be acknowledged by all who have lived in those districts and have come in contact with that class that they are dragging down our own working class population physically, and I may say morally. I have no desire whatever to throw a shield of protection round the drunkard or the idler, or the individual who cannot, or will not, learn a trade. I do not wish in the smallest degree to favour my own country people when the competition is a fair one, but I do certainly say that we are not behaving rightly to our own working population and their wives and children in permitting foreigners who are accustomed to a lower standard of life than our countrymen to come as unskilled paupers into this country and to undersell the labouring classes in this country. One circumstance which shows that even foreign nations, through which these people pass, are astonished at our leniency in this matter, and are certainly not disposed to imitate it is, that when a few years ago the Jewish Board of Guardians and others in London were in the habit occasionally of sending Jews, who had come to this country without money, back to Germany and to Russia, a Police Order was issued at Hamburg forbidding foreigners to come into Germany unless they had a through ticket to Russia, or unless they were able to maintain themselves in Germany. Now, what does that mean? It means that the Authorities of Hamburg will send over to this country paupers whom they will not receive when sent back again a few days afterwards. The Americans do not allow us to send over paupers to that country, and, in my opinion, quite rightly. By an Act passed in 1882, it is stated that if, on examination by the officers, whose duty it is to go on board any ship and examine the condition of the passengers, they shall find among such passengers any person unable to take charge of himself or herself without becoming a public burden, they shall report the same in writing to the Public Collector or officials of such port, and such person shall not be permitted to land. Now, I do hope that we in this country will take some step of that sort. Our colonies would not permit us to send over to them paupers. They are at this moment too far away to be affected by an influx of paupers from Europe; but they legislate against the introduction of the Chinese, and they place a Poll Tax upon each Chinaman who enters the country. Of late this subject has come a good deal under my attention, owing to my being Chairman of an Association which endeavours to persuade the Government to assist colonisation; and although this

The Earl of Meath

Association has received the support of some 130,000 working-men belonging to Trades Unions, whenever we have received a rebuff from Trades Unions it has almost invariably been owing to the immigration of foreign paupers. They ask us, "What is the good of your recommending working-men to be sent out of this country, and sent off to America or to the colonies if for every man who is sent out, as is now the case, two foreigners come into this country?" And it is an argument which is exceedingly difficult to meet; in fact, it is impossible to meet it, and, therefore, gradually it has been forced upon my attention until the conviction has grown in my mind that if we desire to improve the condition of the working classes in this country, and to assist the poorer classes to emigrate to our colonies, or to colonise elsewhere, we must at the same time do something to prevent this country from becoming the dustheap of Europe.

LORD BALFOUR or BURLEIGH: My Lords, I cordially acknowledge the great importance of the subject which the two noble Lords who have just spoken have brought before the House. I also acknowledge the promise upon the part of the Board of Trade to get as accurate information as possible as to what is really the existing state of matters with regard to this foreign immigration, and I think I shall be able to show your Lordships that that promise is in process of being fulfilled in spirit and in letter. I have also to acknowledge the promise to make the information public as soon as it can be put into a form which would be practically useful for any purpose. I do not propose to follow the noble Earl who spoke last into the important question of policy which he raised. I will just say this, that undoubtedly there were Acts in force during the Continental Wars at the beginning of the present century prohibiting aliens from landing on our shores. Those Acts were subsequently, after deliberate and long discussion, repealed, and undoubtedly there would be great difficulties in re-imposing disabilities upon people landing upon our shores. However, these are important matters of policy upon which I should not like to express a definite opinion without grave consideration and preparation. The real matter with which we are concerned this evening is the question of getting accurate information upon the subject. With regard to that, I will, with the permission of the House, state the exact position of matters at present. There is, I venture to think, some misapprehension in the mind of the noble Earl who has moved for the Return as to the use of the word "Report." The documents which are technically known as Reports would not, I think, be of great service to him. What the noble Earl no doubt really wants are the "alien lists." The Reports of ships are Customs documents, and they include a great number of things. I hold one of them in my hand, and it includes information as to the cargo carried, the stores, at what station the ship is lying, information which is important only to the Customs, and which is not necessary for the purpose which we have in hand to-night. But one of the things which has to be included in those Reports is a statement whether there are any alien passengers on board the ship. If there are any alien passengers on board a ship then, by an Act of William IV., a list of them is to be furnished to the Custom House Authorities, with the names, rank, occupations, and other descriptions of the persons so mentioned. The furnishing of those lists of aliens had, up to the beginning of the present year, fallen into desuetude, and was only in force as regards the Ports of London and Hull, and even the lists from those ports were sent to the Home Office, and not to the Board of Trade. But for some months past all the Reports from the ports of London and Hull have been sent to the Board of Trade, and have been there carefully tabulated and examined, and, so far as those ports are concerned, if the noble Earl will refer to the Report which was furnished to both Houses of Parliament on the 21st March of the present year, upon emigration and immigration, at page 31 he will find some important information as regards those ports and the number of aliens who come into the country through them. It must be borne in mind that as far as the port of Hull is concerned a large number of those who come to that port went across the country, and on to America. I think the noble Earl who spoke from the Cross-Benches has largely overstated the number of the immigrants who remain. There is no information which we have which would lead us to believe there are as many as 30,000 of them coming into this country annually. Up to the end of last year there was, as I have stated, only information in possession of the Board of Trade as regards the ports of London and Hull, but during the last spring, in fulfilment of the promise given by the Board of Trade, those lists of aliens have been called for from the following ports, and have been regularly sent in: Aberdeen, Bristol, Belfast, Dublin, Goole, Grangemouth, Glasgow, Greenock, Burnt Island, Leith, Liverpool, Birkenhead, Queensborough, Sunderland, Newcastle, and North and South Shields and others. So that I think your Lordships will see, so far as the collection of information goes, we had in anticipation endeavoured to get and are getting even more than the noble Earl has asked for, a Return of the number of vessels as between London and Hamburg, and I venture to suggest to him that all the information that would be got from that is given in a convenient form at page 31 of the document to which I have referred. I would venture to suggest to him that it is not desirable to call for a Return at the present time—the present system has only come into operation quite recently—it would be better to wait until the immigration and emigration statistics for the present year are published, which will be early next year. The Statistical Department of the Board of Trade are now engaged in studying and tabulating those Returns as they come in, and it is their intention to include in their next Report a full account of the results arrived at. Our endeavours to get accurate information do not stop there, because it is obvious that aliens may come in by other ways. They may come in by some of the cheaper route passenger steamers, and reach the Metropolis or other large towns in this country by means of the railways. We have, therefore, asked the railways which run between London and the ports to furnish us with the number of second and third class tickets to and from London, and if there appears to be a large excess coming into London over and above those going away steps will be taken to find out whether it is caused by any large immigration of aliens by that means. As regards the final question upon the Paper, whether any effort has been made to test the accuracy of the information given in such Reports, I have to reply in the affirmative, and say that the Customs Authorities are doing their best to ascertain whether there is any reason to believe that the provisions of the Act are being evaded, and, in addition to that, the Board has given instructions to our Consuls at Hamburg and other ports abroad to report when aliens arrive at them, and, if there is any ground for believing that aliens of the poorer class are being shipped from those ports to this country, to give such information to us here as will enable us to check the information upon this side. Under all these circumstances I would urge that the Motion should not be pressed on the present occasion, and I repeat the pledge that as soon as any information likely to be useful in a statistical form is obtained, no time shall be lost in placing it before Parliament.

LORD THRING: Perhaps the noble Lord will be good enough to state whether an accurate account is kept of the emigration of aliens? Because, from the evidence given before the Sweating Committee it appears questionable whether the immigration is not counterbalanced by the emigration; in other words, whether England was not simply used as a means of transit for emigrants en route to America. I would only refer to the evidence of one witness, Mr. Stephany, the Secretary to the Jewish Board of Guardians, who stated that the emigration of the Jews was fully equal to the immigration. I think I ought to state, in justice to the Jewish Board of Guardians, that although Jews may be landed in England in very poor circumstances, yet they never fall upon the rates, because they are entirely supported by their own community.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: My Lords, there are two sides to that question, and I would rather not open a discussion upon it at present; but the mere fact of the liberality of the richer portion of the Jewish community has been suggested as attracting these people to England. As to the question whether any reliable statistics can be got as to the emigration of aliens, I am afraid there is no statutory power that would enable that to be done at present; but if any means can be employed to obtain that information, I will see whether it can be done. I would rather not give any pledge upon the subject until we see whether that can be done or not. As regards Hull, we are in a position to say, and can prove it if necessary, that a large number of aliens are in the habit of coming to Hull on their passage across the country to Liverpool and thence to America.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: My Lords, I quite agree with my noble Friend who has spoken for the Government that it is not desirable; in fact, I think it is impossible now to go into such a large question as whether the emigration is larger than the immigration into the country. The noble Lord opposite, Lord Thring, seems to consider that there is a considerable stream of very poor and even destitute foreigners who come here, and, at all events for a short time, reside in England, and after residing here a few months, may be passed on by the richer portion of their community to America. That is not a very satisfactory state of things, even if true. I cannot say whether it is true or not, but it is a matter which would require considerable time to discuss. After what the noble Lord has said on behalf of the Government, I will withdraw this Motion. I have heard with the greatest satisfaction what has fallen from the noble Lord's lips as to the intention of Her Majesty's Government to furnish Parliament and the country as soon as possible at the beginning of next Session, with full and accurate information on this most important subject. The only point I did not clearly understand was whether in these alien lists, which the noble Lord has referred to, any mention is made of the material condition of the people, and whether they have any means of support, either in money or the knowledge of any handicraft or trade which is likely to enable them to make a decent living in this country. That is a point upon which I think the noble Lord might be able to give information; also whether there is any kind of penalty attaching to masters of vessels who fail to return the numbers of aliens on board. Of course, when I asked for these Reports I did not mean the regular Reports furnished to the Customs; the words in my notice are Reports respecting aliens. I did not know the proper term to use; but the noble Lord has explained that they are termed "alien lists." But as I understand the noble Lord to say that steps are being taken to see that these regulations are not evaded, I should be anxious to know if he can inform me whether there is any way of punishing masters of vessels who in their Reports to the Custom House omit to state that aliens are on board their vessels. My noble Friend on the Cross Benches has mentioned the question of the emigration of our own working classes. I cannot, of course, go into that now. I should, however, like to refer to the figures given of the foreign immigration in reference to the steps taken by the Government. My noble Friend estimated them at 30,000 annually; the noble Lord below me (Lord Balfour), considers that figure to be an excessive one. Now, that is the very point on which we want information—we want to know what the number is. Whether that number be too large or too small I do not know; but if my memory does not fail me, Mr. Lindsay, the chief of the Long Room at the Custom House, in his evidence before the Select Committee on Emigration and Immigration (Foreigners), stated that in his opinion one line of steamers alone landed 400 of these destitute foreigners every week at Tilbury Docks. He estimated that 100,000 of these people arrived annually at our shores to remain, and was informed that, as a rule, they settled at the East End of London. On the other hand, in the evidence of an official from the Home Office, they were estimated at about 98,000. That, my Lords, is the great reason why I am so very anxious that accurate statistics should be furnished, and why I am so very pleased to hear that Her Majesty's Government are taking steps to furnish Parliament with accurate information as soon as possible.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: With regard to the numbers, they were in 1887-8 9,194, landed from all ports, in London; in 1889, 9,846; that is from the German ports to London. In regard to Hull in 1889, the total number was 41,960, as compared with 63,116 in 1888; but the whole of those, with the exception of 234 in 1889, and 295 in 1888 went over to America. If we take the number, therefore, to be slightly in excess of 9,000, I think that is probably near the mark. With regard to the question whether any means exist of enforcing the penalties which are imposed for failure to make Reports, I beg to inform the House that the Statute of William IV., which I referred to before, finishes by stating that if any master of a vessel refuses to make such declaration, or makes a false declaration, he shall for every such offence forfeit the sum of £20. A further penalty is imposed for every offence if the master shall wilfully refuse to make the declaration. That appears to me to be sufficiently stringent to meet the case.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: May I ask is the Statute put in operation in that respect?

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: I am not able to say whether it is put in operation; but the Customs House Authorities have been instructed to see whether there is any ground for believing that it is evaded. With regard to the particulars which are given, the Christian names and surnames are given, and the profession and native country. There is nothing given as to the circumstances of the immigrant; and I must say it is extremely difficult to get accurate information as to the circumstances. Some might say they were independent, and others might not give correct particulars, and there are no means of testing that. If the noble Earl would like to see what the Reports are, I have copies of them here.

THE EARL OF MEATH: I am informed, I do not know whether rightly or wrongly, that in some of these Returns when information has been given of these immigrants, only the head of the family has been put down, and not the children. Of course, if that is the case it would account for the discrepancy in the figures given in evidence before the Sweating Committee.

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

THE ROYAL NAVAL RESERVE AND ARTILLERY VOLUNTEERS.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD BRASSEY, in rising to call attention to the state of the Royal Naval Reserve and Artillery Volunteers, and to ask whether officers, seamen, and stokers of the Reserve will be embarked in the fleet during the forthcoming manœuvres, said: My Lords, in putting this question to the Government, with reference to the Naval Reserve, it is not necessary for me to trouble your Lordships with many remarks. It is obvious that in any emergency we must be largely dependent on the Mercantile Marine for the manning of the Navy. The Royal Naval Reserve is an essential element of the Naval Force of the country, for it is impossible to maintain in peace all the men required for the Navy in time of war. There must be a reserve both of officers and of seamen in the Merchant Service. In time of war we should be short of lieutenants, short of experienced engineers and firemen, and short of seamen. The first point which I desire to press on the Admiralty is the necessity of making the lieutenants' list of the Royal Naval Reserve thoroughly efficient. Every officer whose name is retained on the Active List of lieutenants of the Royal Naval Reserve should be capable of doing duty at sea in a junior rank, and every officer whose name is retained upon the Active List should be called upon periodically to serve afloat in Her Majesty's Fleet for a short time or to go through a short course of gunnery in the gunnery establishments of the Navy; that is, on the Excellent or the Cambridge. In the Medical Department it is evident we shall be essentially dependent upon the Mercantile Marine for the supply of experienced men in any time of emergency. On the question of the mobilisation of the Navy, I would mention that last year 3,000 additional stokers were required for service afloat. In point of numbers the reserves in the ports were equal to the demand; but many inexperienced men were embarked, and a severe strain was thrown upon the officers responsible for the effective working of the machinery of Her Majesty's ships engaged in the manœuvres. I would urge that every year reserve stokers should be called out for duty during the annual mobilisation. A certain number of stokers of the Naval Reserve should be called out for service. At present even a limited number of experienced men would be of great value to the raw hands on board the ships and would give useful instruction to the newly-entered men from the naval ports. The arrangements for calling out stokers of the reserves should be worked out in consultation with leading shipowners. In connection with this subject, I would submit to the Admiralty that it is exceedingly desirable to secure for the young engineers, and for the newly-entered stokers of the Navy more opportunities for gaining experience in running powerful machinery at high speeds and for long distances in all states of weather, and I would suggest that arrangements should be concerted with the owners of the finest steamers in the Mercantile Marine by which the young engineers and the less experienced stokers entered for the Navy might be enabled to serve in their finest merchant ships for limited periods. Turning to the seamen of the Naval Reserve, I desire to ask the Government whether it would not be possible that some men from the Reserve should be called out on the occasion of the mobilisation of the Fleet. A short period of service in the Navy occasionally would be valuable to the Reserve men both as a training and as a reminder of the very serious obligations they had taken to serve in the Fleet when called upon; and I venture to add that if they were occasionally called upon for service, it would be an encouragement to them as giving a proof of the confidence felt at the Admiralty in the efficiency of the Naval Reserve. From an Admiralty point of view I hold that the calling out of a certain number of seamen of the Naval Reserve from time to time would be useful both as a test of their efficiency and also as suggesting improvements when weak points are discovered. Now, I will pass on to say a few words with regard to the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers. That force was first called into existence when Mr. Goschen was at the Admiralty, and in answer to his appeals to the patriotism of the men both in London and Liverpool. All the admirals who in succession have held the office now so ably filled by Sir George Tryon have reported favourably on the force Patriotic feeling has not been wanting and I think it is no exaggeration to say that in the last year 3,000 additional volunteers might have been enrolled if the Admiralty had been disposed to avail itself of their services. All offers of services were refused, however, by the Admiralty, and mainly, it was assumed, because no scheme had been matured for utilising in any effective way the services of the new force. The consequence is, that the force barely holds its own, and now stands at less than 2,000 men. In many ways the Volunteers might be valuable. They could relieve the coastguard in the duty of watching the coast and transmitting information. They could help to man the coast defence vessels whose crews would be wanted in time of war to make good the wastage in our sea-going battle-ships and cruisers. Many of the Volunteers could do duty as gunners in a sea-going ironclad. I would strongly urge that the whole question of the organisation of the Naval Volunteers should be carefully considered at the Admiralty with a view to putting the force on a permanent footing; and I have no doubt that upon consideration of the subject, it would be found desirable that the Naval Volunteers should be assimilated rather to the Marine Artillery than to the Seamen Gunners of the Navy. I think the Volunteers should be re-organised and placed on a permanent footing as a corps of Marine Artillery. No doubt the Volunteers have taken a pride in considering themselves a reserve to the Seamen gunners of the Navy, and the changes I suggest might deprive the present force of some of its most enthusiastic members; but I venture to say it is possible to make too large a concession to sentiment. At an earlier period of the Session I had placed on the Paper a notice of Motion with reference to the Colonial Naval Reserves, but on reflection it seems undesirable to press the Admiralty to take any initial steps. It is obviously, however, most desirable that the Colonial Governments should undertake the organisation of Naval Reserves for themselves, and it might be intimated through the proper channels that, should steps be taken for that purpose by the Colonial Governments, the Admiralty are ready, as I feel sure they are, to render them assistance whenever it is sought. I have no wish to impute to the present Admiralty indifference to the Naval Reserves. On the contrary, they have done a great deal to promote the efficiency of that force, and I have much pleasure in making that well-deserved acknowledgment to the Government. I beg to ask the question of which I have given notice.

LORD SUDELEY: My Lords, I am very glad that this question has been brought forward by my noble Friend, for the subject is one of enormous interest to this country in case of war, and certainly no one is better fitted than Lord Brassey to go into the question. I most cordially concur in everything that has fallen from my noble Friend. It is most desirable, on all grounds, that when the mobilisation of the fleet takes place in the summer of every year a large number of officers and men from the reserves should be brought on board for a certain amount of training. It is very important that we should have as large a contingent as possible of officers, seamen, and stokers so employed. It is most desirable that in time of peace the Navy should be made to harmonise as far as possible with our mercantile marine. It would be very unsatisfactory if, when we had suddenly to expand our fleets, we should find our Naval reserves in the state, which is so often the case, of raw and untrained levies. I quite agree, as my noble and learned Friend has said, a great many difficulties have been overcome by the Admiralty, and they are very much to be congratulated upon a great deal they have done, and the Admiralty certainly deserve to be specially congratulated upon the arrangements they have made for inducing a number of officers from the merchant navy to serve in our ships for a whole year's training. But, while I say that I should also like to say that I hope they will go a step further, it would be most desirable to have double the number of lieutenants and sub-lieutenants on the list as being held in reserve. There are at present, I believe, 106 lieutenants and 209 sub-lieutenants. That is all very well, but in time of war undoubtedly we should want a very large number of lieutenants and sub-lieutenants. I think it most desirable that these numbers should be at least doubled, and I sincerely hope steps will be taken to double them. In regard to our reserve seamen, there is one point which I think has been forgotten, and which I should like to mention. So far as I can understand, we give a retaining fee to our seamen in the Merchant Navy without taking sufficient care to see that any misconduct would forfeit it, and I have heard a good many times in the Mercantile Marine that the Naval Reserve men are not looked on with satisfaction with which they ought to be looked upon. It frequently happens on large merchant passenger steamers that seamen who belong to the Royal Naval Reserve are apt to give themselves airs and become somewhat troublesome, knowing that, whatever happens, they will have their pay in the Naval Reserve. It appears to me that if a seaman misconducts himself he ought to be taken off the Reserve List. It appears to me that if it were distinctly told them that their retaining fee depended upon the character of their discharges this difficulty might be easily overcome. It is a small matter, but one hears the complaint so constantly that I thought it ought to be mentioned. There is, however, one question of great importance. Your Lordships are aware that our ships are no longer what they used to be. They are, in the present day, nothing more or less than huge gun carriages with an enormous amount of expensive machinery in them, most of them without yards and without sails. I apprehend that, although it is undoubtedly necessary to have a large number of executive officers and men, it is, as my noble Friend said just now, of even greater importance that you should have a large number of competent engineers, mechanics, and stokers ready. If you have not you may depend upon it you will not be able to exert the same force that you otherwise would, and the ships would be absolutely powerless in time of war. No retaining fee whatever is given to engineers or assistant engineers to go into the Reserve. As a matter of fact, there are only at this moment 60 engineers on the list, and instead of there being an inducement to them to take a commission it is a question rather of money out of pocket. If you look at the mercantile marine there is no doubt you have a splendid reserve of officers of the highest quality and capacity as engineers. In our great passenger ships the engineers are accustomed to very excellent work; they run at high rates of speed; they steam on day after day, and it is very rarely if ever that you hear of any accident happening. This, I think, proves that these men are of undoubtedly high character and ability. My Lords, it seems to me, that it is suicidal in time of peace not to take steps to get more engineers on your Reserve Lists. Undoubtedly there is some truth in the statement that is very often put forward, that in times of war we should have a large number of steamers thrown out of employ, and that we should, therefore, have a great number of men available. That may be true to a certain extent; but, on the other hand, we must remember that we have upon our ships a complicated mass of machinery—in some of our ships there are up to 60 or 70 steam engines, and I apprehend that no engineer could go on board those ships without, for a considerable time, feeling himself adrift. It would take some time before he could know exactly what to do. I hope the Admiralty will really consider this matter, and see whether a considerable extension might not be made in that respect. Then the other question to which I desire to call attention is with regard to our firemen and stokers. In the Navy there has been for some time very great difficulty in obtaining good stokers, and at the time of the two last mobilisations, I understand, it was with the greatest possible difficulty that some of the ships could be got to sea owing to the want of this class of men. The policy of the Admiralty has been to create a small reserve of stokers. There are now 557 stokers on the Reserve List, who receive £5 a year, but never have any training, and it is very doubtful whether they are thoroughly trained stokers or not. The curious thing about these men is that, although as regards other Reserves you take care to test them, call them out and see what they are worth, the stoker is never called out. You pay him £5 a year, and you do not know whether or not he is a competent stoker. Surely it is absolutely necessary that these men should be called out from time to time to see what they really are. In some of our large passenger ships, such as those of the Peninsular and Oriental and other large Steamship Companies, it is the habit to employ in the engine-room, as firemen, natives of the East, who are accustomed to very great heat, and who have no objection to working in the stokehole. It has always appeared to me a great act of cruelty to place Europeans in the stokehold in a hot climate if it could be avoided, and, if you can get men of the kind I have mentioned, it seems to be absolutely unnecessary. The class of natives that have been employed in the P. and O. Service for many years are negroes from Zanzibar, who go to Bombay and are readily obtainable, making excellent stokers. Latterly their numbers have a good deal decreased; but their places have been taken by natives from the Punjab, who have proved themselves eminently fitted for the work. I have made careful inquiries on the subject, and I find that there would be no difficulty in getting large numbers of these Punjab men at Bombay who would be very willing to work in our stokeholds, both in peace time and in war. Of course, it would be necessary in all our ships to have one or two European firemen; but, with this exception, I do not think any ship ought ever to be employed on a foreign station in warm climates unless we have this class of men as stokers instead of Europeans. Indeed, I do not see any reason to anticipate any difficulty if we were to employ these men in all our ships, not only in hot climates, but also in the Mediterranean. It is said that in time of war we could not employ these men; but no one who is acquainted with the Punjabis could think that we should have any difficulty. The Punjabi men are as brave as any in the world, and, provided they understood when they were engaged that they would be employed if there was war, we should have no difficulty whatever. I make these suggestions believing in the enormous importance of the strength of our Naval Reserve and the urgent necessity of harmonising our Navy with the merchant navy, so that in time of war we could easily expand it. They occur to me to be in connection with the question asked by my noble Friend, and I sincerely trust when the noble Lord answers on behalf of the Admiralty he will be able to say that they are looking into this question.

*THE EARL OF RAVENSWORTH: My Lords, I do not wish to enter upon any long discussion upon this subject, but merely to put one or two questions. I think the House will admit that the two noble Lords opposite have done a valuable public service in directing attention to the condition of our Naval Reserve. We are accustomed in this country to regard it as drawn from the cream of the Merchant Service; but both my noble Friends have pointed out that the conditions of service in the Navy are so different from what they are in the Merchant Service that it is impossible to regard the Reserves as a thoroughly efficient force unless they consist of men who have been brought into contact with the sailors of the Royal Navy face to face with work on board a man-of-war. The handling of one of our battle ships, cruisers, or gunboats requires an experience very different from any that can possibly be obtained on board a merchant vessel of whatever kind. Merchant seamen, therefore, are not fitted without special training for service on board a man-of-war, and unless they are brought into communication as often as possible with the sailors of the Royal Navy. The question which I want particularly to put to my noble Friend who will reply is this, what proportion of the whole number of 18,000 men of the Royal Naval Reserve are called out every year? For without that information it is impossible to know whether the whole force has ever been called out, and unless all are periodically called out and trained on board Her Majesty's ships it is impossible to have a thoroughly effective force. If the noble Lord can tell us what proportion is called out every year we can form our own conclusions as to what number of years would be required for training the whole force. It is important also to know whether in all cases gunnery practice is required to be carried on at sea by the Naval Reserve. Those are two points upon which I should like to have some explanation, and I think the House will admit they are very important ones, in order that we may know whether the Naval Reserve is in that state of efficiency which it ought to be.

*LORD ELPINSTONE: My Lords, if I fail to meet all the points which have been raised by my noble Friend opposite, I must remind him that it was only at 12 o'clock to-day that I was put in possession of the questions he wished to put to me. Although this question as it stands on the Paper is a very innocent-looking one, as put to me by my noble Friend, it has assumed rather formidable proportions. However, I will endeavour to the best of my ability to reply to the points which have been raised. I will at once say that the importance of the Royal Naval Reserve is fully appreciated and recognised by the Admiralty, and, in fact, by all parties. It is not difficult to make suggestions that in the abstract appear admirable; but when these suggestions are investigated in detail, they are not found to lead to practical attainable results. We have two classes of Naval Volunteers. The first is the Royal Naval Reserve, a force composed of nearly 20,000 officers and men who have followed the sea as a profession; the second is the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers, a force of 2,038 with an entirely different organisation, the members of it being recruited from every profession and trade. In the question, as put by my noble Friend Lord Brassey, he calls attention to the state of those two forces. The state of the Royal Naval Reserve is in every way satisfactory. There has been a steady increase in all the ranks during the last year, as shown by the following figures. There are 558 officers of all ranks, which is an increase of 183 since June, 1889. Of men of all classes there are 19,293, an increase on the year of 267. These figures make a total of 19,851, an increase on the year of 450. It is not intended to embark any of the seamen or stokers of this reserve during the forthcoming manœuvres, but officers of the Royal Naval Reserve who may volunteer will be appointed to ships, and I may mention that up to the present time 15 have volunteered. This is totally independent of the number of Royal Naval Reserve officers, who were allowed to go on board for their annual training in the fleet, and that number, limited to 20, are already serving their year in Her Majesty's ships, namely, five lieutenants, 11 sub-lieutenants, and four engineers. The reason why it is not intended to embark any of the Royal Naval Reserve during the manœuvres is that the embarking section of the coastguard, numbering 1,972, will be embarked, and will be quite sufficient to fill up all the ships employed in the manœuvres without calling out any of the Reserve Forces. It is found in every way advisable to employ our own coastguardmen on board ship. In order to keep this thoroughly reliable and always available reserve in a state of efficiency it is absolutely necessary that they should be embarked every other year. They are the first people we look to to put on board, even before the Royal Naval Reserves. As to the number of inexperienced stokers, to which Lord Brassey has referred, it is not possible suddenly to increase the number of men employed in any one trade unless there is an extraneous source of supply, and that particularly applies to stokers. The number of suitable men in the Mercantile Marine is not considerable, and, indeed, is barely sufficient to meet its own requirements; but satisfactory progress has been and is being made on this point, and it is one which has been occupying really the serious attention of the Admiralty. In the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers there has been an increase of 21 during the last 12 months. The manner in which their services could be most usefully employed in the event of war is a question that has received a great deal of consideration at the Admiralty. One of the difficulties, as I have explained more than once during last Session, is that by the Act of Parliament under which they were enrolled the Admiralty has power to employ them (unless they otherwise consent) only in ships engaged in the defence of the coasts of the United Kingdom, the Channel Islands, the Isle of Man, and the seas adjacent. Under such circumstances, the Admiralty would naturally hesitate to embark these men on board a ship of war, which might at any moment be ordered on distant service. Lord Sidmouth, who put a question to me on this subject last year, said that the Volunteers were ready to go to any part of the world, and I say all praise to them for that; I have no doubt that Lord Sidmouth was right, and the majority would be actuated by that patriotic sentiment. Lord Brassey suggests the possibility of affiliating them with the Royal Marine Artillery. There is much to be said in favour of such a proposal. I wish I could see the probability of that being carried out, and I think Admiral Sir George Tryon, to whom he referred, is also in favour of that proposal. But I would ask my noble Friend has he ever fairly considered the difficulties—for there would be very serious difficulties—in carrying it out. Has he ever seriously considered those difficulties himself? Of what are the two forces composed? As I have already explained, the Royal Naval Reserve is composed of men who have followed the sea as a profession, both as to officers and men. Among them are to be found some of the very best men in the Mercantile Marine. The Naval Artillery Volunteers, on the other hand, are men enrolled from all professions and trades. Has the noble Lord ever seen Returns of the various professions and trades of which this force is composed? They are very remarkable. The Returns of last December show that it contains members of no fewer than 254 different professions and trades. All good and gallant men, no doubt, but they are not seamen. The class most fully represented is that of clerks, of whom there are 439, and the number of men in any way, however remotely, who are connected with the sea, is under 150. That is the position of the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers. It is difficult to mix oil and water, and I would venture to ask whether Lord Brassey does not think that it would be very difficult to get those gentlemen to join the Marine Artillery? I do not know whether the noble Lord has taken any steps to ascertain their feelings in the matter, but I am afraid it would be found that there were difficulties in the way. I stated last year that the Admiralty suggested that the commanding officers of the different divisions of corps or stations should meet and submit a plan by which the services of the Royal Naval Reserves could, in their opinion, be utilised to the greatest advantage. They met in Spring Gardens in June of last year, and they sent in suggestions and submitted their views. I can only say that those suggestions have not been lost sight of; but the matter, involving as it does so many serious considerations, is not one that can be settled without very careful thought. Lord Sudeley has practically put three questions to me. First, whether able-bodied seamen should be given their retaining fee in the Royal Naval Reserve unless they could show good discharges from their merchant ships. When my noble Friend first told me of his intention to put this question I confess it struck me very favourably, but on further consideration of the matter I am not at all so clear about it. This is virtually a proposal to discipline merchant ships through the Royal Naval Reserve, and it might in some cases act very prejudicially on the men themselves. For instance, the captain of a merchant ship might hold the granting of a "good discharge" in terrorem over the seaman, the good discharge might be withheld, and the seaman would in that case lose his retaining fee. The Naval Authorities prefer to judge of the men as they find them for themselves, and I may add that very few complaints, indeed, are received or offences recorded against them. Then the noble Lord asks, in the second place, why Punjabees should not be employed in the Royal Naval Reserve, as they were in the P. and O. Company, as stokers in time of war, and for that purpose be trained in time of peace. It is perfectly true that the P. and O. Company employ Punjabees as stokers, but do all the other great steamship lines follow the same system? I am not at all sure that they do. No doubt for ships exceptionally employed, that is to say, in hot climates, those men would be of use as an addition to the stokehold staff; but does the noble Lord suggest that they should be brought to this country and employed in the Channel? Because, once taken on board ship, they must, of course, go wherever the ship goes, and they would scarcely be able to stand our cold climate. In the years 1887 and 1888 a good deal of correspondence passed between the Colonial Office and the colonies on the subject of raising Royal Naval Reserve forces out there, and in June, 1888, a question on that subject was put to me by Lord Brassey. In my reply I told the noble Lord that the answers received were generally unfavourable, and it was therefore decided to take no further action in the matter. That is really a question which must rest primarily with the colonies themselves, some of whom, notably Australasian Colonies, have already a very considerable Naval Service of their own. The noble Lord has pointed out that no inducements are held out to engineers to join the Royal Naval Reserve, and that, in the event of war, it would be impossible to obtain them from merchant ships. The noble Lord further said that similar inducements should be held out as to lieutenants, and that engineers should be bound to serve a certain time. The subject of engineers has been very much discussed this year at the Admiralty, and it is intended to somewhat improve their position in the Royal Naval Reserve, and to increase their pay when called out for service. The number of engineers enrolled has considerably increased. During the last year it has increased by 33, or double the increase of last year, and the number of firemen has been increased by 50. As my noble Friend will allow, there are, of course, considerable difficulties to be overcome in reconciling the interests of the State with the interests of individuals. The Admiralty want to get the best men, but the best men are fully employed in the mercantile marine and elsewhere. Shipowners, of course, have a difficulty in sparing them, because their ships are hardly ever at rest; and if the men left their ships, even for a short time, to meet Admiralty requirements for training, their places would at once be filled up, and their professional interests would suffer materially, to an extent far beyond any advantages the Government could offer. The only other point to be mentioned, I think, is that all officers and men enrolled in the Royal Naval Reserve, or Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers, are bound to serve when called out. The noble Earl, Lord Ravensworth, put two questions to me just now, but I am afraid I am not in a position to answer them at present. He will see that the question put to me by the noble Lord opposite did not lead me to expect that I should be asked those two questions, but I will endeavour to get him the information if he desires it. I should not like, by attempting to answer them off hand, to perhaps mislead him.

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes past Six o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

Lord Elphinstone

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 3rd July, 1890.

QUESTIONS.

ZULULAND.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, with reference to the following passage on page 11 of the Report on the Blue Book for Zululand, 1889: "number of prisoners committed to Etchowe Gaol 113, average daily number in gaol 43," how many cells in Etchowe Prison are exclusively reserved for prisoners, and what is the size of those cells?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The gaol at Etchowe comprises seven wards for the confinement of prisoners, the gross area of which is believed to be about 9,000 cubic feet.

INDIAN STAMPS.

MR. R. POWER (Waterford): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House any applications which, during the course of the past 18 months, have been forwarded to the Lords of the Treasury by Mr. J. S. Purcell, C.B., the Controller of Stamps, on the subject of the remuneration paid him for controlling the manufacture of Indian stamps and stamped papers, together with any Reports addressed to their Lordships by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue relative thereto, and any replies to the same which have been sent from the Treasury to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue or to Mr. Purcell; and whether a further appeal from Mr. Purcell, dated the 21st April last, has been received at the Treasury; and, if so, whether any reply has been made thereto?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): It would be very unusual to lay on the Table the correspondence which may have passed between different Departments of the Government. There are very strong objection to such a course. The matter is now under consideration, and, of course, a reply will be made to the further appeal of Mr. Purcell.

NATIVE INDIAN SIGNALLERS.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether, in view of his statement that the native Indian signallers have never been entitled to house allowance in lieu of accommodation in a telegraph building, he will make inquiries from India as to whether it is a fact that such allowance has been made to the signallers, both European and Indian, and for what period; and whether the Secretary of State will give instructions that where identical duties are performed by officers of the Department, and where no social or religious customs forbid occupancy of quarters in the telegraph building, equality of treatment shall be accorded European and Indian Officials alike?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The Secretary of State has satisfied himself by reference to the best authority that no such allowance has ever been made and no further inquiry seems to be necessary. Equality of treatment has always been, and always will be, accorded to European and Indian officials alike.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Upon that statement I will supply the right hon. Gentleman with a list showing the cases in which there has been a difference.

MORTALITY IN THE ASSAM TEA GARDENS.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to a statement made by Doaraka Nath Ganguli, Assistant Secretary to the Indian Association at Calcutta, in reference to the excessive mortality on the tea plantations in Assam, wherein he states that the rate per million of deaths among Act labourers was in 1883, 61.5; 1884, 58.9; 1885, 51.5; 1886, 58.9; 1887, 57.2; 1888, 62.9.

"The Report of the year 1888 is the latest one yet received, and it does not show that, so far as the percentage of death is concerned, there has been any progress except in the downward direction.

"In 1888 there were two gardens, in one of which the rate of mortality was 301.6 and in the other 309.5";

and whether he will call the attention of the Indian Government to this high rate of mortality, with a view to their seeing that the provisions of the Act for the protection of coolies is thoroughly enforced?

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I also wish to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether of late years any tea gardens in Assam have been closed by Government, as respects indentured labourers, under the powers provided by the law when the mortality has been excessive; and if not, why, having regard to the very excessive mortality in some gardens, the law has not been enforced as it was in former years?

SIR J. GORST: Yes, Sir; the rates of mortality given in the question of the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith) are correct per thousand. The mortality in the tea gardens has been engaging the attention of the Secretary of State and the Government of India ceaselessly for years past, and, as I have on several occasions stated to the House, a special investigation is going on now. In reply to the question of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir G. Campbell), I have to say that no tea gardens have been closed since the year 1884, because, in the opinion of the Sanitary officers, the remedial measures which have been enforced were more efficacious than closure.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that either by law or regulation it has been the invariable practice to close these gardens when the mortality has exceeded 100 in the 1,000, and the right hon. Gentleman has admitted that in 1888 there were two cases in which the mortality was upwards of 300 per 1,000?

SIR J. GORST: I believe it used to be the case to shut up the gardens when the mortality rose to a certain amount; but now, under new sanitary arrangements, instead of shutting them up, preventive sanitary measures are prescribed and enforced.

MAMLATDAR WITNESSES AND THE CRAWFORD CASE.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to the protest of the civilians of the Bombay Presidency against the treatment of the Mamlatdar witnesses in the Crawford case, and especially to the strong language of Mr. Probert, a British official of 35 years' standing in India, wherein he condemns the breach of faith as fatal to the prestige of the British name; and whether the Government will give an opportunity for a full discussion of this question, so vitally connected with the reputation for good faith of the British Government in India?

SIR J. GORST : Yes, Sir; and the strong language used by Mr. Probert will be found in Parliamentary Paper No. 131 presented this Session. The Secretary of State has no objection to the fullest discussion of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in requiring the removal of officers who have been guilty of corruption from the position of Judges.

THE INDIAN MIDLAND RAILWAY.

MR. BRADLAUGH : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State is aware of the grievances under which certain chiefs of Bundelkund, Central India, are suffering in connection with the construction of the Indian Midland Railway; whether the Secretary to the Government of India, Public Courts Department, in Order No. 272, R. C., dated 7th of April, 1886, referring to this railway, said—

"The Government of India is willing to award compensation for such lands as were taken up from the several Durbars for a temporary purpose, and now occupied permanently;" whether on the 12th of April, 1886, instructions were issued by the Political Agent in Bundelkund to the States of Orchha, Dultia, Khaniadana, and Samphau, to make over certain specified lands "for permanent occupation" by the Indian Midland Railway, on the express understanding that "full compensation will be given to everyone by the aforesaid company"; whether, when the time came for the settlement of the respective claims, Mr. Henvey, the Agent to the Governor General in Central India, declared that though the railway was for the time in the hands of a company, it should be considered a State Railway; whether Mr. Henvey's orders concluded in these words—

"I am pleased to rule, without the least hesitation, that no claims from any of the chiefs for compensation of any kind should be admitted;"

and whether he will call the attention of the Government of India to the engagements entered into in April 1886, with a view to the withdrawal of the order of Mr. Henvey, and to the payment of the compensation promised, a sum in all of more than five lakhs of rupees?

SIR J. GORST : No representations have been made to the Secretary of State by the chiefs of Bundelkund of any grievances in connection with the construction of the Indian Midland Railway. If such representations were made, they would, of course, be carefully inquired into and considered. The words of the Government of India referred to in paragraph 2 of the question are incorrectly quoted. They should be—

"The Government of India accept the principle of paying compensation for land which has up to date been taken up temporarily under Class B."

They did not refer to all land taken up; they had reference only to the State of Orchha.

IRELAND—POLICE SHADOWING.

MR. WEBB : I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that at Dungarvan, on Friday, 20th June, the Mayor and ex-Mayor of Waterford, engaged on business of a private character, were followed by a policeman a considerable distance out of the town; and whether he will give directions that shadowing of this character be discontinued?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University) : The Constabulary Authorities report that it is not the fact that the Mayor and ex-Mayor of Waterford were shadowed. They appear, however, to have been in the company of a man whose movements are watched by the police, as they have reason to believe that he is endeavouring to promote boycotting and intimidation.

MR. COX : I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether Thomas Fox is being systematically shadowed by the police in County Clare; and, if so, for what purpose?

*MR. MADDEN : The Constabulary Authorities report that it is the case that the movements of the man mentioned are watched by the police in consequence of information in their possession.

MR. COX : Is it not the fact that this man was arrested for firing at Mr. Blood; that when he was brought before the Magistrates he was discharged, and that it is only since his discharge that he has been systematically shadowed?

*MR. MADDEN : My information does not enable me to say whether that is a fact or not.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the report of the trial of Mr. James O'Brien, of Killeagh, at Youghal, County Cork, on Friday last, on a charge under the Criminal Law and Procedure Act of "having obstructed Constable Quinn in the discharge of his duty"; whether he is aware that the Magistrates, Messrs. Hodder and Irwin, inflicted no punishment on the accused, and that the constable swore that the alleged act of obstruction was that the defendant "followed me about, and, in consequence I was unable to discharge my duty;" and, if, in view of the fact that the prisoner was handed over by Constable Quinn to another constable, and taken to Cork Goal for seven days, the Government will award some compensation to Mr. O'Brien for the imprisonment inflicted upon him without trial?

*MR. MADDEN : I am informed that the facts are not accurately represented in the question. The constable's evidence on oath was to the effect that O'Brien had followed him about, pointed him out, and called public attention to him, thereby preventing him from discharging the detective duty on which he was engaged. He was convicted on the charge, but the Magistrates, taking into account the fact that he had been in custody from the 16th to the 20th of June, ordered that he should be further detained in custody only until the rising of the Court.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Are we now informed that it is not permissible for a man who is being shadowed to shadow his own shadow?

*MR. MADDEN : I have stated the facts of the case. The constable was on detective duty and was followed about, pointed out to the public, and prevented from discharging his duty.

MR. DILLON : Does the Attorney General for a moment mean to assert that it is a crime to point out a detective?

*MR. MADDEN : No, Sir; that is not a crime; but following a plain clothes officer about while he is engaged in detective duty, and pointing that officer out as being engaged in such duty, may, in my opinion, amount to an obstruction of the officer in the execution of his duty.

MR. DILLON : Does the right hon. Gentleman lay down that it is a crime to point out a policeman in plain clothes? How is it to be known that a man is a policeman if he is not in uniform?

*MR. MADDEN : I have already said that it is not a crime to point out a policeman dressed in plain clothes; but it is an interference with him in the discharge of his duty to follow him about and point him out to the public.

MR. DILLON : Is the pointing out of a policeman in plain clothes and the following him about sufficient to justify a man being arrested, carried off to gaol, and kept there for several days?

*MR. MADDEN : I certainly do mean to assert and to lay down that obstruction of a policeman in the discharge of his duty may be of a character to constitute an offence.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): May I ask the Home Secretary whether I should be guilty of a crime if I were to go out into Parliament Street and point out and follow one of his plain clothes policemen?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The hon. Member has asked me a highly hypothetical question, which it is impossible to answer.

MR. FLYNN : Under what provision of the law was this man arrested by a second constable and bail refused?

*MR. MADDEN : That does not arise out of the question on the Paper, and I must ask for notice.

MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): Is it not the fact that the man who was arrested was himself being followed by the detective whom he pointed out?

*MR. MADDEN: I have given the House all the information in my possession.

IRISH LETTERS.

MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that there is a printed notice in the Post Office at Harrogate that letters from "London and all parts (except Ireland)" are delivered on Sundays; whether this rule applies to many other places in England; why should such an exception be made; and why is the promised arrangements for Sunday delivery of Irish letters at Newcastle and Staffordshire not being carried out?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that there are no trains by which letters despatched from Ireland on Saturday night can reach Harrogate in time for delivery on Sunday morning. There are other trains in the North of England to which the same remarks apply. As regards Newcastle, Staffordshire, arrangements were made in March last for securing the arrival of Irish letters by first post in the morning, and it was believed at the time that these arrangements would be in force every day, but it proved impracticable to give effect to them on Sunday and Monday mornings. I regret that there are at present no means of providing for a Sunday delivery of Irish letters at Newcastle, Staffordshire.

OUTRAGES IN CLARE.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland how many agrarian outrages were committed in County Clare since 1st July last year; the number of cases of firing at the person or into houses; how many of these had police protection; the number of persons made amenable; and the extra Police Force stationed in the county, and their cost?

*MR. MADDEN: The Constabulary Authorities report that the number of agrarian outrages committed in the County Clare since July 1st, 1889, is 61, of which six were cases of firing at the person and 21 firing into dwellings. In none of these 27 cases had there been police protection, and no person have, so far, been made amenable in regard to to them. According to the last completed accounts, which are for the year to March 31st last, the extra force in this county numbered 168 men, and the charge against the county in respect to them was £5,603.

LICENCE TO CARRY ARMS.

MR. COX: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if Mr. John Cusack, of Island Avanna, Clare Abbey, County Clare, has had his licence to carry arms revoked by order of the Lord Lieutenant; and, if so, what reason has been assigned for this proceeding?

*MR. MADDEN: It is the case that the man mentioned has had his arms licence revoked. It would be inexpedient in the public interest to state the grounds upon which the Lord Lieutenant acted.

LAND COMMISSION—MULLINGAR.

MR. DONAL SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that, on last Thursday, the 26th of June, in the salerooms of P. M'Cormick, auctioneer, of Mullingar, a number of farms, consisting of parts of the lands of Cloncollion, Rahinashiane, Spittaltown, and Killevally, situate in the barony of Moycashel, and County Westmeath, held in fee, containing 334 acres 1 rood and 37 perches, statute measure, or thereabouts, were put up for sale by instructions of the Irish Land Commission; that there was no bidding for the farms; whether by conveyance dated the 17th day of July, 1886, the above lands were conveyed in fee simple, in consideration of £3,840, £2,800 of which was advanced by the Irish Land Commission, and by said deed the said lands were conveyed to the said Irish Land Commission, subject to redemption, and a covenant was entered into to pay the Commission an annuity of £112 for 49 years, from the 1st day of November, 1886, payable half-yearly on every 1st day of May and every 1st day of November; what inquiry did the Land Commission make as to the value of those farms before they advanced such a large sum; and whether they have any expectation of realising any part of the sum so advanced?

MR. MADDEN: The Land Commissioners report that the holding referred to was sold in July, 1886, for £3,840, of which the purchaser paid in cash £1,040, and the Commission advanced £2,800. The holding was advertised for sale to realise one year's annuity, £112 due to the Commission, but the sale was not proceeded with, as the Commissioners ascertained that the purchaser had been recently adjudicated a bankrupt, and the assignee was taking the necessary steps to pay out of the assets the arrears of annuity due, and to realise for the benefit of the creditors the bankrupt's interest in the holding. Before making the advance in 1886, the Commissioners caused the holding to be inspected, and they have no doubt whatever as to the sufficiency of their security.

MR. TUTTE (Westmeath, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that at the last sitting of the Irish Land Sub-Commission in Mullingar the Commissioners announced that the next sitting of the Court would be held on the 24th June, and that in consequence of that statement a large number of tenants came to the town on that day under the impression that their cases would be heard, but were obliged to return as the Commissioners did not attend; and whether he will take steps to prevent the tenants in future being put to such unnecessary loss and inconvenience, and that proper notice shall be given by the Commissioners when they decide on postponing the sitting of the Court?

MR. MADDEN: The Land Commissioners report that there must have been some misapprehension on the part of the tenants referred to, as no fixtures had been made for the 24th June.

CHARGE AGAINST A POSTMASTER.

MR. W. ABRAHAM (Limerick, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has made inquiry respecting John Cowhey, sub-postmaster at Bruree, and ascertained that this man has been convicted twice of drunkenness and once of serious assault, and was also dismissed from the employment of the Prudential Assurance Company for irregularity in his accounts; and if John Cowhey will still be retained in charge of the Post and Money Order Office at Bruree?

MR. RAIKES: I have now made inquiry into the circumstances to which the hon. Member refers. I find that the convictions alluded to took place some 12 years ago, and, although I was not aware of them when making the appointment, they had been brought to my knowledge before I answered the hon. Member's question on the 5th June. With regard to the alleged dismissal from the employment of the Prudential Assurance Company, I find that there are conflicting statements as to the exact cause which led Mr. Cowhey to relinquish the agency in 1878, and nothing definite can now be ascertained respecting an event which happened so long ago. Since Mr. Cowhey became sub-postmaster the duties of the office have been performed entirely to the satisfaction of the Department, and I should not, therefore, be warranted in depriving him of the appointment which I conferred upon him in December last.

MR. W. ABRAHAM: These convictions occurred in 1885, and not 12 years ago; and if the right hon. Gentleman will put himself in communication with the Secretary of the Assurance Company he will find that Cowhey did not resign, but was dismissed. I wish to know whether a man whose character is so notorious is to be retained in the Public Service?

MR. RAIKES: The statement made by the hon. Member is not contained in the information furnished to me.

MR. W. ABRAHAM: I will furnish the right hon. Gentleman with a copy of the convictions at the Magistrates' Court.

INLAND REVENUE OFFICERS.

MR. MURPHY: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether complaints have reached him that officers of the Inland Revenue Department are often, on slight complaints, removed at their own expense to distant parts of the United Kingdom; whether quite recently, an officer was censured and ordered to be removed from Dublin to Aberdeen, although he denied the truth of the complaint upon which the order of removal was made, and demanded an investigation, stating that he could produce several witnesses on oath to prove his innocence; whether, notwithstanding all this, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue refused any inquiry, and, as a consequence, he has to remove his family at very great expense from Dublin to Aberdeen; and whether, on inquiry, he will interfere to prevent similar cases, which are at present the cause of much discontent in the Inland Revenue Department?

MR. GOSCHEN: It is not true that Inland Revenue officers are often removed on slight complaints to distant parts of the United Kingdom; but such a measure has to be taken from time to time in the interests of discipline where serious misconduct has occurred, and I do not propose to interfere with the discretion of the Board in this matter. In the case to which the hon. Member refers previous complaints had been made of the officer's conduct, and he had an opportunity of producing witnesses when the charge was made.

TITHES IN IRELAND.

MR. JASPER MORE (Shropshire, Ludlow): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland, with respect to the 1 & 2 Vict., c. 109, intituled "An Act to abolish to Compositions for Tithes in Ireland and to substitute Rent-Charge in lieu thereof," whether the 32nd section, which makes tithe rent-charge variable every seven years when the average price of corn for the seven years preceding the application, as advertised in the Dublin Gazette, varied by 1-10th from the original standard, is still operative in the case of lay tithes; and whether applications to vary the amount of lay tithes at the end of the septennial period, in accordance with the fall in the price of corn aforesaid, have been made this year in Ireland and have been allowed?

*MR. MADDEN: The section referred to is still in force, and the tithe rent-charge is still liable to revision. I am informed that several applications to vary the amount of lay tithes have been made under the section.

MR. S. LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): Is it true that no remission has been made this year to the tithe-payers on account of agricultural depression?

*MR. MADDEN: The question on the Paper relates to lay tithes. The Ecclesiastical tithes are vested in the Land Commissioners, and no periodical revision is possible.

Mr. Murphy

THE TIPPERARY MAGISTRATES.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he will consent to the issue of a Return showing the attendance of Local Magistrates at weekly Petty Sessions in Tipperary from June 1888 to June 1890, and the attendance of Stipendiary Magistrates during same period?

*MR. MADDEN: I must ask the hon. Member to postpone the question until I can obtain the information.

THE LOCAL TAXATION (CUSTOMS AND EXCISE) DUTIES BILL.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government, having regard to the evidence of Irish opinion afforded by the introduction of the Agricultural Labourers (Ireland) Bill now before the House, and the proceedings upon that measure, will appropriate the unallotted balance of Ireland's share of the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties, in aid of the provision of dwellings for Irish agricultural labourers, upon the principles indicated in the Bill?

MR. W. MACDONALD (Queen's Co., Ossory): In view of the admission of the Chief Secretary, that the national school teachers of Ireland are insufficiently remunerated, will the right hon. Gentleman consider the advisability of devoting a considerable portion of the money to bettering their condition?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) will not be surprised to hear me repeat the answer already given in this House. The Government are giving full consideration to the various suggestions made in different parts of the House, and will state their views to the House as soon as they have arrived at a conclusion.

MR. SEXTON: How soon?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I must ask for a little time.

MR. SEXTON: What notice will the right hon. Gentleman give? The Bill, I see, is down on to-day's Paper. It is desirable that notice should be given in order that Members may put down Amendments.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Every notice will be given.

ADMIRALTY—COMPOSITIONS FOR SHIPS' BOTTOMS.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I beg to defer until Tuesday the question in my name, to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty who is the officer responsible for the selection of the compositions that are ordered from time to time to be used on the bottoms of Her Majesty's ships; is this officer an expert, and what previous technical experience and education has he had to qualify him for this important duty; and by whom was he appointed, for how long, and has the appointment been sanctioned by the Treasury?

THE POLICE IN MONK BRETTON.

EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received complaints from certain inhabitants in Monk Bretton, Barnsley, against the police in that district; whether he is aware that, since the complaints were made, one constable has been removed from the district; whether he is aware that it is alleged that perjury was committed by the police, and that innocent persons have in several cases been fined; whether he is aware that application has been made to the Standing Joint Committee at Wakefield, who have replied that they are not a Court of Appeal, and have no power to review the decision of the Justices in the above-referred to cases; and whether he will take some steps in justice to those who were, it is stated, unjustly fined, as well as in justice to the accused police, to institute an inquiry into the whole matter?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; I have received such a complaint. I am informed by the Chief Constable that a constable has been lately removed from the district for the benefit of the Service, and not in consequence of any complaints or of impropriety on his part. General allegations have been made to me of perjury on the part of the police, but no particular case, in which justice is alleged to have miscarried, has been brought to my notice. I am informed by the Standing Joint Committee that a statement to the same effect has been laid before them, but, with one or two exceptions, the cases referred to had been tried before Justices, and the Committee could not re-try them. In many of the cases, moreover, I am informed that the prisoners summoned had pleaded guilty. The Chief Constable has, on two occasions, personally investigated, on the spot, these complaints, and the complainants have expressed themselves to him as being perfectly satisfied. Under these circumstances, I see no ground for interference on my part, but I am prepared to make careful inquiry into any particular case of alleged injustice if I am duly furnished with dates and particulars.

THE GRIEVANCES OF THE TELEGRAPHISTS.

EARL COMPTON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General when he will be able to state to the House the result of the Departmental Committee inquiry into the telegraphists' grievances; whether a statement will be made before the Post Office Estimates are taken in Supply; and, whether, if any beneficial changes are adopted in the matter of overtime, increased holidays, sick pay, &c., they will date from the 1st April, in accordance with the precedent of Mr. Fawcett's Scheme of 1881?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the noble Lord, I have to inform the House that I have carefully examined the Report of the Committee referred to, and have formed my conclusions thereon. I forwarded a copy of the Report to the Lords of the Treasury a few days ago. I shall be in a position to make a statement relating to this matter as soon as the Government has arrived at its decision, and I hope before the Post Office Estimates are taken in Supply. I fear that it will not be practicable to adopt the suggestion conveyed in the last part of the noble Lord's question.

EARL COMPTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there is some danger of the question of overtime being raised by the telegraphists in a very inconvenient manner about the 12th of this month?

*MR. RAIKES: Some rumours have reached me of a probable course of conduct on the part of some of the telegraphists employed in the Central Office, which conduct, I am sure, the noble Lord would be the first to condemn. Her Majesty's Government must be guided not so much by the attitude of the telegraphists, as by what we consider to be the real exigencies of the case.

EARL COMPTON: I asked whether, in consequence of there being great disaffection on the subject of overtime, it would not be possible to state before the 12th of July what course the Government intend to take in regard to this question?

MR. RAIKES: I should be extremely glad if I am in a position to make a statement on all the subjects before the 12th of July.

CUSTOMS OFFICERS AT RYDE.

COLONEL MALCOLM (Argyllshire): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Customs Officers at Ryde have any right to detain the luggage (handbags) of professional and other gentlemen landing from yachts which have had no communication with a Foreign shore; whether, in case of their having such power, he will take care that in future an examining officer shall be available at Ryde, thus rendering such detention unnecessary; and what compensation he is prepared to grant to such gentlemen for the trouble and serious inconvenience caused by their having to leave their bags open, when obliged by important business to proceed on their journey, although they offered to have them searched on the spot?

MR. JACKSON: I understand that there is no fixed Customs establishment at Ryde, and that when baggage or other goods are landed there an officer is sent by the collector at Cowes specially to make the necessary examination. I am informed that in the case referred to by my hon. and gallant Friend information as to the landing of the baggage was received at 9.40 a.m., and the baggage was delivered at 10.30. I am sorry if there has been any inconvenience, but the Customs business at Ryde is not sufficient to justify a fixed establishment, and Ryde is, in fact, not a place approved for the landing and examination of goods or baggage. I have drawn the attention of the Customs Department to the facts of the case.

Mr. Raikes

LIQUIDS BY SAMPLE POST.

MR. BAIRD (Glasgow, Central): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is the case that the United Kingdom is the only country in the Postal Union in which liquids are not permitted to be sent in glass bottles by sample post; whether the object of the regulation is to secure the safety of the contents of the mail bags; and whether that safety would be secured by forbidding liquids to be sent by sample post unless the bottles are enclosed in cases sanctioned by the Post Office?

MR. RAIKES: It is not the case that the United Kingdom is the only country in the Postal Union in which liquids are not permitted to be sent in glass bottles by sample post. The object of the regulation is, as my hon. Friend supposes, to secure the safety of the contents of the mail bags. That safety cannot be secured in the way suggested, because it is not possible to make up bottles of liquid in such a manner as to meet the two opposing essentials of absolute safety and perfect facility of examination. I think I had the pleasure of explaining this matter to my hon. Friend very fully by letter on the 13th of May.

CRIME IN WHITECHAPEL.

MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any Report or complaint has been received at the Home Office or by the Police Authorities respecting an area in Whitechapel intersected by Flower and Dean Street; whether the police have reported as to the existence of crime and vice in that locality; and if he will allow that Report to be made public; and whether any effort has been made by the owner or by the police to remedy the evils complained of?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; in December last the vicar of St. Jude's brought under my notice the evil state of the district referred to. The Commissioner of Police, whom I consulted on the subject, reported in substance that vice of the lowest type finds a refuge in parts of Whitechapel. The police do all in their power to keep violence and vice within bounds, but their duties are confined to the streets; in fact, extra constables are continuously on duty there on special beats. It is only by bringing influence to bear on the landlords that a better class of dwellings can be provided, and so, gradually, a better class of tenants secured. I regret to say that I am informed by the Commissioner that no substantial efforts have been made by the owners of the property in this neighbourhood to effect improvements, the neighbourhood being in much the same condition as it has been for some years. The lease of some of the property is running out, and it is to be hoped that at the expiration changes will be effected and improvements made.

STAMP DUTY ON BONDS.

MR. MONTAGU: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he can state the amount received during the year ending 31st December, 1889, on account of the 1s. per cent. stamps on bonds and shares to bearer?

MR. GOSCHEN: The amount received during the year ending 31st December, 1889, was nearly £98,000.

TURKISH STOCKS.

MR. MONTAGU: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the fact that several Turkish Stocks are being converted or paid off, he will take similar measures with regard to the Turkish Four per Cent. Guaranteed Stock and Drawn Bonds, on which an excessive interest continues to be paid by this country jointly with France?

MR. GOSCHEN: The Turkish Guaranteed Loan of 1855, of course, stands on a footing wholly different to that on which other Turkish Stocks stand, and so is in no way connected with any conversion which may be in contemplation for them. But, as has been previously stated to the House, Her Majesty's Government would gladly avail themselves of any suitable opportunity which may occur of placing the Guaranteed Stock on an improved basis, and though such an opportunity has not yet occurred, the question is one which is present to the minds of Her Majesty's Government with a view of coming to some arrangement with the French and Turkish Governments, which are both concerned in the matter.

*MR. MONTAGU: Is it not possible to pay off these Bonds upon which this high rate of interest is being paid and hold them over in some Government Department pending a future settlement with France?

MR. GOSCHEN: I think that such a course would be scarcely possible, but it may be possible to come to some arrangement about them.

FLASHING SIGNALS—ADMIRAL COLOMB'S INVENTION.

ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is true, as intimated by Lord Elphinstone, on Friday last, that £2,000 was all the Treasury intended to give Admiral Colomb for inventions which, on the high authority of Admiral Sir Geoffrey Hornby, have enabled the British Navy to navigate in safety for the last 20 years; and, if so, whether he will grant a Return showing the sums granted to other inventors on account of real or supposed benefit to the Navy and Army respectively from their inventions during that period?

MR. GOSCHEN: I must ask my hon. and gallant Friend to postpone the question until to-morrow. I have not yet had an opportunity of obtaining the information that would enable me to answer it.

TELEPHONE COMPANIES.

MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with reference to the recent announcement, whether he is now able to state the grounds on which the Government have decided not to avail themselves of their right to give notice before the end of the present month to purchase the undertakings of the Telephone Companies?

MR. GOSCHEN: I submit to my right hon. Friend that it would be better to state the full grounds upon which this important decision had been arrived at when the matter could be treated as one of argument rather than one to be answered across the Table of the House. The reasons for the decision are numerous, and I think they will commend themselves to the right hon. Gentleman. It would be a large undertaking to buy up and conduct the whole of the telephone establishments in the United Kingdom, and the Government do not see their way to multiply these undertakings, which must be conducted at very considerable cost. We hold strong views on the subject, and I repeat that it would be better to treat it as one of argument than one of question and answer.

*MR. CHILDERS: I am inclined to agree to some extent with my right hon. Friend. May I ask him whether he will have any objection to lay Papers on the Table of the House, as we are absolutely without information on the subject?

MR. GOSCHEN: I will consider the point, which is one of great interest, I know.

THE MURTHLY ESTATE.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the evidence recently given in the Court of Session in the case of "Kennedy v. Stewart" as to the part played by Mr. Duncan, Chief Clerk in the Crown Office, from which it appears that Mr. Duncan absented himself from his duties and went to Murthly for the purpose of assisting in the purchase of that estate; and, if so, whether the Crown Agent, as head of the office, was informed of the reason of his absence and sanctioned it; whether he has observed that it was proved that, with a view to misleading the intending vendor, Mr. Duncan allowed it to be falsely stated, without contradiction, that neither the Crown Agent or the firm of solicitors of which he is a member had anything to do with the intended purchase; that Mr. Duncan, in order further to mislead the intending vendor, allowed, without contradiction, a false address to be ascribed to himself; and that the Jury in the case unanimously decided that the misrepresentations to which Mr. Duncan was a party formed sufficient ground for quashing the sale of the Murthly estate; whether the Crown Office was used for the transaction of any business relating to the purchase of the Murthly estate; and whether Government has taken, or purpose taking, any steps in connection with Mr. Duncan's conduct as disclosed at the trial?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): My attention has been called to the evidence given in the Court of Session in the case referred to, for I was one of the counsel engaged in it. In reply to the first part of the question, I have to say that Mr. Duncan obtained leave of absence on the day mentioned. My answer to all the rest of the question is in the negative. The Jury gave a verdict on issues which expressly ascribed the misrepresentations to a third party, and Mr. Duncan was cognisant of none of those misrepresentations until after they are alleged to have been made. It is only fair to Mr. Duncan to add that I share the strong opinion which all my predecessors have held of his high character and long and valuable public service.

ADULTERATED BUTTER.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade why the Customs and Inland Revenue Officers have not in any single instance put into operation the duties imposed on them by Section 8 of the Margarine Act of 1887, which empowered them to take steps to detect the importation of adulterated butter at British ports; and why this duty should be cast on private individuals?

MR. JACKSON: As regards the officers of Customs, I have stated, in answer to previous questions, the grounds on which their action is based. With respect to the remainder of the question, I may point out that powers are given by Section 7 of the Margarine Act of 1887 to any Medical Officer of Health, Inspector of Nuisances, or police constable to take samples as well as to officers of the Inland Revenue. The Act, therefore, apparently contemplates action by Local Authorities, and the Commissioners of Inland Revenue are quite ready to give to such authorities any aid that they can afford.

PLATE DUTY.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it has hitherto been the practice, when the primary duty on the importation or manufacture of an article has been repealed, to discontinue also the Licence Duty charged for dealing in such article; and whether, the Duty on gold or silver plate having been repealed by an Act of this Session, the duty for dealing in these articles will be still continued?

MR. GOSCHEN : No, Sir ; it has not always been the practice to discontinue the Licence Duty for dealing in an article simultaneously with the repeal of the primary duty, and there are cases in which the Licence Duty still exists, though the primary duty has ceased. I may remind the hon. Member that the licences for dealing in plate have passed to the County Councils, and that their repeal is a question which affects local finance.

THE NEW CODE.

MR. PICTON (Leicester) : I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he will re-consider the possibility of devising means to encourage collegiate training for teachers without permanently maintaining throughout an experienced teacher's life the distinction laid down in Article 73 of the New Code ; whether he will substitute the terms "collegiate," and "non-collegiate," for "trained," and "untrained," where the purpose is to distinguish teachers with the double training of pupil-teachership and college from those who have only the training of pupil teachers ; and whether, in Article 61, he will omit the words "will not be permitted to superintend pupil teachers," and substitute "will not be recognised as certificated," thus offering an incentive to secure the advantages of a training college ?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford) : The hon. Member is mistaken in supposing that the distinction laid down in Article 73 will be permanently maintained throughout an experienced teacher's life, as it ceases to apply to any teacher who obtains charge of a school. I have already intimated my intention to substitute other words for the terms "trained" and "untrained ;" but an alteration of Article 61 in the way suggested would not, in my opinion, offer the desired incentive, and lies altogether outside the scope and object of the Article in question.

ARMENIA.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to further information about Armenia in the Daily News of 1st July, namely, that Hussein Bey, of Hosh, in the neighbourhood of Kharpout, who is said to have slaughtered 15 Armenians during his career, has been released from Erzeroum Gaol and appointed to a high public office in Kharpout, and that the Armenian inhabitants are panic-stricken in consequence ; whether there are still political prisoners from Armenia in the gaols of Erzeroum and Erzingan, who have been lying for two years and a half in gaol without trial ; and whether he will inquire into these allegations, and, if he finds them correct, take means to remedy the evils ? I wish further to ask whether it is true, as stated in a daily paper, that Russian troops are moving towards the Armenian frontier to compel payment of the indemnity, and to protect the Armenians from further outrage on the part of the Khurds ?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.) : No information in corroboration of these statements has been received by Her Majesty's Government ; but the attention of Her Majesty's Consular Representatives on the spot will be called to them.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.) : What is the date of the last Report from Constantinople or Erzeroum ? The statements referred to in the question appeared some time ago.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON : The question put to me referred to a telegram in the Daily News of the 1st of July, and it is obvious that no Despatches could possibly have reached this country from Erzeroum at the present date. It is no part of the duty of our Representatives to give currency to every rumour that may reach them until it is confirmed.

"MITCHELL V. REGINA."

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he has received any application from the suppliant in "Mitchell v. Regina" for aid to pay the taxed costs of an action for false imprisonment he was virtually compelled to bring against the Sheriff (or Bailiff) of the Salford Court, Manchester, in consequence of not having received money due from the War Office ; and what steps he intends to take in the matter ?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): Yes, Sir; such an application has been received. I am unable to say what steps will be taken in the matter.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury what steps, if any, will be taken against Messrs. Hare and Co., the agents to the Treasury, as regards the difference between the original and taxed bill of costs in "Mitchell v. Regina," and whether such difference will have to be borne by the taxpayers; and have Messrs. Hare and Co. been called upon for an explanation of the excessive charges in question?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): My right hon. Friend has requested me to answer this question. No steps will be taken against Messrs. Hare, as they have not made any excessive charges. The difference between the amount of the Bill, as delivered and as taxed, arose almost entirely in consequence of a decision of the Master upon a new point. I myself directed, solely out of consideration for Colonel Mitchell, that no further steps should be taken to question the decision in this case.

STREET PROCESSIONS.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Penryn and Falmouth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has seen a paragraph in the Times newspaper of Tuesday to the effect that certain persons, styling themselves "the Open Air Meeting Committee," intend to march in procession from Clerkenwell Green to Hyde Park on Saturday next; and whether he will take steps to prevent proceedings and obstructions in the public thoroughfares, which are contrary to the wishes of the ratepayers and inhabitants of the Metropolis, and which materially interfere with their ordinary occupations and business?

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): Has the attention of the right hon. Gentleman been called to the decision of the Lord Chief Justice in the case of the "Queen against Booth and others," in which Lord Coleridge laid down that processions in Whitechurch, although creating a temporary inconvenience, were not unlawful, and did not constitute an indictable offence?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have not yet had the advantage of perusing the Lord Chief Justice's judgment. In regard to the question on the Paper, I am informed by the Commissioner of Police that he has no knowledge of any such procession beyond what is stated in the paper referred to. As usual on such occasions, steps will be taken by him to prevent, as far as possible, obstruction in the streets, and inconvenience to the inhabitants of the Metropolis.

MR. DILLON: On a point of order, Sir, I would direct your attention to the form of the question. In the latter part of it it states that certain proceedings are "contrary to the wishes of the ratepayers and inhabitants of the Metropolis." I wish to ask you whether that statement, being one of a highly debatable character, ought to appear on the Paper, especially in view of the severity with which Irish questions are edited?

*MR. SPEAKER: Any allegation of a fact which is disputed ought not to appear in a question. This, however, is rather an expression of opinion than a statement of fact; but I think it would have been better if it had not been put in.

MR. SEXTON: I would ask you, Sir, whether expressions of opinion, as well as matters of argument, are not equally prohibited by the Standing Orders?

*MR. SPEAKER: It is contrary to the rule to ask a Minister what his opinions are on a given point. Expressions of opinion and allegations of fact that are disputed had better be avoided.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I understand you to say, Sir, that this question is objectionable, and, as two or three similar questions have been put, I would ask whether you will direct that such questions are to be ruled out of order?

*MR. SPEAKER: Yes; I can always direct a question to be ruled out of order if I think it to be so.

*MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I would ask, Sir, by whose authority the question appears in its present form, because repeatedly it has happened that questions handed in at the Table are edited and expressions of opinion struck out, when the question is put by any Member on this side of the House?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is under some misapprehension. This question was not altered; it was an omission that it was not noticed. I think it ought to have been altered, but in the multiplicity of questions it escaped notice.

DAMARALAND.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Colonial Office has received any communications from the Government of the Cape, through the Agent General or otherwise, in reference to the confirmation of, or the continuance of, German influence over the immense territories of Damaraland and Namaqualand lying adjacent to British territory in South Africa, and, if so, whether he will state to the House the purport of such communications; and whether it is true that Kamaherero, the King of the Damaras, is desirous of coming under British protection?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Some confidential communications have passed with the Cape Ministers on this subject, but it would not be desirable to state the effect of them as negotiations are going on. Kamaherero has, in past years, expressed a desire to come under British protection, but the answer has always been that as Damaraland has been recognised as under German jurisdiction his wish cannot be met.

TABLE BAY FORTS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to complaints in the Cape Parliament that the Imperial Government had not carried out their part of the contract in regard to the armament of Table Bay Forts, whereas the Cape Government had fulfilled their part of the agreement in the construction of earthworks, and otherwise; what is the cause of the delay; and whether the guns and equipment are being manufactured at Woolwich, or by private firms?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Out of 40 guns for these forts, 31 have been issued, and of the remainder, all that are practically important should be issued by September, and the whole by the end of the year. The guns themselves are almost all ready, but delay has arisen with regard to the carriages. Some are manufactured by private firms and some at Woolwich.

BERMUDA.

SIR JOHN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he would state what was the aggregate number of members of the seven Committees, which, without a common link between them, have, at different times, advised the Secretary of State with regard to the defences of Bermuda, referred to in paragraph 65, page 22, Report of the Royal Commission on the Naval and Military Departments; and what was the aggregate number of naval, military, and civilian members respectively who served on these Committees?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Twenty-seven Military, 5 Naval Officers, and 14 civilians, at one time or another, have been consulted as to some part of this question. The case referred to could not occur under the organisation now in force.

ORKNEY POLICE.

MR. LYELL (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the management and maintenance of the police in Orkney is vested in the Standing Joint Committee, although the county is exempted from the Police Act of 1857; and, if not, who is responsible for the control and maintenance of the police?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: By Section 76 of the Police Act of 1857, that Statute does not extend to Orkney and Shetland, unless Her Majesty in Council shall so direct. Those counties remain outside the Act of 1857, and the relative Police Clauses of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, an existing police force in Orkney being managed under an arrangement between the county and the burgh of Kirkwall entered into in 1858. I may point out, however, that it is in the power of the County Council to apply to Her Majesty in Council under the 76th section of the Act of 1857 for a direction that that Act shall extend to the County of Orkney.

THE POLICE AND THE RIGHT OF PETITION.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make inquiries about the alleged tearing up of a Petition from the police constables at Hunter Street Station, by Sub-Divisional Inspector Wakeford; and if the police are denied the right of petition?

*MR. MATTHEWS: I have made inquiry into this matter, and am informed by the Commissioner that no Petition was torn up by Inspector Wakeford. Two report forms, to which it is believed no signatures were attached, were accidentally torn by the act of a police constable. The police are not denied the right of petition. Permission has been given to obtain the signatures of the men at the Hunter Street and other stations to such Petitions as they think fit to adopt.

THE MILITIA.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, by paragraph 359 of the Militia Regulations, Militia officers are specifically debarred from attending the classes formed at the School of Military Engineering, which officers of the regular Infantry are expected to attend; and whether, having regard to the important duties now assigned to the Militia under the mobilisation scheme, he will allow at least one officer in every Militia battalion to attend such classes, in order that in every battalion there may be an officer competent to superintend simple field engineering works. I have further to ask whether it is the intention to carry out the recommendation of the Committee appointed to inquire into certain questions affecting the Militia (Summary, p. xxxii.) that officers who, with the approval of their Commanding Officer and the Colonel of the district, attend garrison classes and obtain certificates, shall receive pay and allowances; also whether it is the fact that, as Colonel Grove states in his evidence before the Committee appointed to inquire into certain questions affecting the Militia (Question 212), the duties for which the Militia would be told off on mobilisation would be, broadly speaking, three, namely, first, to re-inforce the garrisons of all our home fortresses and ports; secondly, to re-place the Line Battalions that would be withdrawn from Ireland; and thirdly, to form the greater portion of the Third Army Corps, the organisation of which is now very nearly complete as regards the troops that are to compose it; if so, what, if any, opportunities are now afforded to Militia officers to learn the tactical part of the duties they would thus be called on to perform under this scheme of mobilisation for home defence?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The staff of officers employed in the instruction of Army officers in garrison classes would not at present suffice if Militia officers were added to the class. Officers of engineer Militia are received at the School of Military Engineering. There is no room in the school for officers of infantry Militia. The duties of the Militia, in case of mobilisation, would be, broadly, as stated by Colonel Grove in his evidence before the Committee appointed to inquire into certain questions affecting the Militia. Militia officers are given every opportunity of presenting themselves at the periodical examinations in tactics. The officers of artillery Militia are virtually practised in tactics, as they are taught to work the heavy guns in the positions which in war they would have to defend.

ANTI-SLAVERY CONFERENCE.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can now say whether the Representatives of the British Government have agreed to make the Anti-Slavery Conference an occasion for imposing heavy duties on merchandise in the free trade area of Africa, and a light or almost nominal duty on spirits; and whether Parliament will be consulted before advantage is taken of a Conference on another subject to put an end to free trade in ordinary merchandise while spirits are admitted on very easy terms?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government have agreed to Import Duties being levied purely for the discharge of the expenditure imposed by the General Act for the Prevention of the Slave Trade. The conditions of the tariff are to be fixed by a negotiation, to be opened immediately after the signature of the General Act.

VENEZUELA.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Venezuelan Government have offered to refer the dispute between them and Great Britain to arbitration; whether Her Majesty's Government have accepted the offer; and, if the offer has been declined, will he state the reason why?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government have made proposals to the Government of Venezuela for the settlement of the question, and have now received from that Government a counter proposal which is under consideration.

THE BRISTOL PILOTS.

MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Provisional Order applied for by the pilots of the Port of Bristol, having for its object the due representation of that Body on the Pilotage Authority, as provided for by the Merchant Shipping (Pilotage) Act of last year, will be introduced and pressed forward during this present Session?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Provisional Order to which my hon. Friend refers has to be finally settled and accepted by the pilots and shipowners who have applied for representation before a Bill to confirm it can be introduced. I intend to introduce such a Bill, if this can be done, in time for the matter to be considered during the present Session.

MALTA.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what are the engagements referred to by Lord Salisbury in his instructions to Sir L. Simmons of 1st August, 1889, under which it is asserted that Her Majesty's Government have come for the enforcement of the Canon Law in Malta; what is the date of these engagements; and where can a copy of them be found?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The engagements referred to are contained in proclamations issued by Mr. Cameron, Civil Commissioner of Malta, dated 15th July, 1801, and Sir Thomas Maitland, the first Governor of Malta, dated, 5th October, 1813, copies of which are in the Colonial Office Library.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Canon Law is in its entirety the civil law of Malta; and, if not, what parts of the Canon Law are the civil law of the island, and when and by virtue of what stipulations, proclamations, or enactments did they become so?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: It would not be possible to answer this question without a reference to the colony, but the Governor will be asked to report.

LEEDS GAS COMPANIES.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to the conduct of the gas companies of Leeds, who, by refusing a small rise of wages and other matters to their men, have exposed the Town of Leeds to riots and serious danger; whether he is aware that riots have taken place, that the city is in darkness, and that life and property is in danger; and if he will take steps to bring such a serious state of affairs to a conclusion?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no information as to the particular points in dispute between the Gas Committee and their employés, but I regret to say that I learn from the Mayor that the peace of the town has been very seriously disturbed. All possible steps have been taken to insure the preservation of the peace, and negotiations are now in progress with a view to the settlement of the dispute. A meeting of the council is to be held this afternoon, after which I hope to hear from the Mayor that matters have been satisfactorily arranged, and that the town has resumed its normal state of quietness.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: In reference to the first paragraph of the question, has the attention of the right hon. Gentleman been called to the conduct of the gas companies in Leeds, on whom I charge all the consequences which have ensued?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have received no information as to the points in dispute.

'INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS BILL.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, with a view to obtain the general assent of the House to the Industrial Schools Bill, he can see his way to leave unrepealed Sections 27, 28, and 36 of the Education Act, 1870, so that the powers at present possessed by School Boards of maintaining, managing, and contributing to industrial schools, and of appointing officers for the purpose of bringing industrial school cases before the Magistrates, may be left unaffected?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no assurance that the general assent of the House to the Industrial Schools Bill would be secured even by the radical changes in that Bill suggested by the hon. Member. I hope before long to be able to meet the Representatives of the School Boards, and to discuss with them the provisions they object to, with a view of arriving, if possible, at some arrangement.

THE ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT.

SIR JOSEPH PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Anglo-German agreement provides that the German frontier in the latitude of Lake Ngami and up as far as the 18th degree of South latitude shall coincide with the 21st degree of East longitude, as named in the Despatch of 14th June from Lord Salisbury to Sir E. Malet, or whether it extends as far as to the Victoria Falls on the Zambesi River, as represented on the map in the tea room of the House, to which Members have been referred?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Despatch referred to did not describe the final arrangement, which is correctly shown on the map in the tea room of the House.

MR. BRYCE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State when the full text of the Agreement relating to African affairs and Heligoland, signed at Berlin on Tuesday, 1st of July, by Sir E. Malet and Sir P. Anderson, on behalf of Her Majesty, will be laid before the House; and when the other Papers relating to the negotiations and Agreement with Germany which have been promised will be presented?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Papers relating to this matter will be laid upon the Table as soon as possible.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Anglo-German Agreement has been signed; and, if so, when copies of the Agreement will be in the hands of Members; and when the Bill for the cession of Heligoland will be introduced? The right hon. Gentleman has already answered part of the question, but I hope he will be able to answer the last paragraph.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Agreement has been signed and certain Papers relating to it will be given with it. I believe that the Bill in regard to Heligoland will be introduced in the House of Lords, so, of course, it will not reach us immediately.

MR. WADDY: Are Agreements to be made between the German Empire and our own which will be binding on the House before such Agreements have been laid on the Table?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Agreement in question was made in accordance with Constitutional usage, and will be laid before Parliament accordingly.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith): Will the right hon. Gentleman have a spare sheet put in the map showing the boundary of Damaraland under the German Protectorate before the Anglo-German Agreement?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am afraid that the information desired by my hon. Friend cannot be given. The boundary of Damaraland to the North had not been previously fixed, and any line would be quite imaginary.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether any communications have taken place between the Home Government on the one hand, and the High Commissioner for South Africa and the Government of the Cape Colony on the other, with reference to the proposed Anglo-German Agreement; and, if so, whether he will state to the House what the nature of these communications has been?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Various communications have been received from the High Commissioner expressing a hope that Lake Ngami and district would be preserved to this country. His wishes are carried out by the Anglo-German Agreement. Some communications have also passed with the Cape Government, but of a confidential character, the effect of which it would not be desirable to state, as negotiations are going on.

DORMANT FUNDS IN CHANCERY.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: I beg to ask the Attorney General if, in reference to the dormant funds in Chancery, he will consider whether the publication of the lists may not be made more useful to the public by giving the names of the estates and "matters" which are the subject of the suits, in addition to the titles of the suits; and whether the office still retains its objections to publishing the amounts of money to the credit of each suit?

SIR R. WEBSTER: As to the first paragraph of the hon. Member's question I am informed that the particulars to be given in the lists in question are controlled by the order of the Treasury. I will make inquiry as to whether the suggestion of the hon. Member as to giving increased information is considered desirable. As to the last paragraph, I must refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury. I understand the office still think that, inasmuch as the amounts from time to time vary, it would be inconvenient to attempt to publish the amount of money to the credit of each suit.

COMPANIES (WINDING-UP) BILL.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when the Government propose to proceed with their Companies (Winding-up) Bill, which has already passed the Standing Committee on Trade?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope it may be possible to proceed with the Bill on an early day. I understand it is not likely to give rise to lengthened Debate.

TITHE RIOTS IN WALES.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that violent resistance to the payment of tithe rent-charge has been renewed in Wales; that at Llanefydd, in the Vale of Clwyd, Mr. Stevens and a distraining party were unable to proceed with the recovery of tithe rent-charge by the ordinary means provided by the law owing to the disturbance of rioters; that stones were thrown, and one of the emergency men injured; whether he is also aware that there are at present arrears of tithe rent-charge in Wales amounting to thousands of pounds; that grave breaches of the peace are anticipated during the winter should remedial legislation be any longer denied; and whether, in the interests of law, order, and justice, he will recommend the House to proceed with the Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill in the present Session?

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the unfortunate occurrences referred to in the first paragraph of the question are largely due to the indiscreet and injudicious conduct of Mr. Stevens himself, and that in cases where the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have employed another agent to collect tithes no disturbances whatever have occurred?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I desire to avoid entering into any controversial question as to the action of the officers of the law engaged in collecting tithe, and I trust my hon. Friend will not ask me to express any opinion on the subject. I venture to hope that the tithepayer in Wales will come to see the impost is one which the law requires him to pay, and which he is not entitled to possess himself of, or refrain from paying. All I can say is that I hope the House will be enabled to pass the Bill.

WAR OFFICE AND ADMIRALTY VOTES.

MR. JENNINGS (Stockport): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he has considered that, under the arrangement lately made by the Government, the time allotted for the War Office and the Admiralty Office Votes is likely to be swallowed up by speeches on technical questions of Military and Naval administration, thus preventing any adequate examination of the actual expenditure of those Offices; and whether, having regard to the explicit promises more than once made by the Government that ample opportunity should be afforded early this Session for bringing before Parliament the excessive expenditure in these Offices, he will either postpone a general Debate on the organisation of the Services, or arrange that the Votes shall be taken again at an early date for their proper and legitimate discussion.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I shall endeavour to arrange that an opportunity be given for discussion of the Votes.

THE MAHARAJAH OF KASHMIR.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the refusal of the Secretary of State for India to order any open inquiry into, or to give any opportunity to the Maharajah of Kashmir to be heard against, the allegations of crime, misconduct, and misgovernment, under cover of which the Maharajah has been deprived of his authority and revenues as a reigning feudatory Prince; and whether the Government will consent to the appointment of a Select Committee of this House to inquire into this case?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Maharajah of Kashmir has been required to withdraw for a time from active participation in the Government of his State—not in consequence of allegations of crime and misconduct, but because the reforms urgently required in the interest of the people of Kashmir cannot be carried out without his so doing. No Select Committee could, with advantage to the Public Service, inquire into the case.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: In consequence of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman I beg to give notice that on the conclusion of questions I shall ask leave to move the adjournment of the House.

HELIGOLAND.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, before the cession of Heligoland to Germany was determined upon by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the Governor of the Island was consulted; and, if so, what was the opinion to which he gave expression in relation thereto?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have already stated that the Governor of Heligoland was in England during the time that the cession was being considered; but any communications which passed with him must necessarily be considered as confidential.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): Is there not some kind of Executive Council in Heligoland?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I stated that there was two days ago.

SIR W. LAWSON: Was that Council consulted?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not aware, Sir.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us whether the Governor of Heligoland took any steps himself to ascertain the views of the inhabitants?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have every reason to believe that he was fully informed. As the population of the Island is only 2,000, it cannot be difficult for the Governor to be so informed.

MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel): On behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Hallamshire (Sir F. Mappin) I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, with regard to the statement that the Anglo-German Agreement depended upon the Bill to be introduced to Parliament for the cession of Heligoland, whether there is any truth in the report that the Agreement was signed at Berlin on the 1st inst. by Her Majesty's Representatives; and whether he will state if Her Majesty's Government have anticipated the decision of this House upon a question of such vital importance by permitting the said Agreement to be signed?

SIR G. CAMPBELL: May I ask whether the possession of an island situated in the furthest part of the German Ocean, without a harbour, without water, without even a lawyer, can really constitute a question of vital importance?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is not for me to say what may or may not be deemed a matter of vital importance by the hon. Member. We are frequently reminded by him of matters which he deems to be of vital importance. In reply to the question on the Paper, I have to say that the Article ceding Heligoland makes the cession subject to the assent of the British Parliament.

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Commanding Officers of Her Majesty's vessels have on different occasions ordered the removal of lobster cages set by and belonging to British subjects, and have forbidden the taking of lobsters on certain portions of the Newfoundland coast; if so, were the orders of such Officers given under instructions issued by Her Majesty's Government; will such instructions be laid upon the Table of the House; and under what Law of the Imperial Parliament or the Newfoundland Legislature, or in virtue of what prerogative of the Crown, were such instructions or orders issued or given?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Naval Officers have general instructions that British fishermen should be prevented from interfering in any manner with the free enjoyment of the French fishermen of their rights of fishery, and they have been instructed, as will be seen from Papers recently given to Parliament, to give warning that lobster traps must be removed when French fishermen are actually desirous of fishing in the waters which are occupied by the traps, but that the traps can be re-set after the waters have been left by the French; but it is not intended that French fishermen should be allowed to supplant the traps by any traps of their own. It is the duty of one nation to carry out its Treaty obligations to another, and the above instructions are framed in pursuance of that duty. It is, however, reported in the newspapers that legal proceedings have been taken against the Commander of one of Her Majesty's ships, and, under these circumstances, no answer can be given to the last part of the hon. Member's question.

ZANZIBAR.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether in 1862 an agreement was entered into between this Country and France, by which both countries undertook to respect the independence of Zanzibar; whether in 1885 Germany adhered to that agreement; whether the agreement now entered into between this Country and Germany, by which this Country assumes a Protectorate over Zanzibar, is dependent upon France agreeing to release this Country from the obligation into which she entered in 1862, to respect the independence of Zanzibar; whether the Protectorate involves us in the obligation to defend Zanzibar if attacked by any other Country; whether, by the 23rd Article of the Berlin Conference, any of the signatories to that Act, desiring to establish a Protectorate over any part of the African Continent, must give notice of the intention to the other signatories; and whether this notice has been given in regard to Zanzibar, and to other portions of the African Continent, over which this Country has assumed a Protectorate?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: My answer to the first question is, Yes. As to the second question, Germany adhered to the agreement in 1886. With regard to the third and fourth questions, communications are going on between the two Governments with reference to the Convention of 1862, and I cannot, therefore, say anything with respect to it at present. The 23rd Article of the General Act of the Conference at Berlin (of February 26, 1885) relates to loans. The 34th Article says that any power which henceforth takes possession of a tract of land on the coasts of the African Continent, or assumes a protectorate there, shall notify the same to the other signatory Powers. This engagement only applies to the African coasts, and not to the African Continent generally. This country has not yet assumed a protectorate over the island of Zanzibar.

THE ANTI-SLAVERY CONFERENCE.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the general Act of the Anti-Slavery Conference has been actually signed by all the Powers represented at the Conference with the exception of Turkey and Holland; whether Turkey assents to the Act and will sign the agreement; whether it is true that Holland refuses to sign, and, if so, on what grounds; and whether her refusal will prevent the ratification of the general Act?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The general Act has been signed by all the Powers except Turkey and Holland. The Turkish Plenipotentiary has assented to the Act, and will sign as soon as the necessary authority is received from Constantinople. The Dutch Plenipotentiary assented to the general Act, but not to the declaration attached to it authorising the levy of Import Duties in the conventional basin of the Congo. He did not, therefore, sign. The time allowed for the exchange of ratifications is 12 months. It may be hoped that before that time has expired the assent of Holland will have been obtained.

DETENTION OF PRISONERS.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, N.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland a question without notice. It is, whether his attention has been directed to the occurrences at Waterford Gaol two days ago, when the Governor of the prison refused to admit to bail two prisoners who had a right to be admitted to bail, on the ground, as the Governor stated, that he would not take any bail unless a Resident Magistrate was present; whether this action by the Magistrate was in accordance with the law; whether the excuse given to the two gentlemen who were detained in gaol for 24 hours after they ought to have been released is that the Governor telegraphed to Dublin for instructions, and that the telegraph clerk made a mistake in the reply which was sent; and whether it is not the duty of all Governors of Irish prisons to know under what circumstances prisoners should be admitted to bail?

MR. MADDEN: Perhaps, as I am aware of the facts, the hon. Gentleman will allow me to answer the question. It is the fact that the Governor of the gaol telegraphed to the Prisons Board for instructions. The reply sent was that an ordinary Magistrate could act; but by an error—a rather important error—in transmitting the telegram it arrived in the form that an ordinary Magistrate could not act. That was the cause of the regrettable incident. The hon. Member is quite correct in his views as to the law.

MR. DILLON: This is really a matter of considerable importance. These gentlemen were detained in prison illegally for 24 hours. I want to know why the Governor telegraphed for instructions at all. The law affecting bail prisoners ought to be known to every Governor in Ireland who understands his duty; and what the Attorney General for Ireland has failed to answer is, whether it is not the duty and business of Irish Governors of gaols to know under what circumstances they can admit, or must admit, to bail prisoners who are lying under rule of bail. Did not the Governor in this case break the law, which he ought to have known? If so, what course do the Government intend to take to show their disapprobation of the Governor's conduct?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The idea of reproving the Governor for breaking the law in this case has never entered my head. No doubt it would have been desirable that the Governor should have been thoroughly acquainted with the law, but as he was not certain he did the best thing he could, and telegraphed to Dublin for specific instructions. The error arose, not out of any laches on the part of the Governor, but out of the blunder of the telegraph clerk.

MR. DILLON: Are we to understand that these gentlemen who were illegally detained are to have no redress at all, and does the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that it is not the duty of the Governors of Irish prisons to understand the most elementary conditions of their duty? I would ask whether the Governor's ignorance of the law is not the result of gross and culpable negligence?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot agree with the hon. Member as to the applicability of the epithets which he has used. If these gentlemen have been wrongfully detained, they have a legal remedy.

THE POLICE SUPERANNUATION BILL.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I wish to ask whether the First Lord of the Treasury means to proceed to-night with the Motion for referring the Police Superannuation Bill to a Standing Committee? I learn from the Chairman of the Standing Committee that it will be impossible to consider this Bill for some time. Therefore, by sending it to the Grand Committee, you will be taking a course which may prevent the measure from being passed this Session.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We hold the view that to refer the Bill to a Standing Committee is the best method of endeavouring to insure its passing this Session, with the concurrence, of course, of the House and the right hon. Gentleman himself. I should be very much surprised to hear that the Law Committee have work on hand that will keep them for more than a very few days. The Motion for referring the Bill will not be taken to-night, but to-morrow.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

SIR H. VIVIAN (Swansea, District): I desire to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, who has expressed his hope that the House will pass the Tithe Bill, after what date he will not consider it his duty to press that very contentious measure upon the House, in view of what occurred last year?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Perhaps the hon. Baronet will allow me to defer making any statement with regard to the particular date of a particular measure until after the House has had a little more time for progressing with business. I undertook, last Monday, at the suggestion of right hon. Gentlemen opposite, to refer to-day to the question of public business, and I should have been very glad if it had been possible for me to make definitive proposals to the House with a view to the winding up of the business of the Session, which I am aware Gentlemen on all sides of the House desire to see accomplished as early as possible. I would remind the House that the Government have thought it right to propose to the House the consideration of a Standing Order which is intended to provide for the better forwarding of Public Business in this and in future Sessions, and that the whole question of the consideration of the best method by which business may be forwarded has been referred to a strong Committee, which is now considering the question, and which I hope may be able to report in the course of a few days. It will then, without doubt, be the duty of the Government to make some proposals to the House, after they have considered the Report of that Committee, and those proposals must very considerably affect the arrangements the Government will ultimately make for the conclusion of the business of the Session. In these circumstances, I do not feel in a position to offer to the House any suggestion as to the period within which, or as to the method by which, the business of the House should be concluded. The House is aware that we have endeavoured to proceed during the last few days with Bills that have been generally of a non-contentious character. Those Bills will be proceeded with, and I have stated that Supply will be taken to-night, and, I hope, after the consideration of some other non-contentious measures, to-morrow night and during the whole of next week. I trust the House will feel that, having made arrangements in the circumstances of the case for the conduct of business, so far as next week is concerned, I am at liberty to request hon. Members to wait for the consideration of the Resolution to be arrived at by the Committee upstairs before I state to the House definitely the recommendations the Government propose to make with regard to the remaining business of the Session.

MR. HUNTER: As to the Scotch Police Bill, is it proposed to proceed with it to-night? I may point out that it will be impossible to agree with the recommendation to refer the matter to a Select Committee, unless it is taken at such an early hour as to afford a fair opportunity for the discussion of an Instruction I have put down. If the Government are prepared to accept the Instruction no doubt progress with the Bill will be facilitated.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is not proposed to proceed with the reference to the English Police Bill to the Standing Committee to-day, but we hope to proceed with it to-morrow. I trust we may also proceed with the reference to a Select Committee of the Scotch Bill to-morrow, and that hon. Members opposite will assist us in effecting that object.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR (Leicester): When will the Third Reading of the Western Australia Bill be taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I believe to-morrow.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): Will the Scotch Police Bill be taken before the English Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No, Sir.

*MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): Do I understand the First Lord of the Treasury to say that the Western Australia Bill will not be taken to-night? It is on the Orders of the Day, and the right hon. Gentleman has intimated that it will be taken to-morrow. Are we to understand that the Government will not bring it forward to-night?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have every reason to believe that Supply will occupy the whole evening.

SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): What Supply do the Government intend to take to-morrow?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope we may be able to dispose of the War Office Vote this evening, but if it is not disposed of to-night we must take it to-morrow.

MOTIONS.

MAHARAJAH OF KASHMIR—TREATMENT BY THE GOVERNMENT.

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT.

(4.55.) Mr. BRADLAUGH, Member for the Borough of Northampton, rose in his place, and asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House, for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, viz.—

"The taking away by the Government of India from the Maharajah of Kashmir of the Government of his State and part of his Revenues, whilst refusing to allow any judicial or Parliamentary inquiry into the grounds for such action against a great feudatory Prince."

But the pleasure of the House not having been signified, Mr. SPEAKER called on those Members who supported the Motion to rise in their places, and not less than 40 Members having accordingly risen,

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I am obliged to move the adjournment of the House, because it is the only possible way in which any appeal for the Maharajah of Kashmir can be submitted to Parliament. The Government of India have deprived this Chief of his authority and of his property under cover of allegations, which are emphatically denied by the Maharajah himself. The Maharajah, as I shall show, has applied for a trial in India. That has been denied him. The Secretary of State here has been asked to sanction an inquiry, and has refused; the Leader of the House has been asked to appoint a Select Committee of Inquiry, and has also refused, so that neither judicial, nor Parliamentary, nor Governmental inquiry is being allowed, although this gentleman has been subjected to penalties which, in the case of the meanest person in this country, would entitle him to have the accusations brought before some tribunal, and witnesses against him heard. There is no other manner of bringing this matter before the House than by moving the adjournment. Though I can understand that hon. Gentlemen opposite may think it unfair that the adjournment should be moved, they must remember that on Indian matters I have always shown the greatest consideration to the Government; so much so, that at the beginning of this Session I did not avail myself, as I might have done, of my right to move an Amendment to the Address, and I only now make a Motion for the adjournment, because there are no Estimates in Supply on which, as in any case affecting any other portion of Her Majesty's Dominions, a question of grievance may be raised. It is either in the manner I am raising it to-night, or not at all. Now, on May 14th of last year—that is more than 12 months ago—the Maharajah himself asked the Government of India for a fair trial. I will read to the House presently the touching words in which that appeal for a fair trial was made. From then till now, except in a Despatch, from which it will be my duty to quote, no kind of answer has been made to that appeal, and the Maharajah has been condemned unheard. I should have pressed this claim for inquiry 12 months ago, but there were then no Papers before the House. It would have been open for the Government to say, in the fashion in which rumour has said, that this unfortunate gentleman had been guilty of crime, or was suffering the consequences of vice, because these suggestions could be found embodied in official Despatches, to which I shall refer, and that there was, therefore, a lack of duty in bringing the matter before the House until the Government had put before it the statements on which they rely. Although this unfortunate Gentleman was deprived of his authority and his property at the beginning of last year, the presentation of Papers has been delayed until last week. They have been repeatedly pressed for by myself and other Members. Until the Government had put their case on the Table anyone would have been at a great disadvantage in submitting to this House any matter for its decision. I do not propose to ask the House, in the Division I shall challenge, to express any other opinion on the facts I shall submit than that when such a penalty is enforced against the prince, with whom we have a treaty—who has recently been regarded as being in the position of a feudatory prince, the man so dealt with is entitled to that which any other subject of Her Majesty, if he be a subject of Her Majesty, is entitled to, namely, a fair trial before condemnation. The Under Secretary must not shelter himself under considerations of State. If considerations of State justify the Government of India in depriving one man of his authority and property unheard, there is no protection for any one, be he prince or peasant, throughout the whole of our Asiatic dominions. The other day the question was stated as simply as possible in the language of the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for India (Sir J. Gorst), in answer to a question put by myself. The right hon. Gentleman said :—

"The action of the Government in Kashmir has been based not upon grave personal charges made against the Maharajah."

I would ask the House to remember that, because this man's character has been rumoured away and lied away, with the help of forged letters, during the last year and a half—forged letters used as instruments of political warfare—letters, the authority of which has been denied by the Maharajah, letters which have never been produced in his presence, and yet which, the Government have the face to refer to in their worst fashion in one of the Despatches I shall read to the House. I shall be relieved from any question as to the personal conduct of the Maharajah. He may be good or bad ; I do not care what he is—he is entitled to justice. If he has been criminal, let him be condemned and punished ; but do not rob him under cover of a criminality which you dare not bring in evidence against him, and as to which you will allow no inquiry, either in India or here. The right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary said the action of the Government was based upon the long-continued mis-government of Kashmir. Well, this unfortunate gentleman has only been the ruler of Kashmir for about five years ; and I will quote, to within a few months of the time he was dispossessed, the testimony of the Government itself, that mis-management did not exist as far as it was in his power to help it. I cannot conceive—I should not be justified in saying before you, Sir, anything more impudent—but I can conceive nothing more cool than the audacity of the confidence that this House would be imposed upon by the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary, that there had been long-continued mis-government in Kashmir, such as justified the dethronement of this man. Vague statements there are here, but not one statement of fact. Mis-government must be made up of something. You may shadow a man, put him unjustly in prison, or take away his property. None of these things are alleged against this unfortunate gentleman. Well, the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that the Government of India have never attached any importance to certain treasonable and criminal correspondence attributed to the Maharajah. It would have been as well not to have described the character of the correspondence, if no importance was attached to it. Why suggest that it was criminal and treasonable if it was not true, as it was not, that he was responsible for it. I do not suggest that the right hon. Gentleman has made an inaccurate statement, but I do say he has been ignorant of the facts. I will read the evidence given by the Viceroy himself with regard to this correspondence, which the right hon. Gentleman dare not lay before this House, which he dare not put in print, but on which the emissaries of the Government have lied away the Maharajah's character during the last year and a-half. I will dispose of this point at once, because, fortunately, we have the Papers on the Table, and are able now to deal with them. So far from its being true that the Government have never attached the smallest importance to the correspondence, the Viceroy himself says the Government were justified "not merely by the disclosure of these letters"—so that they consider themselves in part justified by them. [Sir J. GORST indicated dissent.] The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head. It is the Viceroy's head that should beshaken here. I admit that the right hon. Gentleman dare not rely on the letters. I admit the right hon. Gentleman has too much good sense to use in justification of the position assumed by the Government letters, which the man himself declares to be forgeries, and which the Government have never dare to produce to his face. But in a long Despatch, dated Simla, June 26th, 1889, I say the Viceroy did say these letters were things on which the Government acted in condemning this unfortunate gentleman. What did the Maharajah himself say about these letters? In a letter which, unfortunately, time will not permit me to read fully to the House, he made a plea for justice, first to the Government of India, and then, through the Government, to the English Parliament. He said, "These letters are nothing but most daring forgeries," and he suggests that one of the forgers, if not the only forger, is his brother, whom the Government of India has placed in the position of authority, of which they have deprived this unfortunate gentleman himself. My allegation will be that it was on these letters—for the Papers disclosed nothing else, and, further, negative everything else—that this action of the Government was based. [Sir J. GORST again expressed dissent.] The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but I have read the Papers, which he evidently has not done himself, and I shall read extracts to the House to show I am within the mark in every statement of this kind I make. Why did the Government of India, 12 months ago, say they did not merely act on these letters? What did that phrase mean if they did not act on them at all? Have the Government since discovered they are forgeries? If so, as they are part of the case on which misgovernment and criminality are alleged against this unfortunate gentleman, the whole story, if it does not fall to the ground, at any rate, rests on other matters, with reference to which this man demands to be put on his trial, and as to which no evidence has been offered. Lord Cross, speaking last year at Sheffield, used words little stronger than, and, if I may be allowed to say so, not quite so skilfully as the euphemistic language of the First Lord to-night, and of the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary last week. He said:—

"We did interfere in the matter of Kashmir; why? Because the people of Kashmir were so ground down by the tyranny and misgovernment of the Maharajah that we were bound as the paramount power to interfere for the protection of the interests of the inhabitants.

Where, in these Papers, is there one instance of grinding down? If you want to steal Kashmir, as, unfortunately, we have stolen, often stolen, in India and other parts of the world, then say so at once, and at least have the merit of honest thieves. Do not be hypocritical by saying you set up self-Government where self-Government has no existence. What is the position of Kashmir towards this country? Fortunately, the history is not long so far as it affects this unfortunate man, and I will deal with it as briefly as it is possible to do. The history of Kashmir, for the purpose of to-night's discussion, began with the Treaty of 1846, with the grandfather of the gentleman whose cause I am pleading. Then, for a considerable money payment, recorded in the 3rd section of the Treaty, the British Government transferred and made over for ever, in independent possession, to Maharajah Golab Singh and the heirs male of his body, the territory which includes Kashmir and Jummoo. This is not a case of an ordinary feudatory State. So little was it regarded as a feudatory State, that in the Statistical Abstract of this very year you have the evidence of its non-inclusion up to 1881 amongst the feudatory States; and there was never anything to suggest that we had a right or duty to send a Resident there until 1885, on the death of the father of the present Maharajah. I will not trouble the House with what has passed until the few days before the commencement of the reign of the present chief. The Maharajah Golab Singh, with whom the Treaty of the 10th of March, 1846, was made, was succeeded by his son about the time of the Indian Mutiny, and Lord Canning, in an official document, gave Maharajah Rumbir Singh, who had succeeded Golab Singh in 1857, the Sanad of adoption, which provided that in case of failure of issue, he and his successors would be competent to adopt an heir, and thus perpetuate the line. This was given on the ground of the great service rendered by the Maharajah during the mutiny. The Maharajah Rumbir Singh was ill in 1884, and I am afraid that some 14 or 15 years ago, when Jingoism was specially paramount in the making of great military frontiers and things of that kind, we looked with longing eyes upon the property of others, and were disposed to ignore any sense of justice in our dealings with them. It was then said that Rumbir Singh had misgoverned his country. If he had, it was a matter with which, except as being, by treaty, the paramount power, in which case we might have made remonstrance, we had nothing whatever to do. But, as a matter of fact, we made no remonstrance to him. The Under Secretary of State dissents. Then why is it not in the Papers? The Papers began in 1884 with a Despatch relating to the alleged misgovernment during the time of the present Maharajah's father. The words of the Despatch precluded the possibility of remonstrance having been made. But what happens is that while the Maharajah is dying, the Viceroy of India, looking to the matter, as he says, with a view to his troublesome neighbours on the North West Frontier, certain reforms are suggested which, on the accession of the son of the then dying man, it would be well should be carried out, and I will read to the House, in the words of Lord Dufferin himself, the admission that many of these reforms had been carried out during the short period that this gentleman sat on the Throne. In 1885 the succession of Prapat Singh was formally recognised by the Government. He came to the throne under the Treaty which I have read to the House. One new departure there was against which the Maharajah protested namely, the establishment of a Residency instead of Kashmir being an independent possession, which, under the Treaty, it was, subject to the supremacy of the Empress Queen. After the appointment of a Resident, it is a monstrously unfair thing to spring a mine four or five years afterwards, and allege, as an excuse for confiscating property and power, that there had been misgovernment, where, if there had been misgovernment, it should have been reported day by day, week by week, month by month, and year by year. There are no such Reports. If the Secretary of State has got them, he ought to have printed them. I am not asking the House to say that this unfortunate man is guiltless, but I am asking them to say that he is entitled to be tried, and to have an inquiry before he is deprived of his rights. In 1890 the Government deprived this gentleman of his chieftainship. By what right? By no right save the right of force. By what law? By no law save the law of force. Upon what charges? Upon charges of the vaguest description. It is clear these Papers are delusive Papers. There must have been Reports made by the Viceroy, which Reports ought to be in the hands of the House. If it is said that they are of confidential character—if it is said they cannot be produced, at any rate, the witnesses who can prove the occasions of misgovernment ought to be produced in some Court. Is it because this man is rich; is it because his property is in a place where you want to have property because of frontier considerations; is he to be deprived of the right which you admit to the meanest person accused within this country, or within the Asiatic dominions of the Empress Queen herself? It is a monstrous thing, and I ask the House to look at it without consideration of Party, because you must remember it is not a question only of this man, but of every feudatory prince whose property you may want to take and merge in our dominions. The Papers have not been put on the Table in a hurry. They have been in the skilled hands of the Under Secretary. We all know how frank the Under Secretary can be if he likes, and I ask him to tell the House how many Papers relating to these important Despatches between the Government of India and the Secretary of State have been kept back, and why? It is clear some have—the language shows it. Why are any kept back? They have been kept back because the action of the Government cannot be defended. I do not know what the charges are against the Maharajah, and I am only asking that this Parliament shall say that the Government of India, however powerful, and whatever the State considerations are, has no right to rob this man. On the 14th of September, 1885, the Viceroy sent a Despatch, to which I must allude for a moment. It was sent just on the accession of the present Maharajah to the throne, and I allege to the House it makes a clear Bill up to that time, so far as any charges of mis-government entitled our Government to interfere. The Viceroy says:—

“I trust that your Highness's life may be long and prosperous, and that in all difficulties, of whatsoever kind, you will rely with confidence upon the good will of the British Government, which will never fail you so long as you are loyal to the Crown and earnest in the desire to rule your State with justice and moderation. Your Highness has before you a difficult task. During the illness of your father, the administration of the State became seriously disorganised, and it will be necessary for you to introduce many reforms.”

I will show you that three years after, in Lord Dufferin's time, reforms had been admittedly carried out, and that mis-government is an excuse for stealing the man's property. The Maharajah wrote in reply protesting against the Residency being placed upon him. He said—

“I do not hesitate to admit that the existing state of affairs in Kashmir and Jammu urgently requires immediate introduction of substantial reforms into the administration of the country, and now that you have power commensurate with my responsibilities, I beg to answer your Excellency that nothing shall be spared on my part, and no time will be lost to prove beyond any possibility of doubt that it is my ambition to succeed in making my country a model of a well-governed State in alliance with the Government of India.”

Having got the Resident at the capital, what do we find? We find that the Resident wants to get rid of the Maharajah, he submits some Report to the Government, the particulars of which we do not know, and a Report, the particulars of which we do know, dated March 5th, 1888. Let me point out, in the first place, that in the Despatch of the 5th of March, 1888, there is nothing to justify any of the words of Lord Cross at Sheffield, or the words of the Under Secretary of State last week, as to misgovernment, or the words of the First Lord of the Treasury to-night. Now, what was the decision the Government of India came to in August, 1888? It was that the condition of the State did not seem to demand much action, as Mr. Plowden had suggested, and that the Government had, therefore, determined not to resort to measures which would have the effect, directly or indirectly, of taking the power out of the Maharaja's hands. Yet in less than seven months after that Despatch power was taken out of his hands, and taken out solely on these letters. Solely, perhaps, is a strong word to use; but immediately after taking possession of these letters suggesting the worst of crimes—letters which the Maharaja had always denied, and as to which he is always entitled to be heard before a Select Committee of this House, or before the Viceroy himself. He had confidence in the British Government; but he had no confidence in the officials, whom, he said, misrepresented him. The decision that there should be no interference, with the Maharaja, directly or indirectly, disposes of Mr. Plowden's Report of the 8th of March, 1888. I come now to April, 1889, when we had some further action. I will first mention that on the 25th of July, 1888, Lord Dufferin wrote—

“I do not overlook the fact that, since the appointment of the Council of which Diwan Lachman Dass was a member, considerable progress has been made in the direction of reform; useful work has been done with regard to the revenue administration, and in the re-organisation of the Public Works and Medical Departments. But much remains to be done.”

This is not the language of condemnation of the chronic mis-government and the grinding down of the people. Mis-government is only an invention—an excuse for having dispossessed this man—and I think I have a right to quote this evidence given by Lord Dufferin in 1888. This unfortunate prince, hampered by the Resident, who dictated the policy he should pursue, did make reforms as entitled him to the praise of Lord Dufferin, a statesman of the greatest eminence, of the keenest judgment, and a man who cannot be charged with being at all partial to the class of man I am defending here this afternoon. Now, I come to these horrid letters. There is a batch of 34, and the Maharaja says that they are all forgeries. I do not ask you to say whether they are or are not, but I say that if they are used against him he is entitled to go into Court and cross-examine the witnesses against him. Other letters on which the Government have relied have been abandoned as forgeries within the memory of many of us in this House. What is the character of them as described by the Resident? The character of them is that the Maharaja offered large sums of money to certain individuals on condition that they would murder, or cause to be removed, Mr. Plowden, the late Resident. It is alleged that these letters showed treasonable correspondence with the enemies of England. All these things are denied by the Maharaja. I do not ask you to say whether the Maharaja is right or wrong; but I say that when letters alleging murder are produced against a Prince, with whom we have a Treaty of Alliance, immediately after which we take away his property, the commonest and the merest justice demands that he should have an opportunity of being heard before a Select Committee of this House, or some tribunal competent to deal with his offence, if offence he has committed. The Government are not going to stand by these letters to-night, but the Viceroy has stood by them, and I will read you words in which they are so stood by. The Viceroy said—that is last year,

“my attention was called to the documents referred to in your Highness's letter. Many of these had every appearance of being genuine, and they have, moreover, a striking resemblance to those other papers of which I have already spoken, and which came into the possession of the Government of India at a previous time.

“Your Highness is correct in expressing your belief that the action subsequently taken by my Government was not justified merely by the disclosures contained in these letters.”

Where is the report upon which they acted? The man had a right to be tried. The letters are vague statements. The Viceroy goes on—

“Notwithstanding the ample resources of your State your treasury was empty.”

Well, if you are going to dethrone every Prince whose treasury becomes empty I do not know how far you are prepared to carry your policy. Does the Government really mean that? If that be so, how is it they took from this man the advance or deposit or loan of a large sum of money amounting to 25 lacs of rupees? They had this in their hands when the Treasury was empty. Why did they take money for Lady Dufferin's admirable Fund? Why, if the treasury was empty, did they take millions of rupees for railway works in the interest of frontier defence? Treasury empty! Why you and your Resident helped to empty it, and then you tell this unfortunate man it is a reason why he should be dethroned?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): Will the hon. Gentleman finish the sentence?

*MR. BRADLAUGH: You put on the Table what you please, and with the House half empty, because every Member feels the difficulty when a Motion for adjournment is moved, I have, with such knowledge as is supplied, to make what case I can with this far off matter.

SIR J. GORST: I only interrupted the hon. Gentleman to point out that he had not read the sentence to the end, and I thought to put the case fairly it should be given to the end.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I will read it to the end, and show that the right hon. Gentleman gains nothing by making me read it—

“Notwithstanding the ample resources of your State your Treasury was empty; corruption and disorder prevailed in every Department and every office; Your Highness was still surrounded by low and unworthy favourites, and the continued misgovernment of your State was becoming every day a more serious source of anxiety.”

Well, there is not a word affecting finance there. I was going to deal with each allegation in turn. “Low and unworthy favourites!” Every Prince has these, even in his own household; every Oriental Prince has such. The whole history of our transactions with native feudatory Princes shows that when we have wanted to take their money, their land, their position, we have used vices which appeared at the time to suit our purposes and help us to gain our ends. I do not know what the right hon. Gentleman means by inviting me to read to the end, as if I had omitted some allusion to the empty Treasury. Why, the Indian Government had then 25 lacs of rupees of his, and millions of rupees had been laid out in railway works. Who are these low and unworthy people? It is not enough to make a vague statement; where is the evidence? Let the man be tried. A man complains of a burglary in his jeweller's shop, and you say to him, "Oh, but you were misusing the jewels." I ask the House to take at least some tone of dignity in this matter. This irresponsible Government of India, as an Indian Secretary once said, has no public opinion to influence it, no Parliament to control it, no Press to criticise it. The Government of India is a despotism; that has, in many degrees, been well for India; it is a despotism which has brought in its train advantages which many of these poor people would not otherwise have obtained; but it cannot be denied that in many respects that despotism in the past has been tainted with fraud and crime, and I hope it is not left to the present Government to revive these evil traditions in obtaining possession of Kashmir. The Empress Queen, the paramount Power acting as Judge, has condemned this man unheard. No man should be under menace of this. The grandfather of this Prince bought these lands, and we, by Treaty, declared they belonged to him for ever. [Sir J. GORST expressed dissent.] The right hon. Gentleman does not seem to be acquainted with all these facts in the history of India. Shall I ask him to read and tell us the exact sum paid for the Maharajah's dominions? How do the Government justify their action? They say the Maharajah resigned; he says he did nothing of the kind. I am more inclined to believe him than even the Under Secretary, for whose statements I have always the profoundest respect. Officially there could be nothing better than the way he answers questions in this House; but when history, some 50 years hence, comes to deal with him, the comment of the historian will be, how wickedly the Government officials deceived the Under Secretary, making him say as truth the things that were not true. It is said the Maharajah voluntarily resigned. It is true that on March 8, 1889, the Maharajah issued the following document. I will abridge it; if it is suggested I am incorrect, I will read the whole willingly, but I do not think my abridgment will differ from the exact words. The Maharajah appointed a Council who were to govern the country for five years, he reserving to himself all his princely rights and reserving certain powers, but allowing them much the same authority, as allowing for Oriental position, a Cabinet enjoys here. The Government of India do not accept that yet; they say they accepted a voluntary resignation. What he offered they would not have; what they wanted they took from him. The Maharajah says he acted under pressure. I do not ask the House to decide that; but I do say that he is entitled to a Select Committee here, or I may say he would be content with an inquiry conducted in India if Lord Lansdowne will give his personal attention to it. The right hon. Gentleman is better acquainted with the Government of India than I am. He knows that Residents are not always perfect; that Residents sometimes quarrel with a Prince, and that matters are alleged as facts which do not always bear the test and scrutiny of examination. This man, through my mouth, appeals to this House, not that you should make a decree that the Government of India is wrong; he simply asks for an inquiry. He has a right to that inquiry. I regret that the appeal is not made by an abler tongue—by a better-informed man. But I am limited to the information in the Parliamentary Papers presented to the House and such records as the history of India enables me to present, and I say without fear of contradiction that no case is made out for the action that has been taken. In 1888 the Government of India and the Secretary of State in Council at home came to the conclusion there was nothing for which, directly or indirectly, the Maharajah ought to be deprived of power, and within seven months they take it all away. If you trample on Treaties; if your obligations to the Princes of India are to be broken, and the native rulers are not to rely on your word, and English justice in India is a shadow and a delusion, let that be known, but let those who hold a contrary opinion vote for my Motion as the means of protest. The government of India should be no Party question, either to Liberal or Conservative, Radical or Whig; our duty and our interest demand that our paramount rule in India should be just.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. Bradlaugh.)

*(543.) SIR J. GORST: I do not for a moment dispute the right of the hon. Member to challenge the action of the Government of India or to ask the House to order an inquiry if there is anything to inquire into. If the House will give me its attention for a short time, I will tell the House why the Government of India has acted in the manner it has, and why it appears to the Secretary of State this is not a subject which can properly be made matter of inquiry either by Judicial Commission in India or by Select Committee of the House of Commons. I need not take the House back to the early history of Kashmir; the hon. Member for Northampton has, in the little history he has given, indicated to the House that after the Sikh War we by force of arms placed a Hindoo ruler over the Mohamedan people of Kashmir; and, by doing this, we incurred, as it seems to me, the responsibility of seeing that these Mahomedan people who by the action of the British Government were subjected to an alien dynasty were at least fairly and properly governed. Now, complaints of the misgovernment of Kashmir are not so modern as the hon. Member for Northampton seems to suppose. I should like to read to the House the observations which were made by the Government of Lord Ripon in 1884, and Lord Ripon was a Viceroys whose error did not, at all events, lie in over-interference with Native Chiefs. This was what was said by his Government in 1884:—"The misgovernment to which the people of this country (Kashmir) have long been subjected."—The hon. Member for Northampton asks what the nature of the misgovernment was, and I will try before I sit down to give the House some faint idea of the nature and results of this misgovernment. Lord Ripon said—

"The people of that country have long been subjected to misgovernment, and this was some time since brought prominently into notice by Mr. Henvey. We did not take action at once, conceiving that a favourable opportunity would offer on the occasion of a fresh succession."

The Maharajah Runbir Singh was then suffering from a mortal illness, and his death was expected.

"When that event takes place, we shall consider that it will be our duty to impress on the Kashmir Government its obligations to its own subjects, and to see that reforms so urgently needed are no longer postponed."

VOL. CCCXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

To those remarks of Lord Ripon's Government an answer was returned by Lord Kimberley, Secretary of State under the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and Lord Kimberley stated in his Despatch his doubts whether the Government of India was justified in hesitating, so long as it had hesitated, to interfere in the affairs of Kashmir. It may, indeed, be questioned whether, having regard to the circumstances under which a Hindoo family were settled as rulers, the intervention of the British Government on behalf of the Mahomedan people had not already been too long delayed. Well, the Government of India waited 18 months, and in 1885 the late Maharajah died and the present Maharajah came to the Throne. The hon. Member for Northampton has already read some of the warnings which were addressed to the present Maharajah of Kashmir on the occasion of his ascending the Throne, but he said—and I really was surprised when he made the statement to the House—that until quite recently no complaint was made of his administration, and, in fact, he quoted a few expressions from some of Lord Dufferin's Despatches which would have left upon the House the impression that, upon the whole, the Government had been very successfully administered, and many reforms had been carried out. Now, what did Mr. Plowden say in March, 1888? He thought it his duty to call the formal attention of the Government of India to the fearful condition of Kashmir under the Maharajah and his associates, whom he calls a band of corrupt and mischievous men. Mr. Plowden says—

"I think, however, that the Government of India should be under no illusion as regards Maharajah Pertab Singh. From first to last I have failed to discover in him any sustained capacity for governing his country or any genuine desire to ameliorate its condition, or to introduce those reforms which he has acknowledged to be necessary. More than two years have passed since his accession, but not only has he achieved nothing, but he has opposed beneficial measures proposed by others . . . He will never, of his own free will, establish a capable and honest administration; nor if any power of interference is left him, will he permit any administration appointed by the Government of India to carry on the business of the country. He will thwart and oppose it in every way he dares; the only restraint will be the limit of his power and his fears."

Well, at the same time that Mr.

Plowden made this grave Report to the Government of India on the condition of the country and the character of the Maharajah, a proposal was made by the Maharajah himself to appoint a Council.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: The right hon. Gentleman will pardon me. I stated to the House that on the Report of Mr. Plowden the Government came to the decision not to take the power from the Maharajah, and that Lord Dufferin contradicted Mr. Plowden, by recognising the fact that since the appointment of the Council, of which Diwan Lachman Dass was a member, considerable progress had been made in the direction of reforms.

*SIR J. GORST: The hon. Member is impatient. I am coming to that. I shall have something more to say first. At the time that this Report was being sent home, application was made by the Maharajah to have a Council appointed, upon which the Government of India decided to give him another trial to see whether, by his Council, he would govern the country better. I must say, speaking by the light of after events, it was unfortunate that the Government of India set aside the Report of Mr. Plowden, and gave the Maharajah what, in vulgar phrase, would be called "another chance." I confess, if the hon. Member for Northampton, instead of attacking the Government of India for having at last relieved the Maharajah of the functions of government, had attacked the Government for being so weak in 1888 as to give this second chance, I am sure that I, as Under Secretary, would have found it difficult to make out a good defensive case. But Lord Dufferin decided on this course. He wrote a complimentary letter to the Maharajah, which the hon. Member has read, and no doubt he made use of the expressions the hon. Member has quoted as to the success of the Council, since the appointment of Diwan Lachman Dass, under whom considerable progress, he said, had been made in the direction of reform. But will the House believe that the object of that letter, on which the hon. Member relies as showing the improvement in the government of the country, was to remonstrate with the Maharajah for dismissing summarily, and without the knowledge of the Government of India, that same Diwan Lachman Dass, whose reforms were praised in the passage of Lord Dufferin's letter which the hon. Member has quoted as praising the Maharajah for the improvements in the government of the country. The beginning of Lord Dufferin's letter which the hon. Member has not quoted is as follows:—

"I cannot avoid informing your Highness that the news of the sudden removal of Diwan Lachman Dass was received by me with some surprise. Your Highness appointed him to your Council after consulting me, and I hoped that your Highness would, before making another change of Government, give me some previous intimation of your views. However, this point has already been brought to your notice by Mr. Plowden, and I do not now desire to dwell upon it further."

Well, the arrangements for governing the country by means of a Council were made, and, in order to give the new scheme the fullest possible chance of success, Mr. Plowden was removed from Kashmir on the occasion of his promotion, and Colonel Nisbet, a personal friend of the Maharajah, and in whom the Maharajah placed implicit confidence, was sent to Kashmir. Now, I said I would give the House some little idea of the misgovernment that the hon. Member for Northampton treated so lightly, and of which he said no trace was to be found in the Papers before the House. Now, if hon. Members have read the Papers, they will see that they close with the Report of a certain gentleman of the name of Wingate. Mr. Wingate was a Revenue Officer of the Bombay Government of 19 years' experience, and he had also been employed in the revenue settlement of some of the native States of Rajputana. He was a highly qualified and experienced officer. He was employed by the Maharajah's Government, and his Report well deserves the study of anybody who desires to understand the position of Kashmir, although it is full of technicalities and written in a dry business-like technical spirit, but his narrative is enlivened occasionally by the most horrible statements as to the condition of Kashmir. Let me say this gentleman was 18 months among the people surveying in Kashmir and Jummoo, and he appears to have gone to work in a dry business-like fashion. In these Oriental States we know that the foundation of the happiness of the people consists in the correct measurement of their land. The first thing Mr. Wingate discovered was that the measurement of the land upon which the ryots paid their rent was altogether incorrect against the ryots.

Sir J. Gorst

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Does the right hon. Gentleman represent that in any way that this was done under the direction of the Maharajah?

*SIR JOHN GORST: The evil existed under the Government of the Maharajah, and was approved by the Maharajah's Government.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Mr. Wingate's Report referred to the existing state of things, part of the condition of things that had long existed over Kashmir, was no part of the mis-government of the Maharajah.

*SIR JOHN GORST: It was part of the condition of things in Kashmir under a Government of which the Maharajah was the head. I do not know whether the Maharajah shields himself under the allegation that all this had happened in the past, and that he was not responsible for the misgovernment which he allowed to exist. I do not think this House will take such a view of the limitations of the Maharajah's duties to his subjects. Besides, we have read Mr. Plowden's Report, in which it is stated that the Maharajah opposed those reforms which were admitted to be necessary. Now, under the land system in Kashmir the assessment of the ryots is arbitrarily fixed, and a divisional official gets the revenue out of the unhappy cultivators in the best way he can, the result being that from one-half to two-thirds of the gross produce of the land was exacted from these unhappy people, mostly in kind and partly also in cash.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Does not Mr. Wingate say that existed as far back as 1874?

*SIR J. GORST: I have been reading the Report.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: You have not been reading at all.

*SIR J. GORST: The hon. Member challenged me to say what the mis-government had been in Kashmir.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I challenged the right hon. Gentleman to prove specific acts of misgovernment on the part of the Maharajah.

*SIR J. GORST: I am in the recollection of the House. I appeal to hon. Members whether, if the case rested solely on the speech of the hon. Member for Northampton, they would not have gone away in the belief that Kashmir was the best governed country in the world. I am showing what was the state of the affairs which compelled the Government of India to take this action. I am going to show the House why the Government in the interests of humanity were peremptorily called upon to take this step. [A laugh.] The hon. Member may laugh, but I think it is not a laughing matter. Now, let me describe what was done. The assessment was paid at fixed rates in kind, that is to say, it was levied on the people in money value, and then they were made to give produce at certain fixed and prescribed rates in lieu of paying the assessment in cash. In the case of rice, the main staple which the ryots cultivated, the prescribed rate was extremely unfavourable to the cultivator—all this is in Mr. Wingate's Report, and if I am epitomising it unfairly the hon. Member can subsequently correct me. I do not see why he should interrupt me now—but the prescribed rates for cotton, which is grown by the richer ryots, were very favourable. Therefore it came to this, that the Officers of the Revenue allowed the rich ryots to pay on the staple bearing the most favourable rate, while the poor ryots had to pay on the staple bearing the most unfavourable rates. Every year, says Mr. Wingate in his Report, "the bulk of the rise goes into the city;" and further, he adds, "these poor ryots often have to buy it back at two or three times the price at which it was credited to them in their assessment." And then this dry technical Report contains this statement, "In this fertile valley there are women and children actually starving." Further on it says—

"It may be easier now to understand why the Kashmiri cares naught for rights in land, why his fields are fallow or full of weeds, and manure and water neglected, why he has, as I can well believe, even to be forced to cultivate. The revenue system is such that, whether he works much or little, he is left with barely enough to get along on till next harvest. He is a machine to produce Sháli for a very large and most idle city population."

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.). Like Ireland!

*SIR J. GORST: A city, the population of which consists of officials and of Hindoo pundits, who have prepared the brief from which the hon. Member for Northampton spoke. These men get their rice cheap, while the ryot who grows it, and is forbidden to dispose of it for export starves. Again, Mr. Wingate says that "The cultivator is compelled to grow rice, and in many years to part with it below the proper market rate, in order that the city may be content. If the harvest is too little for both, the city must be supplied, and is supplied, by any force that may be necessary, and the cultivator and his children must go without. That is the explanation of the angry discontent that filled the valley during the famine. The cultivator is considered to have rights neither to his land nor to his crops. The city population have a right to be well fed whether there is famine or not."

and that is not all. The officials of the Revenue contractors are gradually in Kashmir converting themselves into landlords. They get grants of waste land, they foreclose upon ryots who are indebted, and they purchase a considerable part of the land, and as Mr. Wingate says—

"Since the death of the Maharajah Golab Singh, from which date central authority appears to have been weaker, there has been a steadily, and, latterly, rapidly increasing transference of land from the cultivating to the non-cultivating classes, and a landlord element is intruding itself between the cultivator and the State."

I earnestly commend this to the attention of some of the hon. Members from Ireland. Then besides this, there exists among the unhappy ryots a system of begar, or forced labor. This scourge, which is peculiar to the Government villages, and from which the villages which happen to be in the hands of these landlords are free, is imposed upon the people with the utmost severity.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I venture to make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman. I fancy that by the Rules of the House I have no right of reply. I wish to ask him, in reference to this forced labour, whether it is not a fact that the system prevailed long before the death of the father of this unfortunate gentleman, and whether the Maharajah did not himself issue a decree abolishing it?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I may explain that the hon. Member will be entitled to reply, and it would be more convenient therefore for him to reserve his comments.

*SIR J. GORST: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity of replying, because otherwise he will not wait patiently to hear the end of my argument. He challenged me to show misgovernment in Kashmir. I am telling him what exists there, and presently I will ask him what was the Government of India to do under the circumstances. This forced labour was so unreasonably enforced on the people that if 20 coolies were wanted it was customary to requisition a hundred. Eighty would buy themselves off with payments to the officers, and 20 of the poorest would be compelled to do the duty. And it was so serious and so formidable that they left their homes and hid themselves for days in order to escape the work. I am speaking of matters which are within the knowledge of many hon. Members of this House who have served in India. But I am bound to repeat them when this House is asked to censure the conduct of the Government of India. Mr. Wingate says that the cultivators under this Hindoo rule have been pressed down to the condition of coolies cultivating the State property at subsistence allowance. This has been going on in Kashmir for years, and what has been the result? The population has been reduced by one-half, the ryots are deserting the country wherever they can do so, the villages are ruined, the bridges broken down, the irrigation channels are abandoned, and a population under the protection of a British Government which boasts of its Christianity and its civilisation, has sunk into a condition which I have tried faintly to describe. "They are gaunt with want and famine, they gnaw the ground in wateness and desolation." This, Mr. Speaker, is a description of the condition of the unhappy people of Kashmir, which seems to have moved the laughter of the hon. Member opposite. I should have thought he would have treated the subject more seriously. Such was the condition of the people—a condition which weighed upon the Government of India and the Secretary of State, who had hoped almost against hope that the new arrangement of the Maharajah would afford some amelioration in the condition of the people.

But no. Colonel Nisbett, appointed Resident because he was the Maharajah's friend, arrived at precisely the same conclusion as Mr. Plowden, and his conversion to those views was announced to the Government of India at the time of the discovery of the treasonable criminal letters, to which the hon. Member for Northampton has alluded. These letters, in spite of what the hon. Member says, have never been treated by the Government of India as serious, nor have they been made the ground for the exclusion of the Maharajah from interference in the public affairs of Kashmir. They might never have been noticed had they not been accompanied by the resignation, of his own accord, of part of his power. The Government of India, at the outset, said they were not disposed to attach excessive importance to these letters. They also wrote that they did not exclusively base their action upon the Maharajah's edict of resignation, but the edict gave them an occasion—and they would have been criminal if they had neglected to avail themselves of it—for placing the affairs of Kashmir on a more satisfactory basis. The Despatch in which these conclusions were announced to the Secretary of State contains these words—

"We greatly regret the necessity for any interference at all, but we are now convinced that, in the interests of the people of Kashmir, and of the ruling family itself, it is no longer right or possible to leave the control of affairs in the hands of the Maharajah."

In the whole of this business the Government of India have carefully avoided acting upon any personal grounds and I must object to the hon. Member for Northampton, and those who instruct him, trying to make out that this is a sort of personal question between the Maharajah and the Government of India. They insist on making out that the Maharajah has been deposed from his throne because of these letters, or because of some personal vices, or because of his own resignation. Not one of these is the real ground upon which the Government of India has acted. As I have stated in this House, in answer to questions over and over again, the Government of India has acted in the interests of the people of Kashmir and of their right to better Government. I can only say that, in my humble opinion, these reforms could not longer be delayed, and, if anything, both the Government of Mr. Gladstone and the present Government ought to reproach themselves for the long delay. It is a curious example of the irony of fate that the Radical Member for Northampton should be pleading in this House the Divine right of an Oriental despot to deal with his people as he pleases, and that I, a humble but reactionary Tory, should be pleading the right of these poor Moslems of Jummoo to cultivate their own land. But we have of late been accustomed in this House to strange sights. I ask the House to look at the Papers and see how careful the Government of India has been of the right of this reigning family. Will the House believe that in the Government of this country, the Government which is the paramount power in Kashmir, not an Englishman sits on the Council, which is composed exclusively of the natives of the State, and includes two members of the reigning family. The Government of India does not, and never has, in its policy interfered with the personal rights of the chiefs of India. It has been most careful of all existing rights, of all rights that affect the chiefs. But there is one right which it regards as more sacred than even the rights of Oriental despots to their thrones, and that is the right of the people who live under the protection of the power of Great Britain to just and upright Government. I hope that the House of Commons will not stand in the way of justice being done to the people of Kashmir. I hope that the House of Commons to-night will, by a large majority, approve the conduct of the Government of India in at last interfering in this unhappy State, and in allowing the Maharajah of Kashmir and the chiefs of India generally to know that, although their rights are respected, it is on the condition that their people are moderately happy and moderately justly governed.

* (6.24.) MR. BRADLAUGH: I will, Sir, at once take advantage of the right of reply which you have ruled rests with me. The point I wish to state is so important that I think it better to put it before the House at once. I say that the Report of Mr. Wingate refers to no specific act of misgovernment by the deposed Maharajah. It relates a state of things which obtained long prior to the Maharajah's birth, and which he has himself partially remedied since his accession to power. In September, 1885, he actually issued a decree abolishing forced labour both in Kashmir and in Jummoo, so far as he could, and in another decree he removed the cause of complaint as to the price of edibles. For three years this unfortunate man, step by step, took up reforms; and in one of his Despatches he speaks of the settlement of the land question as a task which it would take five years to deal with. I never said that the Government of Kashmir was perfect; on the contrary, I said that, like all Oriental Governments, it had many defects, and that the people of Kashmir were in a state of misery and difficulty, from which millions of the population of India were not free. I repeat that no specific act of misgovernment has been even pretended to be proved against the Maharajah, and that, so far as Mr. Plowden's Report is concerned, the decision of the Government of India itself was that it did not justify any interference on their part.

(6.26.) MR. MAC NEILL: The Under Secretary for India is always interesting, and his great abilities add additional charms to what he says. But on this occasion I think he was scarcely fair in accusing me of smiling at the sufferings of these people. I see too much suffering to regard it otherwise than with infinite sorrow and sympathy. What I smiled at was this. Knowing, as I do, the infamous transactions and secret springs which I intend to expose, I smiled that a gentleman representing a Government guilty of such conduct should claim universal benevolence and pretend to be benefiting the people, whereas they are robbing an ancient Prince of his inheritance. The right hon. Gentleman was careful to put forward the religious question, and to point out that the Maharajah was a Hindoo, while his subjects were Mahommedans. But I can tell him that if he would take a plébiscite of the inhabitants of Kashmir he would find that three-fourths of the people favour the restoration of the Prince. We know that 40,000,000 of our subjects in India are in a constant state of starvation, and that during the famine in 1877 the number of deaths from famine exceeded the population of London. Surely our efforts at administration in India have not been so successful as to justify our bringing more of the natives under our system. I heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman; I must say I thought it a most shifting defence. I can only repeat the statement of an eminent statesman who once said that the iniquities of the Government of India are so rank that they smell from earth to heaven. We are in precisely the same situation to-day. I may say that I speak on behalf of all my Colleagues. We are all in sympathy with the suffering and the injured classes.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is speaking of matters that do not arise on the Question before the House, on account of which the adjournment of the House was moved.

MR. MAC NEILL: I bow to your ruling, Sir; but I think I have a right to put it to the House whether the charges made by my hon. Friend cannot be substantiated by investigation. I think I shall be enabled to prove that the Maharajah has been deprived of his inheritance simply by the pursuance of an annexation policy, which was the approximate cause of the Indian Mutiny. What has happened has been what is called in Ireland "land-grabbing." The Maharajah, who was placed in his position many years ago, has displayed nothing but kindness and loyalty to British rule. He was placed on that throne, and it was reserved to him and his heirs, and in the meantime he has acted well towards this country. With regard to the letters on which so much stress has been laid none of them have been read to the House. Their date is important, because they came into the possession of the Government of India just about the time when Pigott's forgeries appeared in the Times. The Government of India has resorted to the old dodge of forged letters in order to destroy character of this Prince. The Government had no right to depose a Prince without rhyme or reason, and it is the duty of this House to do all in its power to prevent them from doing so.

(6.45.) MR. HUNTER: Mr. Speaker, the defence which has been offered on the part of the Government does not explain the degradation from his rank of the Maharajah of Kashmir, and the act of wholly unjustifiable spoliation. One remark with which the Under Secretary of State wound up his remarks, intended to be eloquent, was an appeal to this House on behalf of the poor Moslem cultivators. Why the Moslem cultivators? Surely, a Hindoo, if he happens to be a cultivator, is as much entitled to sympathy as the Moslem. But the right hon. Gentleman laid stress on the word Moslem in order to excite those unhappy religious prejudices which, unfortunately, prevail in India. He knew that in India, unfortunately, both Moslems and Hindoos are animated by strong fanatical opinions on the subject of religion, leading to collisions and breaches of the peace. And here is the Under Secretary for India, in this House, pointing his moral by the contrast between the Moslem and the Hindoo peasants, and trying thus to fan the embers of religious antipathy. What are the reasons which he adduced why the Maharajah should be deposed? Not one of the reasons had the slightest relation to anything that was done by the Maharajah of Kashmir himself. That I pass by. But what is the state of the country upon which he relies? There were three arguments. The first argument was that in consequence of the mismanagement of the revenue derived from the land there was a great deal of poverty in the country, and that the population had largely diminished. Well, I was amazed to hear a Minister sitting on that side of the House raising that as an argument why the Maharajah of Kashmir should be deposed, because the Maharajah has equally good reason for deposing you from the Government of Ireland, if that argument has any validity whatever. But that is not the only thing. We are told that the land revenue is extortionate. That is, no doubt, the reason why you are putting out the Maharajah and putting in yourselves. There is no doubt a margin, a large margin, which excites the cupidity of the British Government, and induces them to take possession of that country. But all this argument simply comes to this point, that, according to the view of the Government of India, the ancient, not the recent, mode of collecting the Revenue from the land is defective, and that oppressions arise in the exercise of the right; so that, according to the eloquent language of the right hon. Gentleman, the people are starving in the midst of plenty. That is precisely the condition of things in Ireland. The case of Ireland is precisely an analogous case. Not a single argument adduced by the right hon. Gentleman in reference to Kashmir but is applicable to Ireland, in the eyes of impartial people living outside the latter country. I am afraid the transaction is a very doubtful one, when it has to be supported by such exceedingly ludicrous statements as those which have been advanced by the Under Secretary of State.

*(6.50.) SIR R. TEMPLE: Mr. Speaker, I feel bound to trouble the House for a very few moments on this subject, because I am one of those Members who happen to know this country of Kashmir. I have travelled over every portion of it repeatedly, and for years I was officially connected with it; and though I never had the pleasure of knowing the Maharajah of Kashmir personally, unless I may have seen him as a child, yet I knew his father well, and his grandfather also. Now, Sir, much has been said by the hon. Member for Northampton and by the hon. Member for South Donegal, and again by the hon. Member for Aberdeen, who has just sat down, regarding the ambitious or greedy eye which England has cast upon Kashmir. Indeed, in effect, the language used by hon. Members embodies the charge that England is attempting a theft of territory. Indeed, the hon. Member for Northampton exhausted the resources of phraseology in accusing England of appropriating the lands of others. But is the House aware that England gains not one rood by the transactions which are now under consideration? All that happens is the transfer of the sovereignty from one brother to another. The power, the wealth, the property, remains in the same family; it is a mere exchange from one person to another as Regent. England remains exactly in the same position as she was before, and is in no wise benefited. She has acted with entire disinterestedness, and whether she is wrong or whether she is right, her sole object has been to benefit the people of Kashmir. What ground has the hon. Member for South Donegal for saying that we want a frontier there? I am afraid the hon. Member does not know what our frontiers are. We have no military frontier in that direction. It is not from there we should be invaded. No, Sir, the mighty mountains of the Himalayas constitute an impassable barrier to any enemy, either from Asia or from Europe. Then, Sir, the hon. Member for Aberdeen seemed to find fault with my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary, for saying that the Moslem of Kashmir must be protected. The hon. Member entirely misapprehended my right hon. Friend's meaning. What my right hon. Friend meant was this, that the Maharajah of Kashmir is a Hindoo potentate, and that we interfered by force of arms to place him over a Moslem population—a population which was not Hindoo at all by allegiance or by tradition. They were, therefore, placed under an alien prince by the action of the British Government. My right hon. Friend meant to say that we were bound to see that the Moslem population suffered nothing at the hands of the Hindoo masters whom we had set over them. And the hon. Member for Aberdeen spoke of the gratitude which we owe the Maharajah of Kashmir. I am not prepared to deny that Sovereigns of his house have behaved well—his grandfather co-operated with us during the darkest days of the Mutiny. But, after all, the gratitude was due from him to us rather than from us to him. He was our ally. We had placed him on the throne for political reasons of our own, and he was bound to act for us when we required his services. Something has been said of the several British Residents. I was grieved to hear the terms of disparagement in which the hon. Member for Northampton spoke of those most able servants of the State. At all events, they have no Party purpose to serve; they are above partisan considerations. They may, like all men, be liable to error, but they are completely disinterested, and their action is based on inflexible impartiality. In this case it was not one or two, but three Residents—men of different ideas, but who all came to the same conclusion respecting the Government of Kashmir. Then, Sir, regarding the misgovernment. I quite admit that reforms were at one time introduced and carried out to a considerable extent. I, myself, in former days, have been witness to them. But

Sir R. Temple

I am afraid those reforms came to a termination, or at least declined. But, Sir, much was said, and with great truth, by my right hon. Friend, with regard to mismanagement of the Land Revenue, and the gross oppression which was practised upon the ryots. I quite admit that the abuses are not recent, and the Report which has been read to-night confirms what I used to hear when I was connected with the Foreign Department in India. But I am afraid that the evils have now reached alarming proportions, perhaps even a monstrous development. The hon. Member for Aberdeen speaks of the decreasing population. Now of all countries, Kashmir is the most favoured physically. The climate may be severe in winter, but in summer the land smiles with fertility, and is as bountiful as any place in the world. Indeed, nature has lavished advantages on what once was the Happy Valley. That its population is decreasing, is a sure sign of misgovernment. I quite admit that there may have been outbreaks of cho'ra and other epidemics; but as for famine, it is the last place in the world where such a calamity would be expected. The question comes, what is the nature of the misgovernment? Well, now, I submit that that is a question which should be left to the responsible Government on the spot. Surely it is our duty to see that a good Government is set up in that Empire, and when it has been set up do not harass it, or interfere with it, or try to establish Committees of Inquiry here to investigate matters, which can hardly be made the subject of specific inquiry by evidence, by prosecution, by defence, and so forth, but which must be left to the discretion of the responsible Government on the spot. If we are to have a Government at all in India we must entrust such affairs as these to that Government. There is, we are told, a bad system in this State of Kashmir; that the population is decreasing; property is not secure; that communications are not looked after; that the whole land is going rapidly to ruin, and that all Departments are falling to a low level. But how are we to examine into these matters by an inquiry such as is asked for? Such questions are hardly susceptible of quasi-judicial inquiry. We all know how that would end. It would end in the acquittal of the accused, while everyone knew that mal-administration existed. All these matters should be left to the Governor General in Council, and he is responsible for dealing with matters which are within his purview and not within ours, and to him we leave the responsibility. An inquiry of this kind would have a bad effect in India. The hon. Member for Northampton speaks as if this political measure of superseding the Maharajah of Kashmir would have a bad effect; but I can assure him that to have an inquiry of the kind which has been suggested, in which the whole Government of Kashmir would be overhauled by a formal investigation, would be a measure above all others calculated to alarm the Native Princes of India, and would be repugnant to those very purposes whom he proposes to serve.

* (7.2.) SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe): In this Debate we have been placed under the disadvantage that the Papers relating to Kashmir are not yet in the hands of Members. But by the courtesy of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir John Gorst), I have had the advantage of perusing these Papers for a short time, and it is only fair that I should rise to say, that so far as I can judge from a hasty perusal of the Papers, and following carefully the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, he has stated the case as regards the action of successive Viceroy and successive Secretaries of State in their relation to the late Maharajah of Kashmir and the present Maharajah with perfect fairness. I may venture to say one or two words more as to whether the facts which have been laid before us show a necessity for such an inquiry as is asked for. I believe if hon. Members will examine these Papers, they will find that there is nothing in them to call for a review by a Parliamentary Committee of the patient and deliberate action of the Government of India, who seem to have hesitated long before taking any strong step, although the misgovernment of the Maharajah has been, I fear, of a very glaring description. I would only venture to make this one remark. It should be a satisfaction to hon. Members on this side of the House to find, with respect to the Government of India, that it has not been drawn into the annexation policy which my hon. Friend deprecates, but that it leaves the Government of Kashmir under a Council of natives guided by the Resident; and in concluding a Despatch addressed by the Viceroy of India to the Maharajah of Kashmir, the Viceroy treats him with the greatest consideration and courtesy, and expresses a hope that it may be possible to give greater power to him in the future. At present the Maharajah is put in an ornamental position. He is not deposed, but simply relieved of the powers of ruler of the country; and these powers are confided to a Council. I hope, therefore, the House will pause before voting for this Motion.

* (7.6.) SIR W. PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.): I will not detain the House for more than a few minutes, but I am not at all satisfied with the statement of the Under Secretary of State for India. The course of the Debate has rather taken us from the point we ought to have before us, and I am very much surprised to hear the remarks which have fallen from the right hon. Member who has just spoken, in face of the glaring case which has been made by the Member for Northampton. The Member for Northampton is condemning the action of the Government of India, and is asking the House to express its sense of the course taken by the Government of India with respect to the Maharajah of Kashmir, and his complaint is that they have not given this man a chance of clearing himself from the charges which have been brought against him. It is not to a Parliamentary Inquiry that this man's chance of clearing himself is to be entrusted. Why should we not have a Judicial Inquiry, and why is it that the Government are refusing to give this man a real investigation into the charges made against him? From what we have had brought before us, there is real reason to believe that not only has considerable misgovernment been going on in Kashmir in preceding reigns as now, but that there has been no reproof administered as to this misgovernment. The right hon. Gentleman asks us are we going to stand in the way of justice being done in Kashmir, but is he going to stand in the way of justice being done to the Maharajah? If he asserts that he (the Maharajah) is innocent of the charges brought against him—

SIR JOHN GORST: There are no charges.

*SIR W. PLOWDEN: Then if there are no charges why is he deposed? Evidently there must be some misconduct attributed to this man; in fact, we know there is, because the whole defence put up by the Government is that he has been misconducting the Government, and because he has been doing so he has been deposed. He says, "I have not misconducted the Government; I am not guilty, and I ask to have my case inquired into." If the hon. Member for Northampton presses his Motion to a Division, I shall be bound to support him, unless we get a clear assertion from the right hon. Gentleman that he will send out instructions to the Government of India to form some Judicial Commission which shall inquire into the charges alleged.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

£3,467,600, Provisions, Forage, Clothing Establishments, and Services.

*(7.24.) DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeen, W.): I should like to say a word or two on this Vote, as it is one in which I have taken the greatest interest ever since I have been in the House. I should like to express a hope that the Report of the Committee which inquired into the question of soldiers' rations will not be put unceremoniously into the waste paper basket, as other Reports of this kind have been. I do not think the Government intend to deal in that way with the Report, because I see that this year there is an increase of £15,000 in the item, which would seem to show that the Government have determined to have regard to the recommendations of the Committee. The plan proposed for remedying the grievance of the men seems to me a fair and sensible one, and brings many practical points under the notice of the Secretary of State, which I hope he will be able to tell the House he has decided to adopt. The only fault I have to find with the Department is that they have not published the full details, for I think it would have been interesting if we could have heard the statements and opinions given in a large number of influential Reports not only from soldiers, but other people of experience, who have a right to give an opinion on the questions now under consideration. I know, however, there have been Departmental reasons for keeping back these Reports; therefore, I will not say anything more on that point. Complaints have been made of the inferior quality of the meat, and it is frankly admitted that there have been good grounds for complaints, especially at the smaller stations. The inferior quality of the meat, I think, has been due to the pernicious practice of always accepting the lowest tender, although the price tendered might be so low as to leave no profit if fairly carried out. I hope that in future when a contractor is found to be supplying meat of a bad quality he will not be allowed to tender again, at any rate until the lapse of a certain number of years. The recommendation of the Committee that there should be cooking classes established in the Army is, I think, a very important one, as it will teach the men how to make the most of the nutritive qualities of the meat. Instruction should also be given in judging meat. Then, as to bread, I think there should be some general regulations laid down as to the best description of yeast to be employed, and the most appropriate form of loaf to bake. In conclusion, I would say I think the most important thing of all that has come out of the investigation is the recommendation that, in each regiment there should be an officer directly responsible for the quality of the provisions and the bread. I am sorry, however, the Committee were not able to suggest any practical remedy as to the great drawback which results from the long gap of semi-starvation which exists between dinner time and half-past 12 or 1 o'clock. I am glad, however, to see that one practical man has done much himself to meet the difficulty. Evidence was given before the Committee by Colonel Burnett, of the First Royal Irish Regiment, who has nearly solved the question from his own point of view without making any addition to the actual money charge for rations. He has been able to provide his men with a good breakfast and something nourishing for supper, so as to bring them back at a reasonable hour at night and give them a good meal in the morning. I think it very unfortunate that something has not been done for the recruits. The present ration is clearly sufficient for the soldier if it is well distributed, properly cooked, and of good quality; but I think it is not sufficient for the recruit. He is a growing lad; if he has ceased to grow in height he is growing in breadth and thickness, and as he is constantly called on to do a great variety of very difficult work, great strain is thrown not only on his body, but on his mind. I know that the recruits of Caterham are compelled to spend every farthing they can scrape up in order to keep body and soul together, and their present ration is deficient in farinaceous and fatty ingredients, such as cheese, butter, and milk. I must, however, congratulate the Secretary for War on having taken up the general question, and on having as I hope, gone a considerable way towards settling it.

*(7.34.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I am glad to say that while we have carried out some of the recommendations of the Committee, which I may state includes the Quartermaster General amongst its members, we are in course of carrying out others, and I hope before long almost the whole of the Report will have come into operation. I wish especially to allude to the question of the inspection of meat. Last year the House allowed us to incur some small expenditure on the inspection of meat and the result has been of the utmost service to the Army, and I think the quality of the meat supplied has undoubtedly been improved. The hon. Member has alluded to the importance of giving such instruction as will enable officers to judge between good meat and bad. Officers often do not possess sufficient knowledge to do so. We are endeavouring to remedy this defect, and the Quartermaster General is about to issue a little book which will have the effect of teaching officers a good deal of what they ought to know on the subject. The hon. Member thinks the ration, although sufficient on ordinary occasions, is not sufficient for the recruit. I may point out that the Committee has not expressed any such opinion in its Report, and I must say that the evidence which reaches me is to the effect that the improvement which takes place in the condition of the recruit after he joins the Army proves the ration to be ample. Indeed, I believe it to be the case that in many instances the food the recruits receive after they enter the Army is very much superior to that they receive before they join. I do not know that there is any other point to which the hon. Gentleman wishes me to refer. I can assure him that this subject, having been once taken up, will not be lost sight of, and that we shall do our best to give effect to the recommendations of the Report.

(7.38.) MR. HANBURY (Preston): I have given notice to move the reduction of the Clothing Vote, and the first thing I have to say is that this year, for the first time, clothing and rations are mixed up in the same Vote. This seems to me entirely indefensible, for the two things are entirely distinct, and are administered by different Departments. The course adopted must lead to a good deal of confusion, and I am afraid will result in a loss of Parliamentary control over the Vote. I hope that in any criticisms I may have to offer on the subject of Army clothing, my right hon. Friend the Secretary for War (Mr. E. Stanhope), who has sometimes shown great anxiety to turn and rend me, will not suppose that on this occasion I desire to attach any responsibility to him. I know he represents a very centralised office; I know that the traditions of that office, with regard to clothing and all the rest of it, have been handed on from one Secretary of State to the other, and, therefore, I know it is impossible for any Secretary of State at once to bring about those changes in the War Office, which, to my mind, are in that as in other Departments so urgently needed. It would be useless for me to try and attach responsibility to anybody, for it is the main point of the present system that it is utterly impossible to find out who is responsible for anything. I do not know even whether, as far as the clothing is concerned, I ought to attack the right hon. Gentleman himself or the Financial Secretary. I have found from experience that it is impossible to make any one person responsible, and, therefore, I shall content myself with attacking the system. The first thing that strikes one with regard to this subject is that the clothing which our officers and men wear in time of peace would be of no use in time of war. When our troops went out to Egypt, did they wear the uniform in which they parade about London? Do not we know that Lord Wolseley has described the dress of our soldier as the dress of a monkey on a barrel organ? Do not we know that when we see private soldiers going about London their dress is so tight that "to bend their backs is to rend their rags." We have done away with the pigtail and the stock, and I hope the time will come when our soldiers will be clothed a little more rationally than they are at present. We know very well—we were told it in the Committee on Army Estimates—what is the reason for the peculiar dress our men wear: it is not to repel an enemy, but it is to attract the nursery maids. It is used for recruiting purposes. I am afraid the dress our soldiers wear is, to a great extent, of the same character as much of the drill they go through—the goose steps, the barrack square parade, and the march past—which seems to satisfy the genius of our military chiefs. I certainly think we should get a much better class of recruits if we saved money on dress and added it to the pay of the soldier. This question of dress has exercised the minds of many of our leading military men. What does it cost to clothe the German soldier, who does some fighting? The clothing of the English cavalry soldier costs £4 17s. 11d.; the clothing of the German cavalry soldier costs £2 15s. The clothing of the English infantry soldier costs £3 3s. 8d.; that of the German £2 10s. 8d. Will anyone tell me that the German uniform, is not fit for war? The German uniform which costs a great deal less, lasts much longer than ours. A greatcoat lasts the English soldier only five years; it lasts the German soldier eight. A helmet lasts the English soldier four years; it lasts the German soldier 10. A pair of trousers lasts the English soldier only three months; it lasts the German soldier 15. As an instance of what we spend on articles of mere show, let me point out that the bearskins of our Foot Guards cost no less than £7 5s. a-piece. If there is one thing which ought to be carefully looked to, it is that our soldiers should be well shod. Will it be believed the boots of our soldiers are machine made. The country cannot be too careful to see that our soldiers are thoroughly well shod. But even the showy dress is, to a large extent, made up of bad material. The proof of it is that it lasts such a short time, and an unimpeachable witness is Lord Wolseley, who stated in evidence—

"I have seen the French Army, and the soldiers of the German and Italian Armies, and, looking at the clothing, I should say their clothing is made of a decidedly superior quality to what ours is. The quality of ours is not as good as it ought to be very often. I attribute it to exactly the same cause that I do the fact that we have occasionally given to us very bad stores, and implements and boots—that is the small price we pay for it."

That is hardly flattering to the Director of Contracts, who carries on negotiations for all his contracts in secrecy. But Lord Wolseley is not quite correct, because the clothes are not cheap. Where have we to look for the cause of the dearness on the one hand and the badness of the material on the other? Why, to the muddle-headed organisation which runs throughout the length and breadth of our War Office. [a laugh.] My right hon. Friend (Mr. Stanhope) laughs, but what has he to say for the organisation of the Clothing Department? Is it organised for war? Would the present organisation be of any use whatever for war? Distinctly not. The Director of Stores has almost every conceivable class of stores under his control, except the clothing stores. They are kept entirely distinct. What would be the case in the time of war? Would not clothing be treated along with all other stores? And if that would be the case in time of war, why have we not got our organisation ready in time of peace? I do not know why the Clothing Department should be specially centralised. The result is enormous circumlocution. A large number of civilian clerks have to be employed to carry on the correspondence between the War Office and the regiments, on every paltry detail. Let me give an instance recorded in the Parliamentary Paper, which shows what is the result of this distinction and separation. On the 15th of December, 1887, an undress jacket was sent to Woolwich. It was examined by the Board of Clothing, which consisted of a Major and two Lieutenants, and they found that the jacket required repairs, the cost of which was estimated at 2d. The Report of the Board and the jacket was then passed on from office to office, and in the long run the Report showed no less than eight separate signatures, three initials, and eight different stamps. This is why we have so many civilian clerks in the War Office; that is the way in which the time of these gentlemen is spent. We cannot entrust any responsibility whatever to the officers of the different regiments; we cannot trust them to repair a jacket at the cost of 2d., and that is why our officers in the different regiments almost tremble at their own shadow. And what is this precious Central Department to which everything is sacrificed in this way? It is situate at Pimlico—of all places in the Metropolis about the worst for such an establishment—an extravagant place as regards site—I should like to know how much is paid per foot for it—and an awkward place for workpeople, looking at the high rents for lodgings in the neighbourhood. I am sorry to say the wages paid are by no means in proportion to the high price the people have to pay for lodgings. I find the girls at this factory only make 8s. or 9s. per week. Who is at the head of this factory? Not a soldier, who might know something about Army clothing, nor an expert, but a War Office clerk, appointed a good many years ago by a relation of Lord Panmure, then Secretary of State for War. There are too many relations of officials filling posts of this sort. The head of the factory is a mere War Office clerk, who knows nothing of the subject, and he is assisted by another War Office clerk, with no practical experience, either from the soldier's point of view or the expert's point of view. And if they had knowledge they would not have any time to supervise this Department, for I am told these men are hardly ever allowed to leave their offices, so many documents have they to sign, documents of the kind I have described. Who are the experts? Of experts, who cannot practically be supervised by those above them, there are only two—far too few for the work. It is proved that they are only able to test 10 per cent. of the clothing passed into the factory. These viewers, or Inspectors, are not only too few, but they are too badly paid. The mere War Office clerk gets £1,500 a year, and the experts, on whom the whole responsibility rests, get £400 a year. There is no check upon these men, and I find that, by a most peculiar arrangement, the men who have the testing of the clothing brought in also have a large voice in saying who shall be the contractor to supply it. Who are these two men? We had a question asked in the House this very afternoon about one of them. He was a most meritorious public servant, who was for 15 years a chief Inspector of clothing; but for two years before that unfortunate man left Pimlico he was practically blind. That is the man to whom we intrusted all the responsibility with regard to our soldiers' clothing. Of the man below him I do not want to say anything; he has redeemed his character, but it will not be denied that he was retained in Pimlico factory on condition that he was never to be promoted. An advertisement was issued for the post of Inspector of clothing, and it stated that no man above a certain age should apply. There were 50 applications for the position, every one of which was rejected, and the appointment was given to a man above the advertised age, without any competition whatever. There was no competition, but if it had been known that men of that age would be allowed to compete there would have been many applications. Now I come to the way in which contracts are given in this Department. Here I have not official evidence, but I wish to place some statements fully before the right hon. Gentleman, in order that he may inquire into them and find whether they are accurate or not. In the supply of clothing for the factory there is one pet contractor who, whether he tenders the highest or the lowest prices, always gets the bulk of the orders. For the scarlet cloth infantry tunics, this man, who quoted the highest price, got nearly the whole order in 1880, and again in 1882 and in 1883, though smaller orders were given to those who made the lower tenders to keep them quiet. In 1884, 1885, 1886, and 1887 the same thing happened again. The same principle was observed with regard to scarlet jerseys, blue tweed, and the grey cloth for great-coats. Upon this, I say, I have not official evidence, but I will place before my right hon. Friends the facts I have, that he may inquire into them thoroughly. Then I find a very important official giving evidence on these matters—the Auditor and Controller General. If there is one official whose inquiries ought to be encouraged by the House it is the Auditor and Controller General, for he is the only check on this secret system. As to contracts we know nothing of these, the people who tender know nothing of the results, all is done in darkness and secrecy, and known only to the Auditor and Controller General; and how does the War Office treat him? The Auditor and Controller General complained bitterly to the Public Accounts Committee about this, but the War

Office answered that it was purely a question of administration, that it was not a matter of accounts, and was no duty of his. That is not the line that official takes as to his duty, and if there is any doubt about it I think the War Office would do better to encourage the Auditor General to protect them than to try and stop his mouth. Passing from that I should like to know how this wonderful Department is manned. I should have thought that if there is one Department where employment could be found for old soldiers, it would be here; but no; it is a perfect rabbit-warren for Civil officials, and the few soldiers who in times past were employed there are diminishing day by day. The reason given shows how fearfully and wonderfully made must be the minds of some of the officials of the Department. Mr. Ramsden, the head of the clothing establishment, had, until four or five years ago, excellent discharged soldiers who did duty as clerks, and he complains that he has now to give £250 a year for clerks to do mechanical work that was done better by soldiers who had had experience in these things. After a time the War Office took it into its head that instead of letting the head of the Department make his selection among old soldiers there should be a roster, and men should take up the work in turn, but Mr. Ramsden soon found that he did not get the men he wanted, and he dropped the system. He was asked did he not make complaint to the Adjutant General, but that did not occur to him; he did not do that, it was not worth his while; he said not a word on the subject. Then, again, we had some light thrown upon the way in which the accounts of the Department are kept. We had practical men to examine them and report, and these practical men, Messrs. Winny and Waterhouse, reported that the books, as far as they related to the cash expenditure, were virtually not books at all, and that no private establishment could possibly be conducted with such accounts. And yet the Clothing Department is not content with doing its own work, but works for many other Departments of the State, for the General Post Office and Telegraph Service, the London and Dublin Police, the Irish Constabulary, the Customs House, the Board of Trade, the Convict Service, the Prisons Board, Colonial Governments, India, the Office of Works, the Courts of Justice, Trinity House, and other Departments. Of these the Post Office and Police pay for the work done, but the Treasury has laid down the rule that payment should not be demanded from other Departments. But why should these Departments have the work done for nothing, and the amount go to swell the War Office Vote? Surely we ought to know what the Defensive Services cost us. But this Department, which is so anxious to go beyond its scope and do work for other Departments, does not do its own work. It was set up to stop sweating in the manufacture of clothing for the Army. The Department, we have been told, could employ 1,600 hands, but actually employs only 1,200. But surely, I should think, having all the expenses of staff and plant, the Department should be worked to its full extent, and extend its employment over as large an area as it can. Here I come to by far the most grave charge against the Department. It was originally intended to stop sweating, and to manufacture the clothing of the Army, but it has been the direct cause and encouragement of sweating. This is not my statement alone; it is the statement of the Director of Army Contracts himself, given before the Sweating Committee. He says evidence has tended to show that Army Contracts have been used for years as a vehicle for sweating, and that the sweating business has been carried on under War Office provisions. This is not merely in reference to accoutrements, as has been stated from the Treasury Bench, but in the more important clothing for the Army, and other Departments of the State. Sweating under the Rules of Pimlico, the Director of Contracts says, has extended to every Department of State that has anything to do with clothing. Then he goes on to compare the prices paid for work inside and outside the factory. A large number of women are employed, and I do not object to that, but the girls only get 8s. or 9s. a week. Lord Dunraven refers to an instance in which a man, having taken a contract for supplying greatcoats at an exceedingly low rate, was asked by the Director of

Contracts how he could do the work at the price, and he replied that he knew his wages were not high, but at all events they were double what were received at the factory and for shirt-making. There is a direct contradiction between the evidence of Mr. Nepean, the Director of Contracts, and Mr. Ramsay, the head of the Clothing Department. Mr. Nepean said that the wages were higher outside the Department than inside, while Mr. Ramsay stated the direct contrary. I will leave them to settle their differences, but I should have thought it was a thing they could have made their minds clear about. What prices are paid outside? Take the case of Post Office overcoats. We find the price formerly paid was 2s. 9d. a piece. In 1887 it was reduced to 2s., and then further reduced to 1s. 8d., or a third less than two years previously, and the same witness who gave this evidence went on to say that some of these coats had been made in the same room where a child was lying ill, and there is universal testimony that these contracts are sub-let. When the evidence came out before the Sweating Committee what happened? Mr. Ramsay and Mr. Nepean proposed that a factory clause should be inserted in all contracts, binding the contractor not to sub-let. Mr. Nepean also promised that he would fix a scale of prices; but it appears he only promised it with regard to accoutrements, and no promise was made with regard to clothing. He also said he would negotiate between the masters and the men, in order to get fair wages for the latter. It is a scandal to the Government that sweating should be encouraged in one of its own Departments. The men have never been approached; Mr. Nepean has not seen them, and nothing has been done in the way of getting the wages raised. Again, how far has the factory clause been made use of? Mr. Ramsay said the Department had never taken any step to ascertain whether contractors had complied with the factory clause or not. The Director of Contracts also stated that at present no one is responsible for the discharge of that duty. There is a penalty imposed in the contracts, and yet the factory clause is not carried out. There is no inspection at the present time. The only attempt that has been made has been on the part of the Director of Contracts, who has endeavoured to see that in the East End of London the factory clause is complied with, but we do not pay him for such work; the man who gives out the contracts is the last man to do it; it should be left to an authorised Inspector. Indeed, I doubt whether there is more than one solitary instance in which the penalty has been inflicted, and yet there is evidence that this rule as to the factory clause is broken day after day. It is in time of war that the stress will come. What are the precautions taken against that emergency? We have practically no reserve of clothing in Pimlico at all. The German and the French Armies have large reserves of clothing for time of war, whereas we have clothing for 50,000 men, and nothing more, except, I believe, an additional quantity of warm-climate clothing for 30,000 men. What would happen if a war suddenly broke out? Mr. Ramsay said—

“I am afraid that, during a pressure of that kind, we should not be inclined to be very particular as to the enforcement of the factory clause. We should be glad to get the clothing wherever it is made.”

What is the report of the Sweating Committee on the whole system, and the way in which contracts are given out? I wonder if any public official ever smarted under such a Report, and received no censure but rather praise. Not in Lord Dunraven's Report, but in the mild and watered-down Report of Lord Thring, an opinion is expressed that there are grave irregularities in the system of giving out contracts, that greater diligence should be exercised, that the staff of viewers is too small and their wages too low, and often the men who are called on to report are taken from the works of the contractors. I said a good deal about this last year. It was then treated as “rank blasphemy;” but now it is justified by the Report of the Lords' Committee on Sweating. What, after all, is the justification or necessity for all this waste of money, and the possible waste of life, if, when a war comes, our soldiers are badly clothed and badly armed? I can see no reason for all this complicated machinery. The cavalry make all their own clothes in the regiment by their own tailors, and why cannot the same principle be applied to the infantry? The one branch does not move about more than the other. They all wander about the country, like a travelling circus, in what seems to me a most unnecessary fashion. If there is an Army in the world in which the manufacture of clothing by the regiments on the spot should be encouraged it is the English Army. Our Army contains proportionately more women on the establishment than any other Army in the world, and they might be advantageously employed in making clothing. The system of having ready-made clothing from Pimlico sent down to the regiments is one of the most ridiculous systems that can possibly be imagined. A clothing roll is made out every year, and the men are measured in a rough-and-ready fashion, but the clothing comes down in assorted sizes, and when many of the men are no longer in the regiment, and every set of clothing practically has to be re-made by the master tailors on the spot, thus adding to the original cost. Sir Redvers Buller admitted that the system of the distribution of the clothing to the troops is a ridiculous one, and that he had often tried to get it altered. From the top to the bottom there is nobody, either in the War Office or in the regiment, or any individual whatever, who has any distinct or personal interest in seeing that these clothes are properly made, or that when they reach the soldiers they are made to last as long as they might last. In every other Army in Europe the soldier has a distinct inducement offered to him to make his clothing last as long as he can. In our Army no such inducement is held out. My hon. Friend shakes his head. Well, I know there are certain regulations as to compensation, but they are for the most part absurd. No soldier is allowed compensation at the end of a year unless the commanding officer can say that the whole of the clothing, with the exception of boots, will last during the whole of another year. If a soldier has satisfied the commanding officer on this point, he still has to go to the general officer commanding the district, and get his assent to the arrangement for keeping his clothes. That is the way colonels of regiments are treated by the War Office. The result is endless restrictions and distinctions, and the occupation of clerks in long correspondence. When a soldier is made chargeable for loss of, or damage to, any portion of his uniform, the commanding officer has to work out an intricate arithmetical problem, in order to ascertain how much wear and tear of the article the country was deprived of. The thing is ridiculous, and it becomes the more so when it is borne in mind what ultimately becomes of the clothing. How do the Government dispose of the clothing to which, in the case of a single article being damaged by the soldier, they attach so much importance? Why, the whole of the disused clothing of the whole Army, with the exception occasionally of great coats, is disposed of in one lot to one single contractor. Moreover, it is not disposed of when the clothes actually come into disuse, so that the War Office know what they are selling and the contractor what he is buying, but a great number of the articles thus sold have never been used at all. Last year the contract entered into for the sale of the clothing for the entire Army was actually for three years in advance, at the rate of £50,000 a year, so that the War Office did not know what they sold or the contractor what he bought. The whole thing is a gross speculation. And as to the applications for tenders sent out in connection with this sale, only two were sent out in 1885. That is the way in which the contracting is done. You do not even get public competition. I contend that in this direction, also, a great reform might be made. I hold that the sale of the disused clothes should be intrusted to commanding officers of districts; and I believe if that system were adopted, and the clothes were sold in smaller lots, a much larger sum would be realised for them. Another evil connected with the system is this—and I mentioned it last year—that much of the clothing thus sold has never been in use. I am aware that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made some improvement in this respect; but it is not worth much if the commanding officers cannot be intrusted with selling anything of more value than 3d. I fully agree with Sir Redvers

VOL. CCCXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

Buller that this contract system of disposing of the disused clothing of the Army is monstrous. But the evil runs throughout the whole system of Army administration. Nearly every other Department is in as bad a condition as this one, and I propose to show when other Votes are discussed that the Clothing Department is no exception. I recognise fully the great pains which my right hon. Friend has taken since he had been at the head of the Department in order to improve it; for few Secretaries of State have worked harder than he has done. Yet, at the same time, I think it would be well if my right hon. Friend would take all advantage he can of the criticisms and facts that are brought before him. If, therefore, I have exposed any blots in the present system, and have shown the existence of abuses that ought to be remedied—and I have brought forward facts and official documents in support of what I have said—I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will not think I have been actuated by any hostile feeling towards him. I know that much of his time is taken up with schemes of military organisation and mobilisation which too often end in smoke, but these are matters which a civilian War Minister might well take in hand. In these days when our territory is extending, when we are taking upon ourselves obligations which it may require the whole Force of the Empire to defend—when our frontier is no longer the sea, and we are becoming a great land power in Africa, Asia, and America, our Army will be a much more important element of defence than it has been in the past; and if the people of the country are to be brought to believe, as I believe, that the Army should be great and strong, the very first duty that the War Office owes to the nation is to let it feel that the money spent on it is thoroughly well spent. In that case I am certain that the people of this country will never grudge the money given for the defence of the Empire; whilst, on the other hand, if the present system of maladministration continues, we shall discover that, however great our necessities, we may some day find the people of this country unwilling to spend money which will be wasted away under this chaotic and idiotic system. * (9.12.) THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): My hon. Friend the Member for Preston has pronounced a strong indictment against the Army Clothing System, and has put before the Committee in very clear language his objections to this Vote. He has complained generally of the system, and his charges are definite, but they are unsupported by facts, and contrary to the experience and opinions of those who are best qualified to speak on the subject. He has told us that not only is the system defective in itself, but that the factory at Pimlico is in the wrong place, and that the wrong men are at the head of that factory. With regard, however, to the results of the system, my hon. Friend has told the Committee very little in support of the strong indictment he has drawn up. He has stated that the clothing of the Army is shoddy clothing, but he did not bring before the Committee a single fact, argument, or suggestion, to fortify that statement.

MR. HANBURY: I think I mentioned Lord Wolseley.

* MR. BRODRICK: The utmost my hon. Friend attributed to Lord Wolseley was that some foreign Armies had clothing decidedly superior to ours. I do not desire to detract in any way from the authority of Lord Wolseley; but I must say that that was a somewhat haphazard statement on which to found an assertion as to the value of the whole of our Army clothing. If my hon. Friend were to turn to the Report of the Committee which investigated this subject with the utmost care and attention, and was presided over by the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill), he would find that that Report does not contain a single word by way of attack of the quality of the clothing. When the hon. Member for Preston supports himself by citing Lord Wolseley, I must refer the hon. Member to the answers Lord Wolseley had given to the Committee.

MR. HANBURY: Lord Wolseley distinctly stated that the clothing of the Army was in most cases too dear, and in some cases extravagantly so.

MR. BRODRICK: I do not remember that Lord Wolseley has used such language in speaking of clothing generally. It is possible he might have applied the term "extravagant" to some detail, such as the bearskins of the Guards; but the possession of these is more a question of prestige and sentiment than anything else, and it is not fair to take a remark made upon some item and use it as if it had been a condemnation of the whole clothing of the Army. On the other hand, in reply to questions respecting the German Army, Lord Wolseley said the material of the clothing was good, but the clothing was poor, and the German soldiers fought under great difficulties on account of their clothing. Lord Wolseley also stated how much longer certain articles were worn in the German Army than in the English Army; but in this connection the noble Lord remembered that ours was a Volunteer Army, for which recruits would not be obtained unless it were a well-dressed Army. My hon. Friend referred to the fact that, in the German Army, one pair of trousers is issued every 15 months, but I am certain that if we were to adopt such a system, complaints would very soon be made in the House of Commons. The hon. Member laboured somewhat ungenerously the question of the quality of the boots supplied, because, in consequence of complaints made formerly, the quality of the boots have been greatly improved, and there have been scarcely any complaints during the last two or three years. In fact, it is well-known that rejected Army boots fetch a good price in the general market, and if the boots that were rejected were good, it may be fairly inferred that those which passed the Inspector were better. The whole question lies in discovering what is the feeling of the military officials themselves? The Military Authorities have no reason to be specially prejudiced in favour of Pimlico for this reason, that a civilian takes the responsibility of manufacture, and that soldiers have the responsibility of inspection. What is the result of the Reports on the clothing in this last year? There were 3,995 Reports received from the various regiments and various establishments. Of these, there were no complaints at all from 3,219 cases. Of minor complaints, more in the form of suggestions than anything else, there were 603. Of serious complaints there were 173. But 60 of these related to the great coat cloths, which had been already condemned, and which I informed the House some time ago is to be improved.

MR. HANBURY: The great coat cloth was raised from 3s. 9d. to 5s. 6d. four years ago. Is that cloth still complained of?

*MR. BRODRICK: My hon. Friend is aware that we have some reserve at Pimlico, and so everything does not go out at once to the soldier, and I think he will find that the cloth complained of is that which has been superseded. It is very important that this House should not be under any sort of misunderstanding as to the organisation of the Pimlico Establishment itself. Now, my hon. Friend has fallen foul of the whole of it. He has referred in strong terms to its location. Well, we found it there when we came. It is a large factory, and a very good factory. It certainly would be an enormous expense to remove it. It has great advantages of locality, which I am afraid my hon. Friend does not sufficiently appreciate. I think he will find that it is not so much the case as he generally supposes, that the work-people are not living adjacent to the factory, and he will find also that it is an excellent store house and centre of distribution.

MR. HANBURY: What is the rent?

*MR. BRODRICK: I cannot at this moment state the rent. It is impossible to answer every question off-hand, though I could do so if time were given me. My hon. Friend, I think, has directed his whole mind to criticism, so that he has not realised the advantages of the situation of the factory. He asked why in the time of war the distribution of clothing was not under the Director of Stores and not under the Director of Clothing.

MR. HANBURY: I said nothing of the sort. I said the way in which clothing is administered in time of peace is totally different from what it is in time of war.

*MR. BRODRICK: The hon. Gentleman has not correctly stated his case. What he complained of was that the Director of Stores is not given the custody of the clothing already made up. You cannot have it both ways. If the Director of Stores is to have the custody he must have the distribution also. My hon. Friend has expressed himself in favour of decentralisation, and here you have a factory which is close to all the large railway stations, so that within 24 hours, the whole of the arrangements being already mapped out, we can supply every article of clothing that is necessary for the whole of the troops. My hon. Friend has made a very severe attack on the whole of the officials administering the Department. He spoke in a tone unnecessarily condemnatory and contemptuous. He spoke of the Head of the Department as a mere War Office clerk, appointed by his relative some 30 years ago.

MR. HANBURY: I said that he was inexperienced in the work, having come from the War Office.

*MR. BRODRICK: My hon. Friend constantly reiterated that he was a mere War Office clerk. A public official has no power of reply save through the Minister. Here is a man who has long served his country, against whom there is no suggestion that he has not properly discharged his duties, who has not been censured either by the Committee of this House or the Royal Commission before whom he gave evidence—a man thoroughly conversant with his duty, and a man, if he is to be attacked, should only be attacked on definite grounds.

MR. HANBURY: What I said was this. Of course, Mr. Ramsay has had over 30 years' experience. No one denies that. But I entirely object to the principle of appointing as the head of the Clothing Department a War Office clerk who can have had no experience. I say you ought to have experts at the head of this Department.

*MR. BRODRICK: I wish my hon. Friend had stated that as clearly before as he has now. That conveys an entirely different impression. I am entirely in accord with him as to appointing experts, but it is not always possible to secure them. Well, then my hon. Friend pointed out our difficulties with regard to the inspection of clothing. I really think the public will sympathise with us to some extent in the difficulties in which we found ourselves. Mr. Burnard was a most valuable public servant and he was suffering from a most trying calamity—the loss of his eyesight. His doctors assured him that it was very probable that he would regain his sight. We were anxious not to be deprived of his services, nor did we wish to penalise him because of his misfortune. His duties were discharged for him for a period. His touch was still of value, although his eyesight was deficient; and when we were satisfied that there was no longer reasonable hope of his recovering his capacity of viewing he was pensioned. Then, my hon. Friend says there were a large number of competitors, and that, in spite of that fact, Mr. Wrigley was engaged, though he was over the proper age. It is true that we laid it down that 40 years of age should be the limit, and it was equally true that Mr. Wrigley was above that age, but we were in this position, that although Mr. Wrigley was past 40 years of age his testimonials led us to believe that he was undoubtedly a better man than any of the other applicants. His papers, together with those of the other applicants were submitted to two experts, and these gentlemen unhesitatingly gave it as their opinion that Mr. Wrigley was the person who should be appointed. Under the circumstances we felt that it was absolutely necessary to take the best man, who, I may remind the Committee, was in the very prime of life, with 20 or 25 years of good work in him. He was content to come to us, and, for our part, we considered ourselves lucky in being able to secure his services. The hon. Member brought forward a most serious charge in the matter of sweating. In regard to that, we have been placed in a position of extreme difficulty at the War Office. Contractors of all kinds are willing to compete against one another, on terms which are barely remunerative, if, indeed, they are remunerative at all, for some contracts have been undertaken at an unremunerative price, in order to prevent the establishments of the contractors from being broken up. My hon. Friend holds that we ought to fix the rate of wages, but no Government has been able to do so successfully since the days of the early Edwards.

Mr. Brodrick

MR. HANBURY: That was not my suggestion. I only referred to a suggestion made by the Director of Contracts in evidence.

*MR. BRODRICK: What the Director of Contracts undertook to do was to ask the contractor at the time a contract was made for the rate of wages he was paying. It would then be possible for us to have regard to that rate of wages in giving out contracts, and, if necessary, to pass over those contractors who were not paying fair wages.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): Had the Director of Contracts seen the list of prices in the accoutrement trade—the wages paid to the men?

*MR. BRODRICK: I am not referring to that. We bound the contractors to put up the rate of wages paid to their workmen, but that does not arise under this Vote. Most unhesitatingly I say I shrink from adopting the recommendations of my hon. Friend. The hon. Gentleman attacked us for not doing that which it is extremely difficult to do, namely, to settle the rate of wages amongst those who tender against each other. He complains that we have not properly administered the factory clause. In point of fact, we have imposed a fine in certain cases, but there are other cases in which it is extremely hard to carry out the factory clause. I thoroughly recognise the value of my hon. Friend's suggestion that the wives of the soldiers should be employed in making clothing for the Army. About 4,400 women are so employed at present, and there can be no objection whatever to extending the system, if possible. With regard to what has been said about pet contractors, I may make this remark. The Director of Contracts may accept the lowest tender without reference to a higher authority, but he cannot give the bulk of an order, or any part of it, to a higher tender without the consent of the Financial Secretary or the Secretary of State. If the lowest tender is recommended to him he has power to accept it, but if he desires to give to the man who has tendered at 4s. 6d., 10,000 out of 90,000 yards, and the remainder to a man who has tendered at 5s., he is bound to refer the matter to the Financial Secretary. It is impossible to give the bulk of an order to the highest tender without referring to a superior authority. The system on which we have endeavoured to administer tenders is clear. We do not pay anything over the lowest tender if we can avoid it. If a man has previously tendered for the supply of a large amount of cloth, and has carried out his contract satisfactorily, no doubt the facts are in his favour, but ever since I have been at the War Office, our desire has been to give to the lowest tender every yard of cloth we think the contractor can supply, unless the reports against him and the rejections in the case of previous contracts have been so large as to render it necessary to be careful—for we cannot spend the whole of our time in inspecting and throwing away cloth. I can assure my hon. Friend, who has so little confidence in the present administrators of the War Office, that these contracts are given out with the greatest care—as he will find if ever he sets foot in the office himself. My hon. Friend was carried a little too far by his animus against the Director of Contracts when he cited a portion of the Report of the Lord's Committee on Sweating. The Report of that Committee says that grave irregularities have doubtless occurred in the "furnishing" of Government contracts. The paragraph reflects, not on the Director of Contracts, but upon those who ought to have inspected goods in times past. I fully admit the unfortunate results of such enormous orders having been given out in 1885, and the Departments are fully alive to those unfortunate results, and have taken them to heart. The Committee was strongly of opinion that greater vigilance should be exercised in placing the contracts; but the experience the Committee was working on was of the enormous orders given out much too precipitately in 1885, the unfortunate results of which we have seen. The hon. Member alluded to the insufficiency of the staff of viewers for the work they have to discharge, and cited the Report as to the small salaries which they receive, which throws great temptation in their way, but my answer is that the staff of viewers is not under the control of the Director of the Contracts. It must be remembered that if it is suddenly determined to spend eleven millions and to give out orders in every direction, great difficulty must be experienced in seeing that those orders are properly carried out. The hon. Member has attacked the Department very severely on the subject of the system we adopt in selling disused clothing, and has maintained that such clothing should be sold piecemeal and locally. I must say we differ from him in that respect. The advice we received from a great many quarters has since been confirmed by experience that a much better price is obtained for disused clothing when it is sold in large quantities than when it is sold locally in small parcels. My hon. Friend makes a comparison between our Army and other Armies. But Lord Wolseley pointed out that under the practice in Germany the troops never move. The soldier has a large box in which he keeps his clothing, so that he can use it to the very last. "We, on the contrary, shuffle our men out of their old clothing the moment it is done for," says my hon. Friend; but there he makes a mistake. Every commanding officer keeps that clothing as long as he likes. We, on our part, have no desire to hand over a single garment to the contractor that the officer commanding a regiment desires to keep. But our commanding officers have this difficulty to face, that they have to take these men on foreign service, and be prepared to move with them from place to place, and they will not hamper themselves with a large quantity of clothing, so that what occurs is not the fault of the officers, but of the system. My hon. Friend contended that we should effect a saving if we did not sell in such large quantities. Well, in deference to his views and those of others, we called for tenders, either for part or the whole, for any garments separately and in any numbers, and the result of that system is that tenders for the whole are infinitely higher, relatively, than tenders for a part of the same articles. My hon. Friend (Mr. Hanbury) calls us to account for having a large establishment at Pimlico, and for not using it up to its full capacity. That is really a question of policy. We think we should need a very great expansion in time of war, and we cannot provide for that expansion solely by means of contractors. In our opinion, we should do well not to work our factory above 50 or 60 per cent. of its capabilities. We consider it a wise policy to maintain factories of such producing power that there will be no necessity for running to contractors all over the country in case of any sudden emergency arising. The hon. Member was, I think, a little hard upon the Department when he complained that work was done at the Pimlico factory for the colonies and the Post Office. If other Public Departments want their work done at Pimlico that shows that, in their opinion, the work done there is efficient and of a highly satisfactory character. Complaint has been made that we have not a sufficient reserve of clothing. I hope my hon. Friend will not mind if I say that on that point he based his complaint on an isolated answer of the Director of Clothing. We thought it desirable at the time that not too much information should be given. I do not wish to say at what period of the year we had an enormous reserve and at what period we had the least reserve, but I may tell the Committee that the figures given related to by far the smallest reserve in that year. What my hon. Friend said about the discussion as to small expenditure on repairs was extremely amusing, but I am sure he will admit that these are not things of every day occurrence, and it is obvious such repairs should be and are executed at the regiment. With regard to the clothing for which the soldier is charged we cannot, I think, make too accurate a calculation when we are stopping the amount from the man's pay. Now, I trust I have shown that the Department does not deserve all the hard things my hon. Friend has said of it. We feel as strongly as he does the necessity of having the clothing of the Army in a thoroughly practical and efficient condition, and we are very far from shutting our eyes to any improvement that may be suggested. The Quartermaster General, who has been cited, has full opportunity of representing his opinions very strongly, and his views have immense weight with the Department. We desire to preserve the factory at Pimlico, as at present, so as to be capable of expansion and to keep up the trade all over the country, so as to ensure the high quality of the garments supplied. I do not think anything has fallen from my hon. Friend which would justify the Committee in assuming that the country has lost anything by the system that has been pursued during the last two or three years. I admit that there have been times of pressure, when the supply has not been as satisfactory as it might have been, but we are always ready to recognise the efforts of those who, like my hon. Friend, do their best to show us where we can remedy defects. We shall use every effort to provide that contractors who get a fair price from us give a fair price to their workmen. In this respect, the advice of any Member of the House who is interested in trade will be valuable, and I would invite suggestions from any Member on either side of the House, and information as to any case of sweating under a Government contract.

(9.58.) MR. HANBURY: One practical question. My hon. Friend invites suggestions. Will he see that proper Inspectors are appointed to see that the Factory Acts are put into operation, so as to prevent sweating?

(9.59.) MR. J. ROWLANDS: I was very glad to hear the hon. Gentleman say the War Office would do everything they could to put down sweating. I do not think the hon. Gentleman can read the Report of the Lords Committee on sweating with keen satisfaction. The Government Departments have not come out of that investigation at all well. If there is one body more than another which can and ought to keep its contracts free from all kinds of sweating, it is a Government Department. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think there was nothing to complain of in connection with the strictures of the Lords Committee. I think the very paragraph he quoted, as far as it relates to the placing of contracts, taken in connection with the other comments of the Committee on Government contracts, is something which the representatives of the War Office ought to look into. I would point out that the one thing which has been told all through is that, wherever possible, the factory clause has been introduced into contracts. The evidence of the Director of Contracts himself, however, and the strong statements which appear in the Lords' Report, show that the factory clause, as put into contracts, is simply a delusion and a snare. If the factory clause is put into contracts, why do not the Government see that it is carried out? You had better by half leave it out of contracts altogether than delude Members of the House with the idea that it is having a great effect in doing away with sweating when it is doing nothing of the kind. The Director General, in the course of his evidence before the Committee, stated that all the clothing contracts now contained the factory clause, but said he had no means of inspecting the factories during the execution of the contracts. Asked whether anybody had a right to check the contractors, he said the Home Office Inspectors visited them for the purpose of the Factory Act. He was asked, "Is it nobody's duty to find out whether the factory clause is carried out in Government contracts?" and his reply was "Not at present." He said he trusted to the bona fides of the contractor and that in large contracts it was more economical for contractors to do the work themselves than to get it done outside. Now, Sir, I do think that before this Vote is passed we ought to have a distinct statement from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. E. Stanhope) that machinery will be created for the purpose of putting the factory clause into force. I do not intend now to go into the questions so ably dealt with by the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury). I would merely say that, after trying as an outside Member to get the knowledge that is necessary to protect the working people, I have arrived at the conclusion, which I think is also the conclusion of the Lords Committee, that the best thing we can do, at all events for a start, is to get the factory clause put into all contracts and thoroughly carried out. It is because we believe this would tend to suppress the sweating that has undoubtedly gone on, and full evidence of which will be found in the Report of the Lords Committee, that we press the right hon. Gentleman for some statement as to the action the War Department is going to take to provide that the operation of the factory clause is not a sham but a reality.

(10.8.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I think this Debate shows that it is a doubtful question whether the Government ought to have a clothing factory or not. The maintenance of such a factory cannot bring them directly in contact with all questions affecting labour and capital. It is a different thing at Woolwich and Enfield, where the best classes of labour are employed, and the men are highly paid. In a clothing factory you have to deal with a class of people who get about the lowest wages in the country, and the question at once arises whether the Government should take upon itself the settlement of any of the problems of work and labour. I believe private manufacturers could supply clothing quite as well as any Government factory. It is very necessary we should have a Government factory for warlike stores; but I cannot think it is necessary to have a Government factory for clothing. Soldiers like Members of this House do not want the best material. They like to have new clothes on; after a time they get absolutely sick of old clothes and desire to cast them aside. They therefore do not require the best material. Soldiers do not care for a great coat that lasts for ever. On the whole, I think the clothing is tolerably fair. There are some regiments that are very expensive. The Financial Secretary instanced the Guards. There are also Highland regiments; and several of the Cavalry regiments, whose clothing is expensive, something like £6 per head. There is one point which lays the Government open to suspicion, and it is that the contracts are not published. No one knows whether the lowest tender is accepted or not. The non-publication of the tenders is a system which may lead to corruption. Of course, I do not mean to say that the person who at present is in authority is at all dishonest; but the only way to get rid of the possibility of corruption is to publish the winning tender. Again, I think the troops ought to be localised more than they are at present. We should save a great deal of money, and add greatly to the comfort of the soldier. On the Continent there is considerably less movement; but here regiments are moved from Aldershot to Dublin, from Dublin to York, and back again to Aldershot, and all in the space of a very short time. Another point the Secretary of State ought to turn his attention to is the food of the soldier. I think the soldier is sufficiently well-dressed to attract recruits, but I think he ought to get more food or more pay. I do not think he should get a larger ration of meat or bread, but at present the soldier has to find his sugar and butter. The least we could do would be to give the soldier a free breakfast. Again, I have found lately that the Infantry soldiers are very small and young; you are taking them about a year younger than you used to do. They, of course, grow into fine men, but I think it is bad policy to take men who are too young for their work. The result is that you are practically paying 1,000 men when only 600 or 700 are available. I have no doubt it is very difficult to find recruits. The soldier is beginning to thoroughly realise that he does not get a pension, and that he does not get his food free: all he gets is $\frac{3}{4}$ lb. of meat and 1 lb. of bread. I should like to know what is the price paid for meat.

(10.23.) GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith): I quite admit the time has arrived when the rations ought to be increased. At the present time there is difficulty in recruiting, and the difficulties increase as the wages of civilians increase.

*(10.24.) MR. E. STANHOPE: I wish to interpose at this point to remind the Committee that there is a general desire on the part of hon. Members to reach the discussion of a matter of great importance to the Army. Although I cannot suppose it will conclude to-night, I understand there is a general desire to begin the discussion to-night. With regard to what has fallen from my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway, he seems to suggest a doubt as to whether the clothing factories should exist at all. The idea is that we should hand over to each regiment the duty of providing their own clothes. That system was tried, and it broke down. There is one important matter to which I should like to draw attention. We are always liable to strikes, and I can well believe the Army might be placed in a most dangerous and difficult position in a time of crisis when we required garments on the shortest notice if we were not able to control the supply. I am quite ready to admit that the clothing factory may not be established in the best place, but still it is of great advantage to the Army. The hon. Member for Preston asks what is the rent of the ground. It is £3,500 a year; we hold the ground on leasehold tenure. Then my hon. Friend asks a question with regard to the wages paid at the clothing factory. I am glad to be able to inform the House that the rate of wages in the clothing factory compares not unfavourably with that in any other establishment. Machinists get from 23s. 6d. to 24s., and sewers from 14s. a week. The hon. Member says the clothing supplied is not cheap clothing, and he goes on further to advocate very strongly the principle of open contracts. I have always told him that I feel very strongly that the system of open contracts is the better system; but surely the hon. Member will see that the system of absolutely open contracts is impossible of application at the same time that you are trying to abolish the system of sweating. If you allow complete competition between contractors you cannot ensure that they will not resort to sweating.

MR. HANBURY: You must not take the lowest tender.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: My hon. Friend says we need not take the lowest. I thought it was the very point of the discussion, that if one thing was more desirable than another it was that we should take the lowest tender.

MR. HANBURY: I mean that it should be seen what the contractor gives his men.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: An hon. Member also suggested, I think, that we should quote the prices at which the contracts are obtained. So far as I am concerned, I have a perfectly open mind on the question of making tenders public. My hon. Friend at the head of the Admiralty is equally disposed to adopt that system which, upon the whole, seems the best in the interests of the country. We have directed inquiries to be made to contractors in all parts of the country, and to bodies perfectly well able to gauge what is the best course to be adopted, and we find the preponderance of opinion not only among contractors, but Chambers of Commerce was that it is not desirable to make these tenders public. And two responsible officers, to myself and to my hon. Friend, reported that after the most careful consideration, they did not think it in the public interests to make tenders public. I have considered the matter, and speaking for myself, after considering that Report, I came to the conclusion that it was founded on sound principles, and that it is not expedient that tenders should be made public. Then the hon. and gallant Member spoke of the movement of troops, and I entirely agree with him that economy should be consulted in moving the troops as little as is consistent with efficiency and comfort. But you cannot always keep the troops in one quarter. There are only a certain number of pleasant billets in the United Kingdom, and if, when you bring troops from foreign parts, you were to put them in uncomfortable quarters—I will not say in what part of the United Kingdom—where they have discomforts, and where they have not the society of their friends, you may depend upon it the system of voluntary enlistment would be seriously endangered. Therefore, we are obliged, in the interests of the Service, to give all our troops a share of pleasant quarters; otherwise, the Service could not be carried on satisfactorily. My hon. Friend the Financial Secretary calls my attention to the fact that as regards the cost of transit in the present year we are enabled to show a saving of £10,000. Then, also, the hon. Member referred to the question of inspection. I think both hon. Members will admit that the responsibility of factory inspection does not lie with the War Office, but with the Home Office. Factories in which goods are produced for the War Office must be inspected just as much as any other factories by the Home Office. But we do accept special responsibility with regard to certain particular points; and I told my hon. Friend, in answer to a question which he addressed to me some weeks ago as regards clothing, that the Director of Clothing has taken care that certain officials from the Clothing Department should visit the factories. But my hon. Friend suggests that we should appoint one Inspector. For my part, I think very considerable advantage is derived from the existing system of having, instead of one Inspector, a change of Inspectors who are not known to the contractors. I have dealt with the various points that have been raised, and I only want to refer to two other points. My hon. Friend has talked of the Clothing Department, and he has attributed all sorts of evils to the system which is pursued there, and he told us in language very minatory that this Department was only typical of what was going on in the various Departments of the War Office, and when the time comes he will show that to be the case. If he can only show that the other Departments of the War Office are conducted as well as the Clothing Department, I will be very glad. I believe, for my own part, that the Department is conducted in a manner which reflects the utmost credit upon its managers. I am very certain that every inquiry that has been instituted has only resulted in showing that it is one of the best conducted Departments in the Public Service. I will go very much further. I invite any hon. Member of this House to visit that factory. He shall have access to every branch of it; he may see the books, and every facility will be given him to ascertain the system of management, and I am perfectly confident he will come back to this House filled with the belief that there, at all events, is a Public Department conducted on sound principles of economy, combined with efficiency. One other point my hon. Friend talked about, the reserve of clothing, and he quoted from a Report now several years old. What I have to say to the House now is practically only a repetition of what I said when I made my speech on the Vote for the Army Estimates. We have given our closest attention to the question of the reserve of clothing. It has been insufficiently attended to. I do not want to blame one official or another, but it has not been fully attended to until recently. We have given our utmost attention to the reserve of clothing, and at this moment I am happy to be able to say that we have not only a satisfactory reserve of clothing, but we have such arrangements as will enable us, in the event of the mobilisation of all the Forces of this country for the purposes of defending the United Kingdom, to supply within a reasonable period, calculated according to the probabilities of the notice we should expect, within a perfectly reasonable and a very short period, all the troops of the regular Army, the Reserves, and the Militia, with the further clothing that they would require properly to take their places in the defence of the country. I hope that statement, broad as it is, will be satisfactory to the House. One step further. My hon. Friend talks of the necessity of decentralisation with regard to clothing, and he points out that we have decentralised other stores. Why, he asks—and perfectly reasonably—do we not decentralise the clothing? I will tell him why. Supposing the troops in a particular dépôt centre were called out for service at this moment. There may be a regiment of Highlanders, and, you may have had in the year before a regiment of a totally different character, and for which the clothing would be absolutely useless. Nor can you tell the size of the men for whom you are called upon to provide clothing. On the whole, considering the necessary changes that take place and the different sorts of troops which are found at any given station from year to year, we feel that an absolute economy of time is produced by keeping the main portion of the clothing in one centre, so that when the occasion arises for the issue of it for the purposes of mobilisation, it can be despatched, as we are absolutely able to do within a very few days, to the quarters where it is required, and according to the needs of the particular place. I hope the House will think that the War Office has made reasonable provision, and that it will now allow the discussion of the further Vote, in connection with which there are questions to be raised in which a very large number of Members are specially interested.

(10.43.) MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the inspection of factories. The Factory Inspector has no right to interfere with what is intended to be interfered with under the Factory Clause. In the present position of the labour market, the outcry against sweating in all parts of the country, and the very severe condemnation of the Government system in the Report so recently issued, I do think that the right hon. Gentleman should take special care to enforce the Factory Clause. I quite agree that the present system of inspection is better than having one man to go from place to place, and I do urge upon him to see that the Factory Clause is absolutely carried out.

(10.45.) MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): The right hon. Gentleman has stated, as I understood him, that 14s. 6d. is paid for a week's hard work. I should like to know how that compares with wages paid in other factories. I think that in matters of this kind the Government ought to set a good example, and I trust the right hon. Gentleman will be able to hold out some hope that these people will be paid in the future something like a fair amount of wages.

MR. HANBURY: My right hon. Friend has spoken of this Department as being of great use in case of a strike. May I ask him whether these persons are entitled to anything in the shape of pension? because, if not, I cannot see in what way the Pimlico factory can be regarded as a protection against strikes.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I believe it will be found that the amount of wages paid compares favourably with what is paid elsewhere for the same kind of work. I may add that we are very careful in the selection of those who are employed in this work, and that we have made admirable arrangements for providing them with excellent food at an exceedingly low rate.

Vote agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £253,400, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Salaries and Miscellaneous Charges of the War Office, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891."

*(10.48.) MR. E. STANHOPE: I am under a pledge to the House to state what are the views the Government entertain with regard to the Report of the Commission presided over by the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale. And I do not think I should properly be discharging my duty if I did not ask the Committee to allow me to express to the noble Lord and his Colleagues my very hearty thanks and the thanks of the Government for the manner in which they discharged the very arduous labours they undertook. That Commission was a very strong one indeed. It contained no less than three ex-Secretaries of State. It contained, also, two or three men who have had a large experience in the administration of other Services, as well as men of business habits, and altogether nobody can deny that they formed a very strong Commission. There is one thing on which I desire to say a preliminary word. There was an exceedingly able article in the Times newspaper describing the recommendations of the Report in a manner to which I do not desire to raise the smallest objection, but it did me the honour to include me as one of the members of the Commission. I am bound to say I can claim no such honour. I was not a member of the Commission, and I am rather sorry that in the otherwise very accurate Report that statement should have been made. Now, the Commission over which the noble Lord presided went to the very root of the matter and discussed principles of the most vital importance, and laid before us a State Paper which we read now with great interest, and which I venture to say will remain on record as one which those who have to administer, either the Army or the Navy, for many years to come will undoubtedly require to have recourse to. I propose to deal, first, with the preliminary Report of the Commission. And here I may say that, with the exception of one particular recommendation in the preliminary Report bearing on the Admiralty, I do not propose to refer to the recommendations in relation to the Admiralty. That is for my noble Friend; but the particular proposal to which I am about to call attention is one that affects not only the War Office, but also the Admiralty. There is a proposal in the preliminary Report that there should be established a Naval and Military Council for the purpose of considering questions affecting the War Office and the Admiralty. Now, I ought to say that I think the actual differences between the War Office and the Admiralty have been very much exaggerated. The experience of my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty, as well as my own, leads me to the belief that there is no necessity for any friction or serious difference between the two Departments. Of course, my noble Friend and myself have had differences of opinion on many questions affecting the two Departments; but those differences have never assumed any acute form, or one likely to endanger the efficiency either of the one Department or the other. But there are matters between the two Departments in connection with which the work must necessarily overlap. The more they desire to do their work well the more is the work likely to overlap; and I think, for my own part, there is nothing more important as regards the proposal of a Military and Naval Council than a paragraph which I will now read, and which shows the particular points it is most desirable should be referred to such a Council if it should be established. The Report of the Commission says that the Council should be summoned from time to time "To consider and authoritatively decide upon unsettled questions between the two Departments, or any matters of joint naval and military policy, which, in the opinion of the heads of the Services, required discussion and decision. It would be essential to the usefulness of such a Council and to the interests of the country that the proceedings and decisions should be duly recorded, instances having occurred in which Cabinet decisions have been differently understood by the two Departments."

Now, the criticism which I have to offer on the part of the Government upon that proposal is this—we do not think that it covers ground enough. We think that questions affecting the Army and the Navy also in many respects affect the Colonial Office, the India Office, and sometimes even the Foreign Office, and the Government think, therefore, that any scheme that might be adopted dealing with these matters will be essentially incomplete if it do not take into consideration the wants and wishes of those two great Departments. Having, therefore, taken into consideration the recommendations of the noble Lord and his Colleagues, and bearing in mind that criticism which I have mentioned to the Committee, we think that a Naval and Military Council might be formed within the Cabinet under the presidency of the Prime Minister. I do not at the present moment desire to lay down any basis limiting either the functions or the constitution of the Committee, but we think it is essential for the naval and military policy of the country being conducted in relation to and in concord with the other great Departments to which I have alluded that such a Committee should, in some form or another, be constituted. We agree also with the recommendation of the Commission that the Resolutions of that Committee should be formally recorded. We think they should be submitted to the Government for approval, and that after they receive the approval of the Cabinet they should be recorded not only for the benefit of all the Departments concerned, but also for the benefit of our successors in office. Now, Sir, I proceed to deal with the further Report of the Commission; and, first of all, I should like—dealing, I will not say with minor questions, but with questions not of the first importance—to invite the attention of the Committee to the recommendations in paragraph 100 of the Report. Paragraph 100 recommends the establishment of a permanent War Office Council, under the presidency of the Secretary of State, and the object to be attained is “securing unity of administration and strengthening the consultative element in the War Office.” Most Members of the House are aware that in former times there existed at the War Office a Council to which various officers were summoned to give their advice to the Secretary of State on important questions that might arise. But we perfectly agree that meetings of that sort require to be placed upon a more definite, permanent, and secure basis than that on which they now stand, and we are of opinion that in future there should be a formal War Office Council meeting under the presidency of the Secretary of State, not in any way derogating from or depriving him of complete and sole responsibility for all that goes on within the walls of the War Office, but, nevertheless, assisting him in a more formal manner than hitherto in arriving at decisions of primary importance to the country. We have said that that Council should be composed of civil and military officers, and we have taken steps to provide for freedom of discussion in the Council, and for recording the decisions at which it may arrive. Closely connected with this is the question of the establishment of a Promotion Board. The question of promotion, especially to the higher ranks of the Army, acquires very great importance from the fact that promotion by seniority to the higher ranks will be abolished, and that selection becomes the rule for the rank of colonel and also of general. We take this opportunity of securing that promotion to the higher ranks which, I believe, for the most part in times past has been satisfactory, shall be not only satisfactory in itself, but shall recommend itself to the general opinion of the Army. We think that can best be done by the establishment of a Promotion Board connected with the War Office, which shall recommend to the heads of the Department men who ought to be selected for promotion to the higher grades. In this way we believe that a better choice would be made than has hitherto been the case. I now come to the much larger and graver question—the great crucial question—which I may sum up in the proposal for the abolition of the office of Commander-in-Chief of the Army. I do not think I can better state what I want to say than by quoting from the Report of the Royal Commission. The Royal Commission, while acknowledging to the full the services rendered by the present Commander-in-Chief, go on to recommend that when a vacancy occurs certain great changes should take place. In paragraph 67 they say—

“While we have considered it necessary to indicate the defects in principle which exist in the present organisation of the War Office, we recognise that the unique position so long held by the present Commander-in-Chief may have rendered it undesirable to adopt any other system in making the recent changes, and that his great experience may have enabled the existing system to work with the success claimed for it during the short period for which it has been in operation. His Royal Highness has on all occasions accepted with the greatest loyalty the changes which successive Secretaries of State have thought it right to introduce, and he has brought to bear upon the work at the War Office a personal popularity with the Army in general which cannot fail to be of public advantage.”

And they go on to say—

"But it is clear that no possible successor could enjoy a position and influence which years of service to the State are alone capable of establishing. We therefore proceed to indicate the general lines upon which we think the administration of the War Office should be based, and towards which, on the occurrence of a vacancy in the office of Commander-in-Chief, or at any favourable opportunity, future changes should be directed."

Nobody can deny that the recommendations which follow are far reaching. They are to the effect that the office of Commander-in-Chief as it at present exists should be abolished, and that there should be established a Chief of the Staff, who should be responsible to the Secretary of State, and who would promote unity of administration at the War Office. I say again that these are very far-reaching recommendations indeed. They affect almost every branch of military administration, and they raise questions as complicated and perplexing as any Government has ever had to face. It is quite clear from the discussion which has taken place that some of these questions excite opposition of the most varied character. And they affect not only the working of the War Office, but also the position and relations of the War Office to the general government of the country and to the Crown. These recommendations, supported as they are by high authority and contained in a State Paper of extraordinary importance, have engaged, and are engaging, the most serious attention of the Government. We feel that it is not a question to be disposed of off-hand nor without the fullest investigation and consideration, and, while we are fully aware that no decision of ours upon this great question can bind any successors of ours who may happen to be in office at the time when the vacancy in the office of Commander-in-Chief occurs, we reserve to ourselves the right to announce at the time of our own choosing our definite opinion upon the recommendation of the Royal Commission. I desire, on the part of the Government, to express our concurrence in the terms of the paragraph in which the Royal Commission state their views as to His Royal Highness. I think I am entitled to speak with some little authority as to what His Royal Highness has done, and this, at least, I will say—and I am sure right hon. Gentlemen opposite, who have had similar experience will agree with me—that I believe there can be no doubt that, whether in the occasional differences that happen between the Secretary of State and the Commander-in-Chief the Commander-in-Chief is wrong or right, he is always actuated by a feeling of devotion to the Service to which so long a period of his life has been given, and by a keen desire to maintain its honour and promote its interests. While I have no desire to express a final decision upon the main principle, we think that there is no reason why, at the present time, we should not fill up the office of Adjutant General, which is shortly about to become vacant. I have seen it stated in some of the newspapers that Lord Wolseley was retiring because of personal differences with myself. I am very glad to say, in spite of the newspaper paragraphs, that my relations have been always uniformly of an extremely friendly character with Lord Wolseley. He is retiring from the War Office now, having exceeded the term of office for which he was appointed. He will retire on the 1st of October next, and I cannot allow that to pass without saying that I think he may rest satisfied that the work he has done for the War Office during the seven years that he has been connected with it as Adjutant General will undoubtedly leave a permanent mark. He may be perfectly satisfied the foundation has been laid of an organisation which I believe will be satisfactory, and likely to remain the permanent organisation of the Army. We have also had to consider his successor. Our desire, our feeling of responsibility leads us to say that two conditions ought to be fulfilled, first, that we ought to have the strongest man that it was possible to draw from the ranks of the Army; and, second, that we ought to have a man not only acceptable to ourselves, and to me personally, but also acceptable to the Army generally. Of course, there is a name which naturally springs to the minds of a good many of us—I mean the name of Sir Frederick Roberts. It is the desire of the Government that the great services of Sir F. Roberts should be utilised in the best way and in a manner which will result in the greatest advantage to the Public Service, and I am quite certain, speaking as I do at a great distance from Sir F. Roberts, that if he were here to-night he would cordially share that opinion. He has never been desirous of pushing any claim. He has always been desirous of trying to serve his country in that post in which he finds himself, and after very careful consideration of the whole position of affairs the Government has come to the conclusion that in the excellent work which Sir Frederick Roberts has done, and is doing in India he ought not to be disturbed or interrupted. We have, therefore, with his consent, decided that he is to remain in India for the next two years. The successor, therefore, of Lord Wolseley will be Sir Redvers Buller. I think that in choosing him for this important post we are choosing a man who, as far as we can judge, will deserve and obtain the confidence of the Army. Personally, I deeply regret to remove him from the post which he has filled with so much advantage to the Public Service. The position of Quartermaster General is one of great importance. Not only must the man there be one of great ability and of first-rate industry, but we know that at certain critical times it is a post on which the very efficiency of the Army largely depends. That leads me to make one further remark. My experience is that in certain critical times the War Office has been nearly denuded of officers, who are appointed to the field. I am the last person to deny to them the opportunity of gratifying their legitimate ambition of going to the front when they can. If we denied it to them I am sure we would have difficulty in filling the posts, but it is not right that both the principal Staff Officers of the Commander-in-Chief should leave the country and go to the front. I think it is necessary to lay down the complete understanding that, so far as we are concerned, it will not be possible for both these officers to go to the front. Perhaps the Committee will forgive me if I say one word personally of myself. These questions of Army administration are—I am sure the Committee will admit it, though I think they hardly know the fact to the full extent to which I myself can speak of it—of the utmost difficulty and complexity. I think I may say that I have had more than my fair share of them. Over and over again I have had the forbearance and the consideration of the House of Commons when I have had to make known to it the views of the Government with regard to these important questions; and, without that regard and consideration, no Secretary of State would wish to administer, or could satisfactorily administer, the important Department of the War Office.

*(11.25.) SIR W. BARTELOT (Sussex, N.W.): I had hoped that the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale or some occupant of the Front Opposition Bench would have risen to debate the extremely important question which has been raised by my right hon. Friend, who has so well acquitted himself in a very difficult position indeed. He has not stated quite as much as I could have wished, and I hope on some future occasion to hear more with regard to the Commander-in-Chief. He commenced his speech this evening with a very important statement indeed with regard to the Naval and Military Council which it is proposed to create. Now, I should like to draw the attention of the Committee to paragraphs 7, 8, 9, and 10 of the Report, because I think it is virtually important we should have them before us. The first point which strikes me in the consideration of the organisation of the two great Departments is that while in action they must be, to a large extent, dependent on each other, and while in preparation for war they are absolutely dependent on each other, yet little or no attempt has ever been made to establish regular intercommunication or relations between them or to secure that the establishment of one Service shall be determined with reference to the requirements of the other. Now, in time of war it would be the duty of the Army to defend our distant possessions, such as India and the Colonies, and no perfect military organisation would enable the Army to do that effectually unless backed up by the Navy, which would be called upon to transport the troops. On the other hand, while the efficiency and power of the Navy is perhaps less absolutely dependent on the Army, yet the latter is necessary to give security to our military ports at home and abroad. Now, my right hon. Friend has said nothing about the preparations for action by the Army and Navy in the case of certain contingencies arising.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I spoke distinctly of joint Military and Naval Forces.

*SIR W. BARTELOT: I wish to know whether schemes are already prepared to be put in operation in certain cases of eventualities—such as an attack on Constantinople, or India, or the Colonies? My right hon. Friend has, indeed, said that there is to be a Committee of the Cabinet; but unless experienced Military and Naval Officers outside the Cabinet are taken into the Committee, or into direct consultation with the Committee, its schemes for the defence of the Empire will not be satisfactory. I look on the gravity of this question as exceedingly great. I think the Naval and Military Members of this House may congratulate themselves on having brought this question prominently forward. They did me the honour two years ago to ask me to propose the Motion which resulted in the formation of a Committee of the Cabinet, and that Committee has increased greatly the strength of the Navy and arranged for the defence of our Colonies. This was followed by the appointment of the Royal Commission, presided over by the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale, whose Report constitutes a valuable contribution in the interests of the country. I know the difficulty of coming to a conclusion on this point suddenly; but I understand my right hon. Friend has agreed that a Council shall be appointed at the War Office to assist him in carrying out all these great objects which come under his consideration. It is very well to have a Council, but we should like to know how that Council is to be constituted, and how it is going to act in regard to the Commander-in-Chief, for that is a very important thing. The Commission, presided over by the noble Lord, has suggested that there should be a Chief of the Staff. I infinitely prefer a Commander-in-Chief or a General Commanding-in-Chief. Such an officer ought not to be subservient to the Government that appoints him. What the Army want is an independent man, so independent that he will not be subservient to any particular Party. The Army feel that if the Commander-in-Chief or the Chief of the Staff is independent of the Secretary of State for War, so far as constitutionally he can be independent, their services will meet with that fair consideration which they deserve. Soldiers will feel aggrieved if the question of promotion is intrusted entirely to an Adjutant General, or any man who is not in the highest military position. These things have been pressed upon us strongly, but I will not, until we have had time to consider the statement of my right hon. Friend, go into details. The Secretary for War has been silent about the subject of ordnance. If there is one subject which deserves consideration more than another, if there is one subject in respect of which we have allowed foreign nations to get in front of us, it is the subject of ordnance. In old days we refused to begin making breechloading guns and allowed other nations to outstrip us, and now we are paying the penalty, and have not, even now, anything like the quantity of guns we require. The same may be said with regard to shot and shell; and some of our guns are so nearly the same size of bore that shot has been sent by mistake for one class of gun which was intended for another. Difficulties of the kind have, in fact, occurred very recently. Then, are we certain that we have yet got the best rifle? It would be wise to re-organise thoroughly the Ordnance Department, and the expediency of doing so ought to be gravely considered by the Cabinet, but especially by the Secretary of State for War and the First Lord of the Admiralty.

(11.35.) COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire, S.W., Ince): I believe the arguments against putting the Army and Navy administration under a Ministry of Defence or a single Department are perfectly sound. I think the financing of each Service requires the full attention of a Cabinet Minister. As to the constitution of a Council under the Presidency of the Prime Minister I am glad to hear that my right hon. Friend proposes that course, and I certainly agree with the view that it is most undesirable that there should be a member of that Council who is not under a sense of responsibility. I think the club utterances of men competent to form an opinion, but who are imperfectly informed of facts and have no sense of responsibility is one of the great difficulties of the present day. With regard to the protection of our military ports, I agree with the view held in the Navy that the military should be responsible. They should—assisted by torpedoes and by floating batteries, which might be fashioned out of old line-of-battle ships, and strengthened for the purpose, our fleet proper being kept free to act abroad. The internal administration of the War Office is a matter of far-reaching importance. It is not a mere question of the best arrangement for the organisation of a Government Department; it involves the entire relation of the military to the civil power in this country. The object of the country in establishing and maintaining the present quasi-dual system has been that the military power should never be the rival of the civil power, and that the Army should be kept free of politics. And whatever shortcomings may be urged against our military system, it must be admitted that this object has hitherto been successfully achieved. We have no Boulangism as in France, we have no meddling in political demonstrations by military students, we have no “pronunciamientos,” as in Spain. Our military system has also been successful in maintaining a uniform system of discipline; and I fear that if there is not a general commanding-in-chief, a military head to the Army to enforce that advantage, the system of discipline will soon be found to vary under every command. I hold, therefore, that the office of general commanding-in-chief should be retained. Officers at the head of Departments at the Horse Guards are too much absorbed in matters of routine to give sufficient attention to, and to keep up with, military progress and invention abroad, and a military officer as chief of the Staff is also most necessary. Mechanical invention has made wonderful progress in recent years, and woe to that country that does not keep abreast of that progress. Mechanical invention as applied to war had little existence through the campaigns of Frederick the Great and the First Napoleon, it had some effect on the

Colonel Blundell

Crimean War, and in the years since has made rapid progress. For instance, in 1866, the Austro-Hungarian Army entered on a campaign with muzzle loaders against breech loaders, with a result that might have led to the collapse of the Empire, and no generalship or courage could avert it. A complete change in armament was necessary, and even a change of uniform. In 1870 the Prussian Guard attacked at St. Privat in a formation for infantry, which had been condemned by Von Moltke in 1865, and lost in a very short time nearly 8,000 men, almost as many men as the British used at Inkerman. It is most necessary, therefore, that there should be a Department which is not entirely absorbed by routine and personal questions, but which will have time and opportunity to study these matters. I am very glad to hear from the Secretary of State that it is proposed to have a Board of Promotion, for this is a question of much importance to the efficiency and welfare of the Army with the reduced list of Generals. It will, I think, be found desirable, also, to re-organise the Ordnance Department with a view to the complete and efficient arming of both the Army and the Navy; but I believe that if the office of general commanding-in-chief is abolished, and the Secretary of State made the head of the Army, the Army will not be kept free of politics, while the only excuse for a civilian being War Minister will cease. This is a grave question, which should be very carefully considered by those who propose to abolish the office. I am very glad to see it is proposed to increase the position, the consultative position, of the First Naval Lord of the Admiralty. In the next naval war we may have the misfortune to be engaged in, it will be found that squadrons on the Baltic, Mediterranean, and Channel, and even the American stations, will be within supporting distance of each other, and may have to act in combined operations, they will be in telegraphic communication through the Admiralty, and practically the First Naval Lord will control movements over this vast area.

(11.50.) ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke): I beg to move that you do now report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Admiral Mayne.)

*MR. E. STANHOPE: As there are evidently several Members who desire to speak on this important question the Government will offer no opposition to that Motion.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): When will the consideration of the Vote be resumed?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am afraid I cannot answer that with certainty. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will repeat the question to the leader of the House, who will be here in a moment.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): The right hon. Gentleman says there are obviously many Members who desire to speak, and this is such an unusual reason that it should be noticed. I am glad to find the right hon. Gentleman say on that account he will offer no opposition to the Motion to report Progress. I only wish the Government would occasionally extend the same consideration to Motions of the same kind from this side of the House.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: When there is any genuine desire for Debate the Government are always ready to meet it. When such Motions are made for obstructive purposes, they feel it their duty to oppose them.

MR. CONYBEARE: I challenge the right hon. Gentleman to give an instance of such obstruction on this side. [Cries of "Order!"]

*DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): Suppose the Debate upon Vote 10 should conclude to-morrow evening, will the right hon. Gentleman then go on with Vote 2?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: After this Vote it is proposed that my noble Friend (Lord G. Hamilton) shall submit the Naval Vote, which has relation to the same subject, and which it is desirable to take next. After that we shall proceed with Vote 2 in the Army Votes.

*DR. FARQUHARSON: I trust the right hon. Gentleman will give notice of the intention and allow adequate time for a discussion upon that Vote, in which much interest is felt.
VOL. CCCXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am quite ready to say it will not be taken without reasonable notice.

*SIR JOHN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I would ask the Secretary for War whether he means that the determination of the Government with regard to the formation of the Council of Defence is that it shall consist of a Committee of the Cabinet composed of the Prime Minister, the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Secretary of State for War, the Secretary of State for India, and the Secretary of State for the Colonies?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I think my hon. Friend will see it would be exceedingly inconvenient to attempt to answer that question on a Motion to report Progress. If the hon. Gentleman will raise that question in Debate I will endeavour to answer him fully.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): This is a question of first-class magnitude, but it is unfortunately distributed over two different Votes. If it is also to be discussed at the fag-end of different sittings and at uncertain intervals that will be in no way satisfactory. I therefore ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, when again before the Committee, the Vote will be taken at such an hour as to enable the Committee to have something like an exhaustive discussion on the whole matter?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The Government are exceedingly anxious that ample opportunity should be afforded for the discussion of this important question. We had hoped that sufficient time would have been obtained to-night; but, as the hon. Gentleman is aware, we are not responsible for the interruption which has prevented the full discussion of the Vote. The Vote will be put down for to-morrow in the hope that it may be reached at a reasonable hour. If it is not reached at a reasonable hour, other Votes will be proceeded with.

It being Midnight the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Resolution to be reported to-morrow.

Committee also report Progress ; to sit again to-morrow.

ALLOTMENTS ACT (1887) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 151.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE PAYMASTER GENERAL (The Earl of JERSEY): My Lords, this is a measure to render the Allotments Act of 1887 more efficacious. It will be unnecessary for me to recount to your Lordships the provisions of the Act of 1887 or to dwell upon the advantages of allotments. I think it is generally accepted now as an axiom that, for the labouring rural population, good allotments, at fair rents, within a reasonable distance, are necessary for every village. In this House there are many of your Lordships who have led the way in the matter of allotments long before there was any question of Acts of Parliament in the matter. By the 2nd clause of the Act of 1887 the duty was thrown upon the Sanitary Authority of acquiring land for allotments on certain conditions; but in that Act there was no appeal against the decision of the Sanitary Authority; and if the Sanitary Authority decided to reject an application on the part of the labourers for allotments, there the matter ended. This measure is to make good that omission. Within recent years no doubt the desire for allotments has very widely spread, and there has been fortunately a corresponding readiness on the part of landowners and others to meet that wish; but all rules have exceptions, and there have been some Sanitary Authorities who have acted in a dilatory and unsatisfactory manner. In a county adjoining the one in which I live, there was a case which called forth a great deal of attention during the winter—the case of Twyford. In that village the labourers made a very reasonable request for allotments, but their request was treated in a very off-hand manner by the Sanitary Authority in the first place, and afterwards by the owner of the land, the Rector of Lincoln College, Oxford. Through the inaction of the one and the action of the other, those labourers have been entirely left out in the cold, and a sense of injustice has arisen which has spread far beyond the limits of that village. It is not possible for any Act of Parliament to remove every grievance or to make everybody wise and prudent; but it is possible for Parliament to lay down general principles for the protection and guidance of people; and if any admitted evil is found out, to remedy it as soon as possible. The present Bill will enable any six qualified persons to appeal to the County Council in cases where the Sanitary Authority has refused to put into force the provisions of the Act of 1887. The County Council are by the provisions of this Bill to appoint annually a Committee, not exceeding one-fourth of the whole number of the Council as an Allotment Committee, to deal with these appeals, and, in order to prevent delay every appeal will be, as a matter of course and without any Order of the Council, referred to the Standing Committee. It is also provided that the elected representative of any village which may happen to appeal to the County Council will be added for that occasion to the Standing Committee. If that Committee is satisfied of the bona fides of the appeal, they will cause a local inquiry to be made. They can make that local inquiry either through one or more of their members, or by any officer they may appoint for that purpose. After that local inquiry has been made the Report will then be referred to the County Council, and the Council, on being satisfied that the land for allotments should be acquired, will have to pass a resolution to that effect, and thereupon all the powers and the duties of the Sanitary Authority will, ipso facto, be transferred to the County Council. The Bill contains provisions necessary to enable the County Council to carry out the duties of the Sanitary Authority to borrow money and to repay it, and to make Provisional Orders for the compulsory purchase of land, but every Provisional Order will have to be submitted to Parliament. In any case where the County Council has acquired land under this Act, it can afterwards, if it is so minded, re-transfer their powers back to the Sanitary Authority. The Bill also provides, by the 5th clause, that schoolrooms may be used for meetings to be held under this or the principal Act. The Bill thus gives an appeal in cases, where the Sanitary Authority neglects its duty, to a popularly elected body, and will enable the County Council to put the provisions of the Act of 1887 into force without delay. I certainly hope these provisions will not often require to be put into force, because I believe that voluntary arrangements are more rapid and less expensive than any others; but I am quite sure that if these powers are given to the County Council, they will use them with due consideration. Public opinion on this subject has ripened considerably during the last few years. Those who live in the country know how greatly allotments are prized by the labourers.

The Earl of Jersey

We know the energy and skill they bring to their work, while we also know that the labourers only ask for fair terms. In such circumstances the landowners may well desire to meet the labourers' natural wishes. This measure, without claiming to be a great one, is brought forward by the Government with the intention of securing for all our agricultural population the advantages held out by the Act of 1887; and I feel confident that this House, comprising as it does many great landowners, will be only too ready to help forward this object. The lives of our agricultural labourers are not very much relieved by the excitement which is so attractive to dwellers in towns; but if, in substitution for those exciting pleasures, Parliament can create a sense of justice and contentment, their lot will be none the less happy, and their attachment to the soil, so important for many reasons, will gain fresh strength, and it will spring from sources injurious to none whilst beneficial and gratifying to themselves. I beg to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl of Jersey.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I should be sorry that this Bill should pass without further remark, because, although it is a Bill which is very small indeed in itself, it relates to a subject of very considerable interest. I have not, as I need hardly say, the slightest objection to the Bill, which I think provides for what is much wanted. The only small criticism I shall make upon it is that I do not quite see why it is necessary by a Statute to compel the County Councils to appoint a Committee of certain particular members. I think that might have been left to the County Councils. However, that is a very minute and unimportant point. What I wish to remark upon is, that the noble Earl who moved the Bill spoke of it as securing to the labourer all the benefit of the Allotments Acts. I am afraid that is taking far too high a view of such a Bill as this. It will do something, no doubt, to remedy the difficulties; but the difficulties are far larger and wider than any which this Bill deals with at all. The point of difficulty, of course, is the compulsory taking of land. I am far from desiring that the Sanitary Authorities should have to act at all in the matter; I think it is far more desirable that landowners should themselves supply the allotments and save the Sanitary Authorities from the necessity of interfering. One of my reasons for wishing that is—and I do not think that those who may not be very well acquainted with agricultural affairs give nearly enough consideration to that question—that a landlord, if disposed to let his land for this purpose, can do so considerably cheaper than it is possible for the Sanitary Authorities to carry out the matter. If you are to have Statutes, in whatever way you frame them, there must be expenses connected with their enforcement. All those expenses have to be defrayed out of the land, and, small as they may seem to be, I have known several cases where the expenses incurred by the Sanitary Authority, and not at all improperly incurred by them, have been such, when charged upon the land, as to make it impossible, in the opinion of the labourers, for them to hire it at the rent asked. These are very poor persons, and what may seem to us to be very small sums are really to them very considerable sums indeed. There is also this difficulty: That you are obliged under the present law—as I am told by those who put the Act into operation—to levy the whole of the expenses incurred upon the rent to be paid during the first year. These rents have, by the Acts, to be paid only from year to year, and the whole of the expenses incurred—and there are, I believe, some red-tape expenses which are perfectly unnecessary, in reference to maps and so on, imposed by the Local Government Board—have to be put on the rent of the first year. It is very obvious that a labourer may, in that event, find the rent considerably more than he is willing to pay. My opinion is, that the law should be altered in that respect, and that the Local Authority should have power to extend the expenses over several years, because it is not reasonable to suppose that one man should pay in one year the whole of the expenses connected with the allotment of the land. With regard to the compulsory powers, I think the machinery is too extensive. First, you have to go through the process of applying to the County Council; then the County Council passes a Provisional Order; then that Provisional Order goes to the Local Government Board; and then it has to come before Parliament. And all this may be with regard to three or four acres of land, which is let, perhaps, at 30s. an acre. I cannot help thinking that if we really intend to place these allotments within reach of a large number of labourers, we must give the County Council, in cases where the amount of land to be taken is not large, a final power of disposing of the whole matter. If you did that the expense would be small, the thing would be speedily disposed of, and I believe the labourers would be enabled to get their allotments. It seems to me that the compulsory power is not too large to be reposed in the County Council, but, of course, I would not allow them to dispose of the matter if the value of the land exceeded a certain sum to be fixed by Parliament. If it did, then it should go through another process. What I think is that if you intend really to place within the power of the labourers the boon which Parliament desires them to have, you must provide a cheap and easy mode of getting the land. The matter may seem to some of us not of great importance; but my point is that in many parts of the country it is of great importance to the agricultural labourers, who take great interest in the subject. Their position in some of the agricultural counties is not very happy, and their lot is not a bright one; their wages are very low, and there is not much chance for them to rise out of the position in which they find themselves; and I am glad to see that they are willing to take, and have taken, advantage of the Allotments Act. I am certain that it is to the interest not merely of the labourers themselves but of all landowners, because I believe that anything which attaches the labourer more to the place in which he lives and makes him willing to remain there is beneficial, and that you thereby strengthen altogether the whole framework of society in that part of the country. For those reasons, while I quite welcome this Bill as doing something that was needed, I sincerely trust that ere long Parliament will find time and a way of dealing more extensively with this subject and giving larger facilities than exist at present for acquiring allotments.

EARL BEAUCHAMP: I only rise to appeal to Her Majesty's Government whether it would not be better to let us deal with this Bill in Committee of the whole House, than that it should be sent to one of the Standing Committees. It is not a question of drafting or of any mere technicalities, but an important question affecting the agricultural interest; and I do therefore sincerely trust that the matter will come for discussion before a Committee of the whole House rather than be referred to a Standing Committee.

*THE EARL OF JERSEY: I may say that it was my intention to refer it to a Committee of the whole House.

On Question, agreed to.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

HELIGOLAND.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

EARL DE LA WARR, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government whether it is proposed in the arrangement for the cession of Heligoland to Germany to make the inhabitants in all respects subject to German laws; and whether the contemplated exemption from military conscription will apply only to persons now living, said: I should not have troubled your Lordships on this occasion had it not been for the very, I must say, vague and indefinite information which has been given by Her Majesty's Government relative to the proposed cession of Heligoland to Germany. I do not wish to enter upon the subject of the limits of secrecy claimed by the Foreign Office with regard to negotiations on Foreign Affairs—it is, no doubt, a very difficult one—but when the noble Marquess at the head of Foreign Affairs recently stated in this House that

“It is a rule that has always been observed at the Foreign Office that discussions should not take place until negotiations of this kind are concluded,”

I can hardly suppose that he intended to include in this the giving of such information as it might be convenient to give, as well as the liberty of discussion. That may be another question, but there may be information which could be given perhaps without injury to the Public Service. I am asking only for information. It must be remembered that in the matter now under consideration—I mean the cession of Heligoland to Germany—it is a question of transferring to another European Power a dependency of this country, the population of which for a length of time has enjoyed the rights and privileges of British subjects. Now, it is hardly possible to suppose that in the cession of a country in which British subjects are living, especially when that cession is made to a country like Germany, whose principles of Government differ so materially from those of this country, the population can retain these or similar rights and privileges. Yet I see it was recently stated, as reported, by the First Lord of the Treasury in another place—

The Earl of Kimberley

“That the utmost care had been taken in the Agreement with Germany to secure for the inhabitants the continuance of the privileges they had hitherto enjoyed.”

If this be so, my objections to the cession of Heligoland would be materially lessened. But, on the other hand, as I understand from the recent Despatch of the noble Marquess, Her Majesty's Government propose to stipulate that persons only now living should be free from naval and military conscription, and, consequently, that future generations should be subject to that oppressive law. I can hardly reconcile these conflicting statements, or conceive how it can be said that the continuance of the privileges which they have hitherto enjoyed has been secured for the inhabitants, if the immunities of those who are now British subjects are not to be continued to their children and those that come after them. Unless very clear and definite terms are imposed, it cannot, I think, be doubted that if Heligoland is annexed to Germany, without definite stipulations as to the rights and privileges as British subjects which are to be secured to the inhabitants, burdens will be imposed upon them which to them have been hitherto unknown; and you will be giving over a free and contented population who have hitherto enjoyed the rights of British subjects to become subjects of a country burdened with taxation and oppressed by naval and military conscription.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): In answer to a letter which my noble Friend addressed to me I informed him that we had laid the Agreement, which was signed on Tuesday night, on the Table of your Lordships' House. I ventured to submit that I thought perhaps it would be better to defer all questions as to the nature of the Agreement until the Instrument is in the hands of the House. I still think that, on the whole, that would be the more convenient arrangement. I will only say, with regard to what has fallen from my noble Friend, that if Heligoland becomes German soil those who inhabit it will be subject to German laws, but that we have made a special exception in favour of all persons now living, that they shall not be subject to that which British subjects are not subject to, namely, conscription for the Military and Naval Services. I will take this opportunity of saying that I shall ask the House to-night to read the Bill for the cession of Heligoland a first time, and on Thursday next I shall move the Second Reading of the Bill.

NEW WRIT.

For Durham County (Mid Division) v. William Crawford, esquire, deceased.

QUESTIONS.

INDIA—EXPORTATION OF BEER FOR THE ARMY.

MR. CORNWALLIS WEST (Denbigh, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what steps are taken to ensure the beer exported to India for the use of the troops being of good quality; whether he is aware that complaints are general in that country as to its acidity and intoxicating power; and whether a lighter beer could be supplied?

SIR J. KINLOCH (Perth, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Government of India contract for a certain amount of beer to be exported to India each month, which the troops are obliged to consume before beer purchased locally can be supplied; and whether, inasmuch as the beer purchased locally is good, sound, light beer of a non-intoxicating quality, he will take steps to alter the present system of contracting?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): My right hon. Friend the Secretary for War has asked me to reply to the question of the hon. Member for Denbigh (Mr. Cornwallis West), and I will reply at the same time to the question of the hon. Member for Perth (Sir J. Kinloch). Beer cannot be advantageously supplied locally at all stations in India, and it is, therefore, exported from this country for these stations. It is brewed according to specification, and under the supervision of Government officers. Complaints are not frequent or general, but acidity may occasionally arise from the effects of storage in India. The exported beer is lighter than the local beer, and is as light as would be safe for shipment in casks.

BRIDGE OF EARN LEVEL CROSSING.

SIR J. KINLOCH: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can say under what conditions the level crossing near the bridge of Earn, on the public road to Forgandenny is now worked; and if it is the case that this crossing was condemned as dangerous by Major Marindin, and that the North British Railway Company promised to erect a bridge?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The railway upon which this level crossing exists was authorised in 1846, and the Act gives no power to the Board of Trade to order the abolition of the level crossing. In June of last year the District Road Trustees represented to the Board of Trade the need of a bridge and a deviation of the road. Major Marindin, after inquiry, reported that the road should be extended as proposed, and a footbridge be put up at the existing level crossing, or that an over-bridge be constructed in lieu of the level crossing—to which he saw no objection from an engineering point of view. He thought the latter the best alternative' and suggested that the Trustees should subscribe one-fifth of the cost. The Directors have expressed their willingness to carry out the latter recommendation on the terms suggested.

TREATMENT OF SCHOOL CHILDREN.

MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he has received from Mr. William Curtis, of New Somerby, Grantham, Lincolnshire, a complaint to the following effect: that Miss Earl, the mistress of St. Anne's Denominational School, severely caned his daughter Mabel Curtis, a scholar in the Fourth Standard, aged 10 years, so as to leave the child's hand in a bruised and swollen state, because she failed to do certain sums; that the child, in consequence of the beating, returned home, and was denied re-admittance without an apology from the father, who was then summoned before the School Attendance Committee of the Town Council for the non-attendance of his daughter at school; that the School Attendance Committee ordered Mr. Curtis to send his daughter to school; that she presented herself at the school again and again, with her school fees in hand, and was refused and is still refused admission; and whether he will take any action in the matter?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I have received the complaint in question, and the managers have been requested to re-admit the child unconditionally, or the grant may be seriously imperilled.

34 EDWARD III.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will procure from the Rolls Office, and lay upon the Table of the House, a Copy of the Statute 34 Edward III., cap. 1, as it appears upon the original Great Statute Roll?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have obtained from the Rolls House a copy examined with the original Statute Roll and duly certified, which I shall be happy to lay on the Table of the House.

TAX ON ENGLISH NEWSPAPERS TO AUSTRIA.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that there is a tax, in addition to the postage, on all English newspapers arriving in Austria, for instance, at Carlsbad and Merlan; whether such a tax is in contravention of the Postal Union Regulations; and whether he will make representations to have this tax removed, on the ground that no such tax is imposed on Austrian papers arriving in England?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): I explained this matter to the House in reply to a question asked by the hon. Member on June 7, 1888. The financial impost levied by the Austrian Government on foreign newspapers entering the Empire is not a postal charge, and is not levied under Postal Union Regulations, which, as I pointed out in 1888, do not affect the general taxation of the countries belonging to the Union.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT.

MR. BARCLAY (Forfarshire): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture when the Report of the Agricultural Department under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act for 1889, will be issued?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): A complete revise of the Report has been received from the printers. It will be in the Press in a few days, and I expect it to be issued very shortly.

ADMIRALTY WRITERS.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if writers in the Admiralty serving in the Volunteer Force who went out with their regiments on the Saturday before Easter had the day deducted from their annual leave of 12 days, while in the War Office, Stationery Office, Customs, &c., it was not so reckoned, in consideration of the public nature of its employment; and whether the same indulgence can be extended to the Admiralty?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): According to the regulations governing the employment of copyists in all the Public Departments, no leave beyond the 12 days allowed annually can be granted to these clerks without deduction of pay, except when the Department is wholly closed, as on public holidays. The War Office was closed on the Saturday before Easter, and consequently the writers in this Department, whether volunteers or not, obtained a holiday on that day in common with the rest of the staff. I am aware of no instance of a departure from the general rule I have described, and I have no power to modify it even in favour of an object of which I fully approve.

ALLEGED DEATH FROM STARVATION.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board as to the death by starvation of Elizabeth Barret, and the verdict before Coroner Baxter, at the Vestry Hall, Mile End, E., a week ago, if his attention has been called to the circumstance; and if will advise the relaxation of the rule as to outdoor relief?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I am at present engaged in making inquiry.

SCIENCE AND ART DEPARTMENT, SOUTH KENSINGTON.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Council whether certain of the writers, who have seen considerable service, recently employed in the Science and Art Department, South Kensington, have been dismissed; whether there are still employed in that Department a certain number of men who are obtained through the agency of Messrs. Waterlow, to whom the Government pay 1s. per hour, out of which the men receive but 9d. per hour; and if he can explain why persons employed under the sweating system are retained in the Public Service in preference to those of prolonged official experience and tried capacity?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: Seven copyists engaged in April last were discharged from the Stores Division on June 27, when the special work for which they were taken on was finished; two others were dispensed with from the Science Division on June 16 and 18, but these found immediate employment from Civil Service Commission. Ten clerks from Messrs. Waterlow are at present employed by the Department in the Art Division, but these will be discharged about July 20. As they have become acquainted with the special work on which they were employed, it would have been inexpedient to have replaced them by those copyists discharged from the Stores on June 27. Messrs. Waterlow's men are employed solely because the Civil Service Commissioners were unable to furnish sufficient copyists, to meet the needs of the Department during the pressure of work connected with the annual examination. Messrs. Waterlow's clerks are dispensed with immediately the Civil Service Commissioners notify that registered copyists are available. The Department paid Messrs. Waterlow at the regular rate for law stationers' clerks, and has no control whatever over the amount which the clerks receive from Messrs. Waterlow.

UNESTABLISHED AND AUXILIARY POSTMEN.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Postmaster General why the details as to the number, wages, &c., of unestablished and auxiliary postmen in the country, given in the Estimates, are not also given as to those employed in London; and whether such information could be supplied in future? I also wish to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman can give particulars of the number, payment, hours of labour, and length of service of the unestablished and auxiliary postal employés in London?

*MR. RAIKES: The information with regard to wages is given at page 68 of the Estimates for 1890-91. The numbers cannot be stated in advance on account of the fluctuations necessary to meet the requirements of the Service. I shall be happy to add the information asked for by the hon. Member with respect to the men employed at present to the Return which is now being prepared for Parliament, relative to the terms of employment for postmen in London and certain other large towns.

Sir W. Hart Dyke

ARMENIA.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has any information which corroborates the report in the Daily News of 3rd July, that Russian troops are moving towards the Armenian frontier to make a demonstration to compel the payment of the war indemnity; whether his attention has been called to various expressions of opinion (reported in the Daily News of the 3rd instant), in newspapers and otherwise, of a strong desire by the Russians to intervene in Armenia, in order to expel the Kurds, and put an end to their oppression of the Armenians; and whether Her Majesty's Government will bring pressure to bear on the Porte to introduce radical reforms into Armenia, if it be not too late?

*THE UNDERSECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): We have received no corroboration of the statements in the first two paragraphs. With regard to the third, Her Majesty's Ambassador has lost no opportunity of counselling the Ministers of the Sultan to take effective measures for the security of life and property in Asiatic Turkey; and it cannot be denied that the Porte has shown a desire to do so by the appointment of Governors of high character, who are exerting themselves to check disorders and to punish the unruly.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): As the Sultan is usually in the habit of disregarding the friendly advice of Her Majesty's Government, will the Government in this case stick to their guns or run away from them?

[No answer was given.]

SENTENCE AT THE CLERKENWELL SESSIONS.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department with reference to the case of a man named Jones, who was sentenced by Mr. Warry, Q.C., at the Clerkenwell Sessions, to 10 years' penal servitude, how many years' imprisonment he has undergone under previous convictions, and what was the amount of money or the value of the articles the stealing of which led to such convictions in each case?

MR. MATTHEWS: Since 1869 this man has served two sentences of eight years' penal servitude, and two sentences of imprisonment of six months' and 18 months' respectively. The sentences of penal servitude were for stealing a purse and certain moneys (the actual amount is not specified in the calendar), and for stealing a watch of the value of £4. The other sentences were for stealing watches, one of them being of the value of £2. I may add that previous to 1869 this man had been six times convicted as a rogue and vagabond, and once as an incorrigible rogue.

MR. BRUNNER: Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire whether this man is slowly becoming more and more fit to take his place among honest and industrious people?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am hardly aware of the source to which I could apply.

MR. BRUNNER: I would suggest the chaplain.

THE ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT.

MR. ERNEST BECKETT (York, N.R., Whitby): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in accordance with the declaration made by Lord Salisbury on the 22nd May, that—"It was very undesirable to come to any agreement which we had not ascertained was acceptable to those whose interests were principally concerned, the trading companies, the missions, and others who have done such great work in this matter," the Government have taken any steps to ascertain the feeling of those "whose interests are principally concerned" as to the proposed agreement with Germany; whether remonstrances have been received from companies who have made treaties and acquired rights, with the object of effectively opening out and occupying territories now proposed to be surrendered to Germany; whether one of these companies has represented that the cession of territory to Germany north of Ngamiland would deal a serious blow to the interests of British trade in that part of Africa; and whether the Government are prepared to stand by Lord Salisbury's declaration, and so to modify the details of the Anglo-German Agreement as to make it "acceptable to those whose interests are principally concerned," provided that the persons referred to make it clear that it is not acceptable to them in its present shape?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government have consulted the principal companies and missions who have done a great work in this matter, and believe them to approve generally of the Anglo-German Agreement. It is impossible for Her Majesty's Government to support pretensions which are inordinate and incompatible with the fair claims of other nations, but they are not aware that any such pretensions have been advanced by the companies or missions I have already described.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government have received any communication from the Government or Representatives of the Cape Colony to the effect that they object to that part of the proposed Anglo-German Agreement which relates to the delimitation of the German sphere of influence in Damaraland and Makolololand, on the ground that it will, if adopted, seriously interfere with British trade to the interior?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The Cape Government have made no representation to Her Majesty's Government of the kind referred to.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in taking over Damaraland, Germany promised to respect all rights or concessions obtained before the declaration of the German Protectorate; and whether, in accordance with this promise, the concession of mineral rights made by Kamaherero to Mr. Robert Lewis has been and will be respected?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The German Government are prepared to recognise legally acquired concessions in Damaraland; but in the case of Mr. Lewis the validity of his principal concession is disputed by them, and the matter is still under consideration.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he will lay upon the Table of the House a copy of the Agreement signed at Berlin without waiting for other Papers?

SIR J. FERGUSSON : I think I may undertake to say that the Agreement will be laid on the Table at once.

THE PENNY POSTAGE JUBILEE.

MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the day's holiday to postmen to commemorate the Jubilee (of Penny Postage) has or has not been given to the Auxiliary Postmen in the North Western District of the Metropolis ; and, if not, whether it will be given to them ; and whether it is a fact that Auxiliary Postmen, many of whom have served for 20 years and upwards, have no recognised holiday ; and, if so, whether he will consider the question of giving to Auxiliary Postmen a short holiday annually ?

MR. RAIKES : In commemoration of the Jubilee of Penny Postage a holiday will be given to the Auxiliary Postmen. It is a fact that at present the Auxiliary Postmen have no recognised holiday ; but the question whether they should not have one is now under consideration.

THE LONDON POLYTECHNICS.

MR. ARTHUR ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham) : I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether it is true that the progress of the central scheme for the London Polytechnics has been delayed by the objections of two vestries or vestry clerks in the course of the last few days ; what are the names of the parties objecting, and their grounds of objection ; and whether their objections have imperilled the passing, during this Session, of this scheme, which has now been so long under consideration, and has received such cordial approval in this House ?

SIR W. HART DYKE : No fewer than 12 Petitions have been presented, praying that the scheme in question may be laid before Parliament. The ground of objection in almost every case is that due regard has not been paid to small parochial interests, and the action of the objectors has, no doubt, imperilled the passing of the scheme during the present Session.

LOCAL TAXATION BILL.

MR. LENG (Dundee) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, having regard to the numerous Notices of Amendment on proposals which have been withdrawn, he will, for the convenience of the House, reprint the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill, omitting the dropped clauses and inserting the new clauses which the Government intend to submit for consideration ?

MR. RITCHIE : The suggestion of the hon. Member is one which, so far as I can ascertain, is quite without precedent, and in any case the course he proposes would, in my opinion, be a very inconvenient one to adopt. The Government will take care that their Amendments to the Bill are placed on the Paper in sufficient time to enable Members to consider them before the Bill is proceeded with.

OFFICIAL RECEIVERS IN BANKRUPTCY.

MR. W. P. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that Official Receivers in Bankruptcy frequently act as Trustees in cases other than those provided by law when he may or shall so act, and contrary to Sub-section 5, Section 21, of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883, which provides that—and whether he can explain how this custom has arisen without being interfered with by the Board of Trade, and if he will take steps to put an end to the practice ?

“ The Official Receiver shall not, save as in this Act provided, be the Trustee of the bankrupt's property ; ”

SIR M. HICKS BEACH : No, Sir ; there is no practice of the kind suggested. There are a few cases in which, under the provisions of Sub-section 1 of Section 54 of the Bankruptcy Act, Official Receivers have acted as Trustees when no summary order was obtained. Of the cases closed last year, only 14 in the High Court, and 19 in the County Courts were cases in which the assets realised more than £300. In all of them, I believe, the creditors either failed to meet or met and passed a unanimous resolution that no Trustee be appointed, and, so far as I am aware, no complaint has ever been received in the Bankruptcy Department from any creditor in London or the country on this head.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.

CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government recognise any Treaty rights with the French to catch lobsters on the coasts of Newfoundland, or to establish lobster factories on any part of the shores?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The answer is that Her Majesty's Government do not recognise such a right. Their view is stated at length in Lord Salisbury's Note to M. Waddington, of March 28, 1889, page 231 of the Blue Book.

POOR TENANTS IN ST. LUKE'S.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that a large number of poor tenants in the neighbourhood of Golden Lane, St. Luke's, are being turned out of their houses, the landlord having given the tenants notice to quit, but the tenants not being able to get other places by the time of the expiration of the notice, the landlord has commenced taking the roofs off, thus causing great suffering from the storms of the past few days; and whether he has any power to take action to prevent the landlord clearing his property in this manner?

MR. MATTHEWS: My attention has only been drawn to this matter by the question of the hon. Member, and I have not as yet been able to obtain a Report on the subject. I have no power to prevent the landlord from exercising his legal rights; and I have not sufficient information to enable me to judge whether there has been any want of humanity in the manner of enforcing them.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Is it possible to get a Report of the case, as steps are being taken to interview the owner of the property in order to induce him to give these poor people time? I am told that the Magistrates have no power.

MR. MATTHEWS: I have applied to the Commissioner of the Police for information, but have not yet received it.

MR. SEXTON: Is the Home Secretary advised that it is legal to take off the roofs of houses while still occupied, and before the eviction has taken place?

MR. MATTHEWS: I can hardly answer that question, as I understand the terms of the notice to the tenants have expired, so that they have no longer any interest in the premises. I do not allege that myself; I have no knowledge on the subject.

MR. SEXTON: The question is, can this landlord by law be allowed to endanger human life and health by taking off the roofs of houses. Must not the process of law be completed by eviction before the houses can be dismantled?

MR. MATTHEWS: I must ask for notice of that question.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: I will put a question on the Paper for Monday.

FLASHING SIGNALS—ADMIRAL COLOMB'S INVENTION.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is true that the Treasury have consented to grant the sum of £2,000 only to Admiral Colomb, as a reward for his labours in adapting the system of flashing lights as a means of conveying signals in manœuvring Fleets at night; whether he is aware that the Admiralty in 1858 awarded Mr. Redl, an Austrian, £1,500 for his proposed system of cone signals for the Fleet, which failed on trial; and that the Treasury awarded recently £25,000, and £1,000 per annum for 10 years, to an officer for a range-finder; and whether, in view of the services rendered to the Fleet by a system which has been endorsed with the high approval of Admirals Commanding in Chief, viz., H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh, Sir Phipps Hornby, Lord Alcester, Sir Thomas Symonds, and many others, their Lordships will again make representation to the Treasury so as to ensure further recognition of this officer's valuable services to the country?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The question of my hon. and gallant Friend is based on the idea that we are now remunerating Admiral Colomb for his valuable invention of 20 years ago, but that is not the case. The Government of the day then paid the gallant Admiral a sum of £1,000 in recognition of his labours, and the matter was considered closed. The Government did not then purchase any invention or patent rights, neither did they acquire any monopoly of the use of the system of flashing signals. From that time until now the Government have paid, as ordinary users of the invention, a contract price, agreed upon with Admiral Colomb, for the supply of certain patented articles, and the use of these articles is not confined to the British Navy. The Government do not admit any further claim on the part of Admiral Colomb; but, looking to the very great and enduring value of his invention, they are prepared to offer for his acceptance a sum of £2,000, as a further voluntary recognition of his merits. It is true that rewards have been paid of larger amount to other inventors, but it is impossible to weigh at the time one invention against another; and, moreover, the circumstances accompanying the grants in the cases referred to in the question are dissimilar to those in the case of Admiral Colomb. The latter had taken out a patent for his invention, and had virtually the monopoly of supplying the apparatus; while in the former cases the inventors had practically sold their inventions to the Government, and parted with all rights and advantages connected therewith.

DEATH AT BLACKPOOL.

MR. BIGWOOD (Middlesex, Brentford): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to an account in the Blackpool Herald of the 27th ultimo, referring to a verdict touching the death of one Helen Ball; and whether, seeing the police appear to have neglected their duty, he purposes taking any measures with the view of preventing such recurrences in the future?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; I have seen the account of the inquest in the paper referred to, and I have received a Report of all the circumstances from the Coroner, which formed the basis of my answer on this subject on the 27th June. From the facts before me I am not able to gather that the Police Authorities neglected their duty; but if my hon. Friend will inform me in what respect he thinks that they did so I will consider whether any further interference on my part is necessary.

Lord G. Hamilton

WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Senior Member for the University of Oxford (Sir J. Mowbray) what is the value of the estates formerly belonging to the Dean and Chapter of Westminster Abbey, now vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; were those estates subject to any obligation with respect to keeping the Abbey in repair; and whether considerable outlay is now necessary for the preservation of the Abbey; and, if so, what course will be taken by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners as to providing funds for these repairs?

SIR J. MOWBRAY (Oxford University): In 1868 the estates of the Westminster Chapter passed to the Commissioners, subject to various beneficial leases, many of which have not yet expired. An annual income of £20,000 was provided for the Chapter, such income being considerably larger than what they had heretofore enjoyed. An increased provision was made for maintenance of the fabric, and £20,000 was granted for substantial repairs. It was afterwards estimated that a further expenditure of £40,000 was necessary to insure the safety of the Abbey. In 1886 an Act was passed under which the Commissioners advanced £10,000 as a loan, which subsequently became a grant, to the Chapter. In 1888 another Act was passed, which secured to the Chapter the full income of £20,000 originally contemplated, which had been reduced about one-tenth by agricultural depression. Under that Act provision was made that not less than £3,250 per annum was to be devoted to a Fabric Fund, and the Commissioners have advanced on security of the Fabric Fund £10,000 at a low rate of interest, and they will be prepared to make a further advance, if necessary. Under that Act one canonry of the value of £1,000 per annum has been suspended to meet the Fabric Fund. The Commissioners believe that these measures have adequately provided for the preservation of the Abbey.

LOCAL TAXATION (CUSTOMS AND EXCISE) DUTIES BILL.

SIR HENRY HUSSEY VIVIAN (Swansea, District): I beg to ask the

First Lord of the Treasury whether he will allocate such portion of the fund arising from the increased Excise Duties as may be due to Wales to the purposes of Intermediate Education in that country?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I can only refer the hon. Baronet to the numerous answers I have already given to similar questions.

IRELAND—SHADOWING—CASE OF MR. JAMES O'BRIEN.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he has seen from the report in the Cork papers of the trial of Mr. James O'Brien, at Youghal, on the 27th ultimo, that a policeman named Quinn, disguised in plain clothes, gave Mr. O'Brien in charge to another constable, on a charge of obstruction; and Mr. O'Brien was thereupon arrested and taken to the police barracks; and, if the fact be as above stated, will he state under what authority the constables acted; why was not Mr. O'Brien summoned for the alleged offence, instead of being summarily arrested; and have the Constabulary in Ireland power to summarily arrest persons at the request of a constable? The hon. Member had also the following questions on the Paper relating to the same subject: To ask the right hon. Gentleman if he could state what was the nature of the obstruction complained of; and, in view of the fact that the Magistrates inflicted no punishment on Mr. O'Brien, and that he was imprisoned in Cork Gaol for seven days without trial, what compensation will be awarded him? To ask further whether the Attorney General could now state why was Mr. O'Brien summarily arrested by a policeman; what charge was made against him; and why was he not summoned in the ordinary manner?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): I am informed that the circumstances under which James O'Brien was arrested at Youghal were these: He was engaged in wilfully and persistently obstructing a constable while engaged in the proper discharge of his duty, by persistently following the constable about, pointing him out as a policeman in plain clothes, and calling public attention to him, thereby preventing him from discharging the detective duty on which he was employed. Constable Quinn, who was thus obstructed, thereupon called on Constable Blake to arrest O'Brien for such offence, and for conduct calculated to lead to a breach of the peace. The police have power to arrest in order to prevent an apprehended breach of the peace. When taken before a Magistrate, O'Brien is stated to have grossly misconducted himself in Court by abusing the Magistrate and the constable who was being examined as a witness. Having refused to give bail for his good behaviour pending the hearing of the charge, he was committed in custody from June 16 to 20. The charge against him was then heard in Court, and he was convicted. The Magistrates who heard the case were apparently of opinion that the law had been sufficiently vindicated by the imprisonment the man had already undergone while awaiting trial, and that the merits of the case would be met by ordering his further detention in custody until the rising of the Court.

MR. FLYNN: May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that the wilful and persistent obstruction to which he has referred consisted of Mr. O'Brien's merely referring to the fact that the constable who was following him was as well entitled to buy beasts at the fair as he was; and that the constable in his sworn information admitted that this man had neither intimidated nor interfered with him more than that. Also, whether he is aware that two other men who were brought up on the same charge were merely summoned; and, if so, why Mr. O'Brien, who was a well-known shopkeeper in the locality, was not treated in a similar manner?

*MR. MADDEN: I am informed that there were two other men charged with obstructing this constable in the discharge of his duty, but their conduct was not so offensive as Mr. O'Brien's, and, in the opinion of the constable, was not likely to lead to a breach of the peace, and therefore they were summoned and not arrested. With reference to what occurred at the fair I have no details before me, but I assume, from the conclusion to which the Magistrates came, that the evidence brought before them was of a different character to that which has been laid before the hon. Gentleman.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman inform us whether the detective was following Mr. O'Brien, or whether Mr. O'Brien was following the detective?

*MR. MADDEN: The detective was not following Mr. O'Brien. He was at the fair for the purpose of generally preventing boycotting. A question was asked yesterday to that effect, but I am informed that he was not shadowing Mr. O'Brien.

MR. SEXTON: If the detective had a right to follow people at the fair, had not Mr. O'Brien as good a right to follow the detective?

*MR. MADDEN: Yes, Sir; unless he did so in such a way as to obstruct him in the discharge of his duty.

MR. FLYNN: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered a portion of the question. Why was it that this man, O'Brien, who was well-known to the police, was not summoned, as the other two men were, instead of being summarily arrested and taken to gaol?

*MR. MADDEN: I think I have answered that question. I said that this man was arrested because his conduct was such as was likely to lead to a breach of the peace.

MR. FLYNN: Breach of the peace on the part of whom? On the part of Mr. O'Brien or on the part of the constable? Was not a breach of the peace as likely to arise on the part of those persons whom the detective was following as on the part of Mr. O'Brien, who was alleged to be following the detective?

*MR. MADDEN: It is impossible for me to argue this question across the floor of the House. If Mr. O'Brien has been illegally arrested and imprisoned he has his remedy.

MR. W. REDMOND: Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he approves that system of imprisoning men first and trying them afterwards?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That is a matter of opinion.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that when a complaint is made that an officer of the Government, under their immediate direction and control, has been guilty of an excess of power towards a private individual, it is quite enough answer for the Government to say that he has his legal remedy?

*MR. MADDEN: The right hon. Gentleman asked the question in substance whether I laid down the principle that a person aggrieved by the act of an official of the Government who has done wrong ought to be left by the Government to his legal remedy. I laid down no such principle. In the present case the right hon. Gentleman must bear in mind the fact that the Magistrates endorsed the action of the constable in this matter, by ordering the person arrested to find surety to be of good behaviour, and, in default, committing him to prison. Of course, I must assume the action of the Bench and the constable to be right, and therefore I submit that I was justified in giving the answer which I did. I may add, for the information of the right hon. Gentleman and the House, that, so far from the Irish Government acting on the principle which the right hon. Gentleman assumed, only yesterday my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, in answer to a question with relation to the illegal detention of some person in consequence of a mistake made by the Governor of the gaol, stated that he would not leave the person so detained to his legal remedy, but would consider what ought to be done.

ROYAL ASSENT.

While Mr. GLADSTONE was speaking, and before he had completed his last sentence, the doorkeeper advanced to the Bar, and, in a loud voice, announced the arrival of "Black Rod." There were cries of "Order!" from the Opposition Benches below the Gangway, and Mr. W. REDMOND exclaimed, "Bother the House of Lords," followed by "Order, order!" from Mr. SPEAKER.

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners;—

The House went;—and being returned;—

Mr. SPEAKER reported the Royal Assent to,— River Suck Drainage (Provision of Funds) Act, 1890.

Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act Amendment Act, 1890.

Municipal Elections (Scotland) Act, 1890.

Contagious Diseases (Animals) (Pleuro-pneumonia) Act, 1890.

Electric Lighting (Scotland) Act, 1890.

Anglesey Act Repeal Act, 1890.

Kew and Petersham Vicarage Act, 1890.

And a number of Private Bills.

POINT OF ORDER—MESSAGES FROM THE LORDS.

Subsequently:

MR. WADDY said: Mr. Speaker, I appeal to you as guardian of the privileges of this House, and beg to ask whether it is not possible that some arrangement should be made by means of which the messenger of an assembly of co-ordinate jurisdiction with our own should be prevented from a course of action which I venture to call both abrupt and unseemly. The interruption which took place a few minutes ago, and which was made in that abrupt, harsh, and unseemly fashion, might just as well have taken place when any other Member was addressing it as the right hon. Gentleman who then happened to be speaking (Mr. Gladstone). It might have been the Leader of the House. I venture to think that would not have been a seemly thing or respectful to the House, and that some arrangement might easily be made to prevent its recurrence.

*MR. SPEAKER: I may say that the interruption is not altogether without notice, as three taps are given at the door, and the advent of the Black Rod is announced by the doorkeeper of our own House. If any means can be found which will tend to obviate the inconvenience referred to I shall be happy to consider them.

MR. SEXTON: Could not the opening of the door be delayed until a convenient moment?

*MR. SPEAKER: Our business is so continuous that it would be rather difficult to find a suitable opportunity to take that course. If the House wishes, I will communicate with the authorities of the House of Lords, and consider what can be done to avoid inconvenience.

BOYCOTTING IN TIPPERARY.

*SIR JOHN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that a printed notice appeared in Tipperary during the day of the 24th June, containing a list of names of persons to be boycotted, in which that of an old woman named Clifford was included; and that on the same night in a back lane close to New Tipperary, lime was thrown over this old woman, and at a later hour her house was attacked by a mob with stones, the lower windows being destroyed, and she herself being injured with stones; and whether any arrests in connection with this assault have been made?

*MR. MADDEN: I am informed that it is the case that on June 24 a printed notice appeared in Tipperary containing a list of persons to be boycotted, and that in this list an old woman named Clifford was included. Also that it is the case that on the night of that day lime was thrown over the old woman, in a back lane situated within a few yards of the part of the town called "New Tipperary," and that, later in the night, her house was attacked by a mob with stones, all the windows smashed, and her goods in the lower part of the house destroyed, she herself also being injured by being struck with stones. No arrests were made, and the woman states that she is afraid to make an information and to prosecute.

MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork, N.E.): If all this is true why have no arrests been made?

*MR. MADDEN: No arrests have been made because the old woman stated that she was afraid to give information.

MR. FLYNN: In what infirmary was the old woman treated?

MR. W. O'BRIEN: Is it not the fact that at this moment there is not a single person boycotted in the town of Tipperary; the last person boycotted having made his peace with the National League?

*MR. MADDEN: I have no such information before me. I never said the old woman was treated in an infirmary. I said she was struck with stones and injured.

In reply to a question by Mr. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.),

*MR. MADDEN said: I have already stated that the woman was assaulted with stones.

MR. FLYNN: On what authority does the right hon. and learned Gentleman give this information to the House?

*MR. MADDEN: From the usual sources of official information.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): As this old woman refuses to give information, cannot the right hon. Gentleman put in operation the Star Chamber Clauses?

[No reply.]

THE POSTMASTER AT DROMINTEE.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General, with reference to the case of Mr. Terence M'Alevey, Postmaster at Dromintee, who has been removed from his office on the ground that he resisted a seizure of goods in his own premises, there having been no warrant in the hands of the Sheriff or his officers against Mr. M'Alevey, whether a Memorial, praying for the re-instatement of Mr. M'Alevey, has reached the Postmaster General, complaining that the post office has been removed to an inconvenient place for the inhabitants of the district; and if he, taking all the circumstances into consideration, will restore Mr. M'Alevey to the office which he held for eight years, with satisfaction to the authorities and the public, in the district of Dromintee County Armagh?

*MR. RAIKES: Two Memorials have been received praying for Mr. M'Alevey's re-instatement, but in neither of them is any complaint made that the post office had been removed to an inconvenient place. It having been reported to me that the sub-postmaster had been sentenced to a month's imprisonment for an assault on a Sheriff's officer, and as his official conduct was unsatisfactory, his removal from his office was decided on. I regret that I am unable to re-consider this decision.

TIMOLEAGUE FAIR GROUND.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether it is true, as reported in the Cork papers, that at the late presentment Sessions for the barony of Ibane and Barryroe, held at Timoleague, County Cork, it was stated by Mr. Travers, J.P., that an important part of the fair ground of Timoleague was privately purchased from the Admiralty by the local owner of the town and tolls; if such sale took place, to whom was it made, and what was the amount of purchase money given; whether, before such sale was completed, any notification was given to the public, who claim an immemorial right to the ground, and whether any public rights were reserved?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: In June, 1880, the Board of Trade, on behalf of the Crown, agreed to grant to the frontager, Mr. Robert A. Travers, of Timoleague, County Cork, in consideration of the sum of £5, the rights and interests of the Crown in a strip of foreshore on the west side of the River Argideen, opposite the village of Timoleague, containing between one-half and three-quarters of an acre, and extending from Church Bridge to a point opposite the ruins of Timoleague Abbey. Previous to the agreement being made, the application was, in accordance with the usual practice of the Board of Trade, advertised two successive weeks in each of two county newspapers, and no objections were received. As the shore was required for reclamation purposes, no public rights were reserved.

POSTAL ACCOMMODATION AT KILMOUNT.

*MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will consider the expediency of providing, by a rural box or otherwise, further postal accommodation for persons living in or near Kilmount, in the neighbourhood of Cootehill, who are at present seriously inconvenienced by the want of facilities for the posting and delivery of letters?

*MR. RAIKES: The subject to which the hon. Member refers has already been fully considered, and I find that there are only about four letters a day for Kilmount and its immediate vicinity. It is estimated that not more than two letters a day would be posted if an official box were established there, and I regret that the circumstances do not warrant special accommodation being afforded.

TIPPERARY MAGISTRATES.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will consent to the issue of a Return showing the attendance of Local Magistrates at weekly Petty Sessions in Tipperary from June, 1888, to June, 1890, and the attendance of Stipendiary Magistrates during same period?

MR. MADDEN: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to postpone this question until Monday.

THE OFFICE OF COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF.

SIR J. COLOMB: I wish to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will correct a statement in the report of his speech last night in the Times of to-day, in which he is represented to have said, "We mean the abolition of the office of Commander-in-Chief of the Army," because, undoubtedly, the right hon. Gentleman stated that the Government had not so decided.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): My hon. Friend is quite right. In the passage to which he alludes I was mentioning the proposals of the Commission, not the decision of the Government, and by reading the context anyone will, I think, be able to see that what I said was—

"Which I may sum up by saying that what I mean is the proposal for the abolition of the office of Commander-in-Chief."

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

MR. H. F. BEAUMONT, for one month, on account of ill-health.—(Mr. Anstruther.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA CONSTITUTION BILL.—(No. 256.)

THIRD READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [1st July], "That the Bill be now read the third time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

(4.31.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): Mr. Speaker—

VOL. CCCXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

*MR. SPEAKER: I am afraid the hon. Member has already spoken.

DR. CLARK: I have not spoken on the Third Reading, Sir.

*MR. SPEAKER: My recollection is that the Question of the Third Reading had been put.

DR. CLARK: What occurred, Sir, was this: The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury asked the consent of the House to take the Third Reading.

*MR. SPEAKER: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. I put the Question from the Chair, "That this Bill be read a third time." I am not able to allow hon. Gentlemen to speak who have already spoken.

*(4.33.) SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will state to the House what reservations have been made in the neighbourhood of St. George's Sound for the purposes of Imperial defence?

* (4.34.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The question which my hon. and gallant Friend puts to me is exceedingly important. It was considered by the Committee, who took evidence on the subject, and the Secretary of State telegraphed to the Government officials in Australia to reserve land in St. George's Sound for the purposes of defence. It must not be understood that the land is to be garrisoned by British troops. It is reserved for colonial defence. It will be fortified by the colony, and the armament will be supplied by Her Majesty's Government. We have received a telegram stating that all the land in the immediate neighbourhood of St. George's Sound which is likely to be required in connection with the defence of the port, has been reserved. As long as the reserves continue, the land cannot be sold or applied to any other purpose than that of defence.

(4.35.) MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary a question. I want to know whether it would not be possible for Her Majesty's Government to convey to the Government of Western Australia some idea of the opinion which has been so strongly expressed here against that part of the Schedule of the Bill which restricts the franchise under the proposed Constitution? A great many Members who have done everything they could to secure the passage of this Bill, strongly regret the restriction of the franchise; and I think it would be a very good thing if, without at all dictating to the Colonial Government, Her Majesty's Government could convey to them the fact that there is a strong feeling among the friends of the Bill against the restricted franchise.

*(4.36.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I object to the Third Reading of this Bill, and, if I have an opportunity, shall vote against it. The other evening I asked for some explanation of the Preamble of the Bill, in which there is something said about the allowance to the Attorney General of Western Australia. No explanation has been given, nor have we been told whether the Attorney General is to have an allowance at all. My principal objection to the Bill, however, is that we are forcing on these colonists a Constitution which they do not want—a Constitution based on a franchise which as soon as we possibly can we shall discard in this country altogether, and which contains other objectionable features. I find on reading the evidence given before the Select Committee that the elected Representatives on the present Legislative Council are entirely opposed by a considerable majority to the provisions of this Bill. The chief witness, Mr. Parker, who is said to represent the views of the elected members of the present Council, objected both to the proposed franchise and to the qualification of Members of the House of Commons. He says he is willing to allow the measure to pass because he thinks these things can be altered directly they get the new Constitution. But, as was pointed out in other evidence, they are not likely to be allowed to alter it for six years, and the Senate will probably prevent them altering it for many years. What I say is that we, having the settlement of this matter now before us, ought to take care that we give the Western Australians the most democratic Constitution we possibly can give them. I should not mind allowing this colony to have control of the lands, if the whole of the people were to have a voice in the Government. Under the franchise now proposed, the colony will be controlled by about half the persons who ought to have votes. It looks almost as if this Constitution had been made up for the purpose of benefitting the moneyed classes in the colony. We are informed by the Return that the Bank of New South Wales has nearly 3,000,000 acres of land in the colony, that another bank has 2,500,000 acres, that the Union Bank of Australia has nearly 8,000,000 acres, the Western Australian Bank over 1,000,000 acres, Mr. W. McKennon 4,000,000 acres, and the Forrest family about 2,000,000 acres. I am afraid that if such a Constitution as this is adopted, this sort of thing will go on until practically the whole of the land in the colony will get into the hands of land grabbers and that sort of people. This Constitution does not come from the colonial people, except geographically; it does not come from the majority of the people. It is stated in the evidence that it comes from the minority. [Baron H. de Worms indicated dissent.] The Colonial Secretary says that is not so, but the evidence is entirely against him, because we are told that at a recent election in Perth a candidate who advocated manhood suffrage and other reforms was returned by a large majority. Other evidence goes to show that if this Constitution were put to the vote, two-thirds of the people would declare themselves against it.

Mr. W. Redmond

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The hon. Member's statement is entirely inaccurate.

*MR. MORTON: Well, if your own Governor makes inaccurate statements, I cannot help it. I gathered from his statement that two-thirds of the population were against this Constitution. Well, we know that if there is only a third of the people in favour of the Constitution, it may be a generation before the majority can get an alteration made. I think, under these circumstances, we ought to reject this Bill, or that, at least, we should make provision that there shall be a Convention of Representatives of the people of the colony on the subject. I know it is said that the promoters of the Bill need not have come here at all on this question. Why have they come here? Because they want to get possession of the land. We ought to take care to put Western Australia in the same position as the other Australian Colonies. I shall vote against the Bill, feeling satisfied that a few months' delay will make no difference to the Colonists, and that they will be grateful for our action if in the end we give them a good Constitution. Now, Sir, I find I was right in what I said about the two-thirds. On page 63 of the Blue Book I find these questions and answers:—

“Q.—Can you tell us about what the proportion of the majority would be? A.—I could not. I imagine, numerically speaking, the majority of the population would dispense with the property qualification. Q.—Would it probably be five or six to one at all events? A.—Possibly so.”

Well, five or six to one is more than two-thirds, and, therefore, I have more than made out what I said just now.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The hon. Member has made out nothing at all.

(4.49.) MR. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): I think the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Morton) has spoken without a sufficient knowledge of the facts. Under the present franchise the people of Western Australia will be able to elect the majority of Parliament. I should like very much myself to see a wider Constitution, but, according to the evidence, a £10 franchise in Western Australia means a very different thing from what it means in England, and would practically take in four-fifths of the population. But the great guarantee is that the elected Members under the new Constitution will be able to control the Government, which will be a representative one. As to the land question, I would point out that all the land that is worth anything in the colony is rented under the existing system. The land which is given under this Bill is largely mining land, which can be of no use to anyone unless he is willing to venture large sums of money on its exploration. It is land totally unfitted for colonisation in the ordinary sense. Under the circumstances, therefore, I think the House will do well to pass this measure. Western Australia did not take the trouble to send one man to this country to protest against the Bill. We tried to obtain evidence against it, but no one took the trouble to communicate with us in opposition, showing clearly that there cannot be any very strong reasons why the measure should not pass. The evidence given before the Committee was altogether in favour of the passing—and the rapid passing—of the Bill.

(4.54.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I should like to say that, although some hon. Members were opposed to this Bill in the Committee, in view of the decision of that body, and knowing that to delay the passing of the measure will cause serious dissatisfaction in Western Australia, those hon. Members have refrained from offering that strenuous opposition which, under other circumstances, they would have felt it their duty to offer. We had hoped, however, that in passing the Bill the Colonial Office would, in some way, have secured a pledge from the colony that in return for the Constitution which is being secured to them, they should, when the good time comes, abolish this restrictive franchise. I think the Colonial Office might fairly have claimed that as a quid pro quo.

(4.55.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): By the indulgence of the House, I should like to put a question to the Under Secretary for the Colonies as to the pension to be provided in the Schedule for the Attorney General of Western Australia. A question on the subject has been asked, but I have not yet heard any answer to it. I want to know, in view of directing my own vote, if we go to a Division, whether any alteration has been made, as suggested in the Preamble of the Bill in connection with that pension; and, if so, what that alteration is. I would further ask why any pension should be paid to this gentleman at all considering the circumstances—which are so well-known in the House and the country—under which he was pitch-forked into his present position?

*(4.56.) BARON H. DE WORMS: The present salary of the Attorney General of Western Australia is £600. Of this £500 is fixed and paid by the colony, and £100 is annually voted. It was first proposed to give this gentleman two-thirds of his whole salary—that is to say, £400—as a pension. The sum, however, was changed to two-thirds of the fixed amount of £500.

Question put, and agreed to (Queen's Consent signified.)

Bill read the third time, and passed.

POLICE BILL.—(No. 338.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order for Committee be discharged: That the Bill be committed to the Standing Committee on Law, &c."—(Mr. Secretary Matthews.)

(4.58.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I rise to appeal to the Government not to take this course. I am sure they must feel as everybody feels that this is a measure which it is desirable to forward as soon as possible. The Bills which are sent to Standing Committees are generally Bills that have a great deal of technical detail in them, but that is not the case with the present measure. I do not see what the Standing Committee can do with this Bill. Though I do not happen to have the honour to be a Member of the Standing Committee to whom the Bill will be referred, I know that they will be able to do nothing with the Bill. It is merely an additional stage which will be of no sort or kind of advantage. It will be sheer waste of time to send the Bill to such a Committee. The Government cannot expect that a Bill of this importance can escape discussion in the House. Generally speaking, the object of sending a Bill to a Grand Committee is to get rid of a discussion in the House, and the Government cannot hope, considering the interest that is felt in the Bill by the Police Force throughout the country, to prevent the measure from being discussed. My right hon. Friend who presides over the Standing Committee will state the condition of business before the Committee, and show that the Motion can only have a dilatory effect; that it will bring about nothing but mischief, and do no good whatever towards settling this question. Therefore, I hope the Government will not press the Motion, but allow the Bill to be dealt with in the usual way. All that will happen if the Bill is sent to a Grand Committee will be that when it comes back here on Report stage it will have to be argued all over again.

*(5.1.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): Perhaps, as Chairman of the Grand Committee to which this Bill would be referred, I may be allowed to say a word as to the business before that Committee and the prospects of passing the Bill into law this Session if the proposal of the Government is acceded to. At present the Committee have two Bills referred to it—the Amendment and Consolidation Bills on the Housing of the Working Classes. These are very important measures. The Committee has sat once on them, and has got through three clauses of the Amendment Bill. There are several other clauses still to be dealt with, including the sixth, which refers to the application of the Bill to the County of London, and these it is very desirable to have fully discussed. I may mention that the rate of progress of the Standing Committee does not improve, for one Amendment suggests another. I am quite sure that I am understating the time that would be necessary if I suppose the Bill now before the Standing Committee can be disposed of in two more Sittings. Then it will be necessary to amalgamate the two Bills—the Amendment Bill and the Consolidation Bill—into one. That will involve re-printing and loss of time; and supposing it is possible to deal with the Consolidation Bill as a matter of form in one sitting—as to which I will say nothing—it is obvious that it will not be possible to reach the Police Bill before Monday fortnight, the 21st July. Now, I know from painful experience that it is extremely difficult at the end of July, and still more so at the beginning of August, to get a quorum of this Committee together. I have sat for an hour without getting a quorum, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Stirling tells me that he has had to sit for three hours without being able to get a quorum. I have the highest opinion of the action of these Committees. They do their work exceedingly well, provided the work referred to them is of the proper kind. The Members who attend are generally picked men, and they do not vote on Party lines. They hear the discussion, and they do not play to the gallery. Besides this, the Chairman has generally the advantage of having the drafter of the Bill at his elbow to consult with if necessary. Still, if you do not want the Grand Committee system to be discredited, let the House be careful what Bills are referred to these Committees. Any measure involving a Party question, or any heated discussion, is unsuitable for reference to a Grand Committee. Moreover, the Committee naturally will object to sitting for weeks to do work which is absolutely useless, as was the case two years ago when the Employers' Liability Bill, after being considered for a month upstairs, had to be dropped in the House, because every Amendment which had been discussed before the Committee was put down for reconsideration in the House. I should not grudge any amount of time bestowed on a Bill provided it is usefully bestowed. As I hold the position of Chairman of the Committees, it is as well that I should say nothing about the Bill under discussion. All I will say is, that if it is referred to us, it will be treated in a workmanlike manner, but I certainly doubt whether we shall not have sufficient time to deal with it properly, and send it back to the House in time to be passed this Session. I hope, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman will not insist on sending the Bill to the Grand Committee.

*(5.9.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has raised a practical objection to the Bill being referred to the Grand Committee, namely, that the Committee is already engaged on the consideration of two important measures, which, in the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman, will probably not be disposed of until Monday fortnight. Well, as I am responsible for the two Bills now before the Grand Committee on Law, I may be allowed to say something on that question. I think he has greatly over-estimated the time likely to be taken up by the two Bills before the Grand Committee. The right hon. Gentleman said that only three clauses have been disposed of by the Grand Committee. That is perfectly true, but the bulk of the Amendments on the Paper had reference to those three clauses. The remaining Amendments do not touch an important question of principle. Some of them are Amendments which are proposed by the Government, and are not likely to lead to any discussion at all. There is only one question of principle which has to be decided, and I believe that if the Committee could have sat for another hour yesterday they would in all probability have got through the whole of the Amendments on the Paper. Reference has been made to the London clauses. I do not think there is a single Amendment to the clauses dealing with London, and I am confident I express the opinion of the London Members when I say they are perfectly satisfied with the provisions of those clauses. As to the Consolidation Bill the right hon. Gentleman complains that the measure is not printed. It is in print, as amended by the Amending Bill, and as the Committee proceed so the Consolidation Bill is amended. The right hon. Gentleman said that the pace at which the Grand Committee proceeds does not increase. So far as my limited experience of yesterday is concerned, I think every member of the Committee was actuated by a desire to confine discussion within the smallest possible limits, and to assist the progress of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Bills referred to Grand Committee should not be Party Bills or Bills containing any vital principle which was matter of dispute between Parties. That is exactly the kind of Bill the Police Bill is. All Parties are agreed as to the desirability of superannuation. [Cries of "No."] Well, then, many are, and the right hon. Gentleman is entirely in accord with the Government on the point. There are matters of great importance to be considered, but they cannot be said to be in any sense of the term Party Questions. The right hon. Gentleman says that by referring the Bill to the Grand Committee we are adding another stage, and he talks about the proceeding as a dilatory proceeding. I venture to say that if devolution is favourably regarded by the House, this is an occasion on which the principle of devolution might most fairly and properly be applied. I do not at all agree with the right hon. Gentleman that it means the addition of a stage. I believe that, in all probability, the Bill will come back from the Grand Committee in such a form that it will lead to very little discussion in the House. [An hon. MEMBER: The Employers' Liability Bill.] The Employers' Liability Bill was a Bill of an altogether different description. In it there was most contentious matter, but no contentious question is involved in this Bill.

(5.17.) MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I think the course the Government are taking will lead to a good deal of friction and delay. I cannot share the right hon. Gentleman's view as to Grand Committees. I have served the whole of this Session on the Grand Committee on Trade. Bills which did not involve Party considerations, but which greatly interested the financial and commercial Members of the House, were referred to the Committee. Those Bills were fought word by word, line by line, clause by clause. I thought there was a great waste of time. The reference to the Committee did not save discussion, because one of the Bills came down to this House, and was debated afresh. I fear questions affecting the Metropolitan Police will be debated in this House after the Bill has passed through Grand Committee. I cannot agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the Grand Committee on Law will get through its Bills as soon as he imagines. There are not many contentious Amendments to the Housing of the Working Classes Bill to be considered, but there is one serious question in connection with compensation to be debated. The consideration of the subject will take one, if not two, Sittings. I hope to see the Bill passed, but I should prefer the discussion upon the clauses to take place in Committee of the Whole House.

(5.23.) MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): In common with every man, I believe, on this side of the House, and with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, I have every desire to see this Bill pass as quietly as possible. I find there are already 86 Amendments upon the Paper, and I am quite sure these will be quite as well, and far more rapidly, discussed in Standing Committee than in Committee of the Whole House. Having regard to the present position of the Notice Paper, and to the amount of business to be considered, I think the course proposed by the Government is best calculated to secure the rapid enactment of the Bill.

(5.24.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): It is not only Bills that excite strong Party feeling which ought not to be referred to Grand Committees, but Bills that excite strong local feeling. Members who are not on the Grand Committee will not be content to allow the Bill to pass without comment, and, therefore, I think the best thing is to take the Bill in Committee of the whole House.

*(5.25.) MR. C. DARLING (Deptford): It appears to me the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has entirely lost sight of one consideration, and that is that, if the Bill is to be taken in Committee of the whole House, it may be used by some one less scrupulous than himself for the purpose of obstructing some other measure which may be objected to. Perhaps if the right hon. Gentleman had realised this point he would not have taken the objection he has.

(5.26.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I must say with respect to the hon. and learned Gentleman that his argument is a very poor one. The chances of this Bill being discussed in Committee at some length have nothing to do with any other consideration than its extreme importance and its special character. I feel very strongly on the point of referring this Bill to a Grand Committee. This is not a Bill of great detail, but a Bill which every Member of the House thoroughly understands. It is a Bill which hon. Members feel extremely strongly about, and it is quite impossible that when the Bill has gone through the Grand Committee it should not afterwards be discussed at length on Report, because it affects every district throughout the country in a matter which every Member understands, and which, as a guardian of the public purse, he feels very strongly about. The discussion on questions of retirement, salary, pension, and—[An hon. MEMBER: Salary!] Well, the question of salary is to be raised incidentally by an hon. Member below the Gangway, and the question must in some sense be discussed because, of course, pension is only another form of paying deferred salary. These questions ought to be discussed in the face of day. There is no desire on this side of the House to delay the Bill, because we want to have the Bill passed, and passed in such a shape that it will be advantageous to the police, and not disadvantageous to the ratepayers.

*(5.29.) MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): It is impossible to pass by unnoticed the uncertainty and vacillation which have characterised the proceedings of the Home Secretary. In the first place, he proposed to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, then he altered his mind, and thought he would take the Bill in the Committee of the whole House, and now he proposes to send the Bill to a Grand Committee. The particular circumstances in which we find ourselves are very likely to lead to positive disaster. What are those circumstances? The Home Secretary quarrelled with the Chief Commissioner of Police over the details of this Bill. He has represented himself in the contest as the guardian of the public purse. On the other hand, the Chief Commissioner of Police has declared himself as the special champion of the claims of the men, and the men regard him in that character. I do not want to judge between the Home Secretary and the Chief Commissioner of Police, but I say that, inasmuch as these things have occurred, the Home Secretary should give the police an earnest of his good faith by displaying energy and despatch in dealing with this Bill. These are just the qualities which have been in this case conspicuous by their absence. The right hon. Gentleman proposes to refer the Bill to the Grand Committee upon Law. The Chairman of that Committee tells us there is business before that Committee to occupy them for at least a fortnight. I will divide that by two, and say the present business may be disposed of in a week. At least a fortnight will be occupied by the Bill in Grand Committee, and so there will be three weeks from now before the Bill comes back again to this House, and Heaven only knows what or where the Government will be three weeks hence. More than that, from what has taken place already, we may draw the reasonable inference that there will be a determined effort to defeat the Bill in the House. Well, it will come back to us, at all events not earlier than the last days of July, and then, or early in August, a determined effort will be made by possibly not a large number of Members, but, I believe, a number of Members who have formed a strong conviction against the Bill, to defeat it, and it is matter of doubt whether, to use a Times phrase, the Government will have "sufficient moral energy" to force the Bill through in the face of a determined opposition. As to what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt), I support what he has said. I cannot see more than one reason for referring this Bill to the consideration of a Committee at all, and that would be if the Committee were empowered to receive evidence in regard to the pay and conditions of service generally of the rank and file of the Metropolitan Police, and if you choose to give that opportunity I should not oppose it. But the Grand Committee has neither the power nor the machinery for an inquiry of that character. Therefore, I say, the time spent over the Bill in Grand Committee will be sheer waste, and you will only be deferring for three weeks the inevitable battle that must be fought out on the floor of the House. For this reason I support the suggestion that the Bill should be considered in Committee of the Whole House, and if the right hon. Gentleman persists in his Motion he will incur very great responsibility. He endangers the Bill, and if the Bill is defeated I hope the police and the public will place the responsibility of the disappointment of our reasonable hopes where it ought to be, with the right hon. Gentleman and his Motion.

*(5.33.) MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I am sure the Government will not think I am actuated by hostility to the Bill in what I am going to say, because I have voted with them on this question and supported the police superannuation provisions in the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill. But I think the Government must see from the discussions we have had that there is much difference of opinion, which will not be sufficiently ventilated in Grand Committee, and so, after the Grand Committee has had the Bill before it, the whole question will be re-discussed in the House. So far as I and other Liberal Metropolitan Members are concerned we shall raise no unnecessary discussion. We are in favour of police superannuation, and we shall give the Government support in making the system of police superannuation effective in London. But there are other Members in the House representing provincial boroughs and counties, who feel a deep interest in this Bill, and as the principle of the Bill applies to provincial boroughs and counties as well as to the Metropolis, they holding different views to ours, feel it their duty to discuss the Bill on behalf of those they represent. Under these circumstances, I appeal to the Government to consider whether it will not be better to get the Bill into Committee of the whole House as soon as possible, relying on the support they will receive from the House generally, and especially from Independent Members on this side. So far as we can prevent it, there shall be no dilatory or embarrassing proceedings to defeat or retard the progress of the Bill through Committee. It is not, and ought not, to be made a Party question. Both sides of the House are deeply interested in having this question satisfactorily settled, and no real or ultimate Party advantage can be gained from difficulties connected with the administration and management of the police. The desire should be on both sides, and I believe it is to have a system settled which shall be fair to the police and fair to the public. I hope the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt), who is committed by Bills he has in former times introduced to the principle of police superannuation, will co-operate with the Government in giving effect to that principle. I do not suppose for an instant that the right hon. Gentleman will offer any factious opposition to the Government proposal, nor do I think any of the occupants of the Front Opposition Bench desire other than a reasonable discussion. I hope the Home Secretary will take advantage of the friendly suggestion made. We must all feel that the settlement of the question of police superannuation has been too long delayed. It is in the interest of the police and the public that it should be settled, and it will be a great disappointment to the police and all of us who take an interest in the well-being of the Force if the settlement should be thrown over to the chances of another Session. I will not labour the appeal, but I do urge the Government to reciprocate the spirit in which the suggestion is made, defer to the evident sense of the House, and let the Bill be dealt with in Committee of the whole House.

(5.37.) MR. ATHERLEY - JONES (Durham, N.W.): The reception which the Bill received on the Second Reading was such as to afford no great assurance that the Bill will rapidly pass through Committee. I am bound to say that my view is, if ever there was a Bill that ought to go before either a Select Committee or a Standing Committee, it is this Police Bill, and I am certainly fortified in that opinion by the speeches from the two hon. Members who last spoke from this side. There is no doubt about it that the Debate which took place on the Second Reading clearly manifested there was a very strong intention, with perhaps the object of catching applause, to press forward the Bill as much as possible in the interest of the police and as little as possible in the interest of the ratepayers. The Bill is brimful of details; there is the question of the period of superannuation, the amount of superannuation, the amount of deductions to be made from the police pay, the question of the amount to be borne by the ratepayers, the amount to be borne by the Imperial Government; in fact, I may say every clause is brimful of detail of a financial character, and, under the circumstances, I think, if only for that reason, apart from the other and more formidable reason given, it is desirable the Bill should be dealt with by a body free from the heating influence of a Debate in this House, and where it can be approached in a judicial spirit.

*(5.40.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am glad to hear that on both sides there is equal desire to promote the passage of the Bill. [Cries of "No!"] With rare exceptions, the great bulk of opinion is in favour of the Bill. Now, my Motion has no other object. I echo entirely the remarks which have fallen from the last speaker. If the principle of devolution is to be applied at all, the present measure is one which amply justifies the application of the principle. It ought to be borne in mind, moreover, that no Division took place on the Second Reading, and that the general lines of the measure have been assented to by both sides of the House. There is no difference of opinion as to the principle ; the differences of opinion which exist have reference rather to points of detail, which certainly can be better, more carefully, and more dispassionately discussed in a Standing Committee than in the House itself. I can scarcely conceive any question on which the House will find it necessary, after the Committee has concluded its labours, to raise the same points again.

*SIR W. HARCOURT: But suppose we are not Members of the Committee?

*MR. MATTHEWS: The right hon. Gentleman is a host in himself ; he is a Member of the Committee.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I shall not sit upon this Bill.

*MR. MATTHEWS: Then the right hon. Gentleman will not manifest that zeal for the Bill which his words in this House have led us to expect.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Let it be discussed in the House.

*MR. MATTHEWS: The right hon. Gentleman will only discuss the Bill in this House, and this leads me to ask when will he find an opportunity of discussing it, considering the large amount of business which has yet to be dealt with? It is in order to promote the passage of the Bill—it being regarded as a matter of grave public importance—that it has been decided to refer the discussion of its details to the calmer atmosphere of a Standing Committee. The discussion of details will unquestionably be more conveniently carried on in Committee. The alteration of one small point in the scale of pensions, for instance, will involve minute and delicate adjustment of other parts of clauses. The Bill will occupy the Committee probably three or four days, while in the House, where the discussion would necessarily be longer, the discussion would occupy at least five days. Consistently with the completion of other business, with which our hands are full, I do not think that the necessary number of days could be found.

*(5.45.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I quite agree it is desirable to pass the Bill this Session, but there are reasons why we object to its reference to a Standing Committee. In the first place, the Standing Committee on Law is not pre-eminently qualified to deal with the question. I say not a word in disparagement of Members who are familiar with the law in theory and practice ; but this Bill is concerned with administrative and not legal questions—questions upon which those Members are most qualified to speak who are familiar with police administration in boroughs and counties. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of difficult and delicate details ; but I think I know the Bill pretty well, and I have long been familiar with the subject, and I confess I do not see where the points of difficulty and delicacy arise with which we cannot here deal. There are one or two questions of principle underlying the whole measure which the House must decide, and which it will delegate to no Committee whatever to dispose of. A large number of Members representing counties and boroughs are not disposed to accept the principles with respect to superannuation which must be applied to the Metropolitan Police. Another point is the amount of interference which the Central Authority would exercise over the Local Authority. We have for years been working for the principle of decentralisation. The great object of the Local Government Bill was to strengthen that principle and get rid of perpetual Government control in all Departments of municipal and county administration, and that is why we deplore the application of the principle of subventions, which must be accompanied to some extent by Imperial control. But the crux of the Bill is the extent to which we are going to control by Act of Parliament the administration of local funds in dealing with local matters. Representatives of the ratepayers in their respective boroughs and counties can deal with questions affecting finance far more wisely and successfully than this House can deal with them. There are questions of length of service, the scale of pensions, the extent to which you will allow Local Authorities a free hand between a maximum and a minimum, upon which County and Borough Members will have a word or two to say. Then there is another question—the financial one. You are now going to introduce a Bill—I am not saying it is wrong, for I consider myself to a certain extent responsible for it—to compel Local Authorities to establish a superannuation

Fund with the ultimate burden on the rates. I have a communication from one of the largest boroughs in England protesting against this principle. You do not apply the principle throughout the Civil Service. But I must not argue that question now. There are two or three principles involved, which, with the Chairman of Committees in the Chair, we might settle in a much shorter time than the Home Secretary supposes. I do not for a moment think we should occupy four or five days. My right hon. Friend near me, and myself, will assist in passing the Bill. The Home Secretary asks, Where are we to find time for a Committee of the whole House? I would ask, Where are we to find time for the Report? I venture to predict that the course now pursued will create delay, and may possibly involve some difficulty in passing the Bill before the Session is brought to a close. We do not know what the Session has in reserve; tell us this, and we may assist in the solution. The hope may be vain, I own; but if the Government would abandon all contentious business now that we have got through a week of July, and concentrate attention on Supply and to winding up the business of the Session, I am sure this Police Bill might, without difficulty, be carried to a successful issue.

(5.53.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster):* There was one portion of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman which I heard with satisfaction, the reiterated assurance that the right hon. Member for Derby and himself were desirous of offering every facility for passing the Bill into law after due consideration. The right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues think we shall be delaying the Bill by sending it to a Standing Committee. But my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and myself have come to the conclusion that it would delay the measure if we were to send it to a Committee of the whole House. The right hon. Gentleman will admit that I have shown every disposition to meet the views of himself and his friends wherever we could bring our opinions into accord with theirs. I listened with some interest to the statement made by the hon. Member for

Mr. H. H. Fowler

Bethnal Green (Mr. Pickersgill), who said that there is a small section determined to defeat the measure by all the means in their power. That expression is cheered by the senior Member for Northampton.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Allow me to explain. My cheer did not express approval or disapproval; it simply meant "Yes, that is true."

MR. W. H. SMITH: I accept the statement of the fact that, at all events, there are a number of gentlemen who are determined to defeat the Bill by every means in their power, and we know the power these hon. Gentlemen possess to delay proceedings in Committee. The Government are aware of the difficulty of passing the Bill through a Committee of the whole House in the month of July. They have, therefore, availed themselves of the principle of devolution, in order that the Standing Committee may deal with a stage in which prolonged opposition would be possible in a Committee of the whole House. The right hon. Gentleman has said that there are points of principle with which the House ought to deal. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman, and the House will have an opportunity of dealing with those points if they are not satisfied with the way in which they are dealt with by the Standing Committee. This is not a Party question, but it is a question of importance, and the Government will accept the assistance of hon. Gentlemen opposite in endeavouring to arrive at arrangements which will be satisfactory to the police and which the interests of the country require. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of this Committee as if it were not competent to deal with this question. But I have read through the list of names, and I find that there are on it a large number of Gentlemen who, as Chairmen of Quarter Sessions and Magistrates, are perfectly qualified to deal with the question.

(6.2.) SIR W. HARCOURT: With the indulgence of the House I wish to be allowed to say that I do not propose to divide the House on the question. I do not desire to make it a Party question, but the whole responsibility will rest with the Government. My right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton and myself are extremely anxious to render any assistance in the House, but we will take no part in the discussion in the Standing Committee. The Government must conduct the discussion there themselves, and take the responsibility themselves. My right hon. Friend and myself could not make ourselves parties to delaying or endangering the Bill.

*(6.3.) CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N): The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury does not understand what is the nature of the opposition that is going to be offered to this Bill. It is not a factious or Party opposition. The opposition arises from the fact that though the Bill may be excellently adapted to the Metropolitan Police yet it interferes with the powers of Local Authorities in the counties. It takes out of their hands powers which, generally speaking, they have exercised wisely and well. In every county there is a system of superannuation in vogue. It is a different arrangement in different counties, and the County Authorities look with extreme jealousy on the action of the Government in bringing in a Bill which will sweep away all existing county distinctions. It will, therefore, be the duty of Representatives of county districts, before the Grand Committee, and in this House on the Report stage, to make known the views of their constituents. There is still another reason which, in my opinion, justifies the opposition to the Bill. In the celebrated Memorandum, which is marked confidential, it is explained that the reason why the Bill was not brought in sooner was because it was thought desirable that the newly constituted County Councils should have time to consider the subject. Now, the County Councils have not had time to do any such thing. There is no County Council in the Kingdom which has yet spent time in so doing, and therefore, while so far as the clauses affecting the Metropolitan Police are concerned I will gladly do anything in my power to assist the Government to pass them, yet I warn them that great opposition will be excited by this Centralisation Bill, which is, after all, but a preliminary step to eventually getting the police wholly under Government control. If the Government send this Bill to a Committee upstairs, they will not spare themselves subsequent discussion in this House on the Report stage. I repeat, it will not be a factious opposition—it will not be carried on with any desire to embarrass the Government, but solely because our duty to our constituents demands that we should not allow local special arrangements with the police to be swept away, and all parts of the country placed under one system.

(6.7.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I have taken no part in the discussion, and I can assure the First Lord of the Treasury that I have no very strong feeling on the subject. I do not think this is one of those Bills which ought to be defeated by what I may call exhaustive tactics in this House. But what I may point out to the right hon. Gentleman is this: that he and his friends are always getting into trouble by trying to put a quart of bad liquor into a pint pot. That is what they are endeavouring to do now. My right hon. Friend from Wales, who is Chairman of the micromosm to which the Bill is to be referred, has stated distinctly that it cannot come before the Grand Committee for a fortnight, and that it would take three weeks before the discussion could be completed. But the First Lord does not accept the view held by the Chairman of the Committee. All I may say is, that if the Bill passes the Grand Committee and comes back to the House in the first week in August, all these Amendments will be brought up again, as he has been warned by hon. Members sitting on this side of the House, upon the Report stage, and no time will have been saved by referring the Bill to Committee. I think the Bill might be carried if the right hon. Gentleman were simply to take it in Committee of this House. He knows that it is not intended to offer any factious opposition to it, and those hon. Members who have expressed themselves as opposed to it on principle know that they are in a minority and are not likely to press their opposition to an extreme point. This is in no sense a Party Bill, because I believe the majority of hon. Members sitting on this side of the House are in favour of it. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman whether it would not be wiser to take this Bill in Committee of the whole House rather than send it upstairs.

(6.11.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I am anxious that this Bill should become law, but I think if it is resolved to refer it to the Grand Committee it will endanger its passing, because some of the points on which there are differences of opinion will necessarily have to be threshed out in this House, and the Government will not have forwarded the consideration of the Bill by sending it to the Grand Committee. I believe that nine-tenths of the Members of this House are anxious to aid in passing the measure; and if the right hon. Gentleman will but make up his mind to put it down for discussion immediately after the Irish Votes have been disposed of, I do not think he need fear any danger of its not passing into law. I may add that the Members for the Metropolis have their own views as to how far the Metropolitan Clauses of the Bill require amendment, and we are anxious, of course, to get to the discussion of those clauses. Before the Grand Committee can deal with the Bill they have two other Bills to dispose of, the one affecting the housing of the working classes, and the other—a very large and important measure—the Consolidation Bill. We should have been anxious to have laid the Metropolitan Clauses before a Select Committee if power had been given to call officers to give evidence with regard to the grievances under which the Force is suffering, because we were desirous that those grievances should be taken into consideration and dealt with in a manner that would be satisfactory to the whole Force. But if the Bill is not to go to a Committee of that description with power to take such evidence then we hold that it is simply a waste of time to send it to a Committee at all, and we prefer to thresh the whole thing out in a Committee of this House. In conclusion, I can only say that if the Government decline to accept our proposition, I re-echo in an humble manner the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, that the whole responsibility with regard to the Bill rests with the Government, and if it fails to pass through the House this Session they alone are to blame.

*(6.15.) MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): Hon. Members have great reason, I think, to be dissatisfied with the action of Her Majesty's Government. The Bill was read a second time without much discussion, for the simple reason that the Government, in answer to the appeal of my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, agreed that it should be dealt with in Committee of the whole House, instead of by a Select Committee, as proposed by the Government. We, therefore, thought that we should at least have an opportunity of ventilating grievances before the Committee. So far as London is concerned, hon. Members on this side of the House representing London constituencies desired that the Bill should go to a Select Committee, in order that the police might have an opportunity of themselves stating their grievances, but now as a third alteration of the plan of the Government, we are told that the Bill must go to a Grand Committee. I can only say that we shall deem it our duty to raise questions upon the Report stage, and the Government must expect that a great many details will be gone into.

Question put, and agreed to.

Order for Committee read, and discharged; Bill committed to the Standing Committee on Law, &c.

POLICE (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 353.)

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on the Main Question proposed [1st July], "That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee."

Question again proposed.

(6.17.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the names of the Committee will be put down in time to enable Members from Scotland to propose additional names, if found necessary?

*(6.18.) MR. W. H. SMITH: The names will be put down in good time, and, when decided upon, communication will be made to the hon. Gentleman.

(6.19.) MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): All that has been said in opposition to the Motion on the English Bill is applicable with ten-fold more force in the case of the present Bill, because what the Government propose to do is to refer the measure not to a Grand Committee, but to a Select Committee. The consequence is that we shall not be able to take the Report of the Select Committee on Report stage here, and it will have to go through the Committee stage of the Whole House, so that the Government will really gain no time by adopting this course. Speaking for myself, and hon. Members who think with me, I shall not be influenced in the slightest degree by the Report of the Select Committee, and I shall oppose this Bill at every possible stage.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill committed to a Select Committee.

MR. HUNTER: I now beg to move the following Instruction:—

“That it be an Instruction to the Select Committee on the Police (Scotland) Bill that they shall have power to establish a Board consisting partly of representatives elected by the police and partly of one or more persons appointed by the Secretary for Scotland, and that such Board shall have, subject to the Secretary for Scotland, the management of all moneys provided by Parliament, or obtained from other sources, for the purpose of providing pensions, gratuities, and allowances for the police constables of Scotland and their widows and children.”

The reason why I think it necessary to move this Instruction lies in two facts. In the first place I am opposed to the Bill because it imposes an indefinite but large liability on the ratepayers of Scotland, in order to find money for the pensions of the police. I warn the Lord Advocate that he will not carry this clause easily. I believe the feeling among the Scotch Members is totally opposed to this additional charge being placed upon the rates, for the maintenance or superannuation of the police. The proposal of the Government in this Bill is an interference with the Local Authorities, for it is just the same as saying to those authorities—“You shall not be at liberty to frame your own contracts, but must accept the provisions arranged by the Government.” Now, that is a most objectionable feature of the scheme. On what ground do the Government justify that enormous inroad on the rights of the Local Authorities? I believe the bulk of the working men in Scotland will take a very strong view indeed of the gross injustice of taxing them for the purpose of providing pensions for the police, on such a scale as this Bill proposes. What does the Lord Advocate say? That the tax is only going to be 1d. in the £1. Why, that was the sum fixed for the Public Library Acts, and we all know what an amount of agitation and education it took before the working classes were induced to incur that additional charge, for an Act which was specially devised for their own benefit. There is another reason which makes it most unjust to impose this charge upon the ratepayers. Everybody knows that the Police Rate under the general Act was an occupier's rate. The Poor Rate and the School Board Rate are very fairly divided between the owners and occupiers, but this fair arrangement does not apply to the Police Rate. The consequence will be that the working men will have to pay twice as much for this 1d. in the £1 for the Police Rate as they would if it had been put upon the Poor Rate. The Government are giving to the police a sum the capitalised value of which is £1,750,000 for 4,042 men. That is a munificent sum; and I wish to point out that if this clause is lost in the Committee, where I believe it will meet with the most determined opposition, the Government will find extreme difficulty in carrying out the remainder of the Bill. I mention this in view of some alternative scheme being forthcoming. My main reason for proposing the Instruction is that it is only by a device of that kind we can effectually protect the ratepayers from any charge for the superannuation of the police. What has been the result of your Bill which affects the London police? Why, at this moment the police of London are engaged in secret and almost concealed agitation, with a view to bringing pressure to bear on the Government to make concessions which will be satisfactory to them. In regard to the Scotch police, I may point out that nearly the whole of them under the terms of their engagement have no right to a pension, and, therefore, the proposal of the Government is absolutely gratuitous.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That it be an Instruction to the Select Committee on the Police (Scotland) Bill, that they shall have power to establish a Board consisting partly of Representatives elected by the police and partly of one or more persons appointed by the Secretary of Scotland, and that such Board shall have, subject to the Secretary for Scotland, the management of all moneys provided by Parliament or obtained from other sources for the purpose of providing pensions, gratuities, and allowances for the police constables of Scotland and their widows and children."—(Mr. Hunter.)

*(6.30.) COLONEL MALCOLM (Argyllshire): I regard this proposal as involving an inroad on the power of the Local Authority, and the taxing of the ratepayers without representation. I do not see how the Board the hon. Member proposes can in any way represent the ratepayers or carry on the principle he is anxious to establish. I am myself very much opposed to centralisation in Scotland, and I think that with a few alterations the provisions of this Bill would enable the object in view to be carried out by the Local Authorities very much better than would be possible in the case of any Central Board, however composed. Under this Instruction there is no provision for the proper representation of the ratepayers, whereas it is my opinion that all management of the sort proposed should be in the hands of the Local Authorities, which must be better acquainted with the needs and wants of their own districts than any central body. Beyond this the Local Authority would be able to use the power of granting pensions as a means of encouraging better discipline. I think that no one who has listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton could want any further argument against this Instruction. The right hon. Gentleman pointed out very clearly the advantages of leaving, as far as possible, the management of the police to the Local Authorities, and for my part, having had considerable experience in the management of police affairs, I must object most strongly to the idea which under-runs this Instruction.

*(6.34.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): As far as the argument just addressed to the Committee by the hon. Member for Argyllshire is concerned I think that the hon. Gentleman has entirely missed the point of the Instruction. I am one of those who believe that the £40,000 proposed to be given by the Government would be sufficient for the purpose proposed, and it is because I believe it will be inexpedient, under present circumstances, to revert to local funds, and that the Scottish people would not bear any further tax for police superannuation purposes, that I think the Instruction moved by my hon. Friend might be accepted. I am not prepared to say that after it has been discussed by the Committee the Bill of the Government will not prevail. It says "may" and not "shall," and I would submit to the Lord Advocate that no harm can come from the adoption of the Instruction.

(6.37.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): As I have been appealed to it may be convenient that I should say at once that the Government cannot accept this Instruction. I go very largely on the ground stated by the hon. Member for Argyllshire. The essence of the Bill is that pensions are to be in the hands of the Local Authorities, and that the same Authority which furnishes the pay shall also furnish the pensions for the Police Force. I cannot help thinking that the House would impose on the Committee—or rather, would authorise by the Committee—a line of inquiry which would turn out to be hopelessly irreconcilable with the rest of the scheme. The hon. Gentleman, by his Instruction, proposes to do things which, on the face of them, are sufficiently startling. For instance, he proposes to set up a Central Board, partly elected and partly nominated by the Government, for the administration of money voted by Parliament. That is a proposal of a somewhat novel kind. On one hand, the elected Members would represent neither the taxpayers nor the ratepayers, but merely the class who are to be the recipients of the Imperial Fund, and, on the other hand, the nominees of the Government would not represent neither the taxpayers or the ratepayers, or the Administrative Bodies whose duties would be affected by the proposal. Therefore, I say, the proposition is one which radically differs from the principle of the Bill, and I think it our duty frankly to say that we oppose it. I would point out to hon. Gentlemen opposite that there is also a very important principle involved in placing in the hands of the Local Administrative Body the disposal of the pensions. In the first place, it is quite clear that if you are to have an effective and discriminative pension system, you must have an Administrative Body to regulate the amount of the pension given by the Bill, with due regard to the age of the pensioner's retirement; and, in the second place, if you are to have discretionary pensions at all, it is perfectly manifest that you cannot hand the money over to a Central Body, which knows nothing about the individuals with regard to whom the discretion is to be exercised. The more the subject is examined, the more, I feel assured, will my hon. Friend the Member for Argyllshire be held to be right on this point. The hon. Member for Aberdeen endeavoured to treat this as a question of whether there is to be a burden on the rates. When the time comes, hon. Gentlemen may, in Committee, challenge the clause which makes the rates a guarantee of the fund, but I do not think they will succeed. The hon. Gentleman said I had represented that the rate would not be 1d. in the £1 on the valuation roll of Scotland. What I did say was that according to certain actuarial calculations half a century hence, a rate of 1d. in the £1 might be needed, but that it would not be likely to be more. Further, I said there would not be any burden on the rates, according to the best information we could get, during nearly the present generation. I have thus stated the general grounds on which we are bound to oppose this Instruction, and I think it would be better to negative it than to add to the already wide field of inquiry which is open to the Committee.

(6.43.) Mr. E. ROBERTSON: I agree that the observations made by the hon. Member for Aberdeen are not strictly applicable to the question before the Committee, although they would have been a valuable contribution to the Motion for the Second Reading of the Bill. I do not find in the Instruction the point that was raised by the hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire as to the discrimination between the contributions from the Imperial Exchequer and from the rates. From my point of view, which is one of entire hostility to the Bill, there is no difference between the two; but if there be any I should object more to the contribution from the Exchequer than to that from the rates. Well, Sir, my hon. Friend proposes, by his Instruction, to deal with all the money provided by Parliament, and from any other source, so as to put it into the hands of a special Board, which he desires to create, and that Board is to consist mainly of the representatives of those who will be the beneficiaries under the Bill. This is a proposal in which I hope the Committee will not concur, and, although it has been said that the Instruction will not do much harm, I do not think it can do any good, and if I do not vote against it I certainly shall not vote for it.

Question put, and negatived.

COMPANIES (WINDING-UP) BILL. (No. 283.)

As amended, considered.

(6.46.) Sir HORACE DAVEY (Stockton): My right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton does not intend to move the new clause which stands in his name, and I beg to move an Amendment to Clause 1, which also stands in his name. With the permission of the House, I propose to move, on the part of my right hon. Friend, a new sub-section. I propose to strike out Sub-section 2 of Clause 1, and to move a new sub-section. The sub-section which I propose to move provides, in the first place, that wherever the paid-up capital of a company amounts to £10,000, that then the jurisdiction shall be in the High Court, or in the Palatine Courts of Lancaster and Durham; and wherever the paid-up capital of the company falls short of £10,000, in that case the jurisdiction will be in the County Court. With regard to the Stannary Courts, the clause reserves the jurisdiction of the Stannary Courts, except where a mining company is engaged in mining elsewhere than in the jurisdiction of the Stannary Courts. Now, Sir, these clauses have been seen by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, and I have reason to believe that they are accepted by the Government. I have stated the effect of them, and I do not know that I need read them to the House.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, to omit Sub-section 2, and instead thereof, to insert the following:—

“(2.) Where the amount of the capital of a company paid up or credited as paid up exceeds ten thousand pounds, a petition to wind up the company or to continue the winding up of the company under the supervision of the court shall be presented to the High Court unless the registered office of the company is situate within the jurisdiction of either of the palatine courts aforesaid, in which case the petition may be presented either to the High Court or to the palatine court within the jurisdiction of which the registered office of the company is situate.

"(3.) Where the amount of the capital of a company paid up or credited as paid up does not exceed ten thousand pounds, and the registered office of the company is situate within the jurisdiction of a county court having jurisdiction under this Act, a petition to wind up the company or to continue the winding up of the company under the supervision of the court shall be presented to that county court.

"(4.) Provided that where a company is formed for working mines within the Stannaries and it is not shown to be actually working mines beyond the limits of the Stannaries, or to be engaged in any other undertaking beyond those limits, or to have entered into a contract for such working or undertaking, a petition to wind up the company or to continue the winding up of the company under the supervision of the court shall be presented to the Stannaries court whatever may be the amount of the capital of the company and wherever the registered office of the company is situate."—(Sir Horace Davey.)

Amendment agreed to.

Other Amendments made.

Clause 5.

Amendment moved, in page 4, line 4, after the word "himself," insert "apply to the Court to."—(Mr. Horace Davey.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(7.2.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): The hon. and learned Gentleman will, I think, see that the words I propose, to carry out his suggestion, read better than those he has submitted. They are "may apply to the Court, and the Court may on such application" appoint a special manager thereof to act until another liquidator is appointed, &c.

SIR H. DAVEY: I accept those words.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment agreed to, in page 4, line 4, after the word "himself" insert "may apply to the Court, and the Court may on such application."—(The Attorney General.)

Other Amendments agreed to.

SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): I beg to move to omit Clause 11, the object of which is to provide that in any of these liquidations all the moneys are to be paid over to the Board of Trade, except under certain particular cases. The object of wise statesmanship ought always to be to cultivate principles of self-dependence, and cultivate principles of self-reliance, and not to teach the people to trust to the management of the Government. If this clause is passed it will take the conduct of their affairs out of the hands of those interested, and hand it over to the Board of Trade. I cannot help thinking that those who have their money and interest at stake in the winding up of these Companies will be much more likely to do the work efficiently than the Board of Trade. We do not wish to make attacks on the Board of Trade. We recognise the ability and skill with which the affairs of the Department are carried on, and it is not from want of confidence in them, or any fear that they would in any way neglect their duty, that we are anxious to retain in the hands of those interested the conduct of their own affairs. I trust the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade will consent to the omission of the clause. I have no objection to the first sub-section, and will be quite satisfied to omit the others, if that would meet the views of the right hon. Baronet. I am afraid, however, he would not assent to this, and I, therefore, raise the whole question by moving to omit the clause.

Amendment moved, "To omit Clause 11."—(Sir J. Lubbock.)

Question proposed, "That Clause 11 stand part of the Bill."

*(7.18.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I hope the hon. Baronet will not press the Amendment. This clause to which he takes exception is one of a series of clauses which are practically identical with similar clauses in the Bankruptcy Act of 1883. Their object is not to make money out of the winding-up of Companies or bankruptcy proceedings, but rather to obtain such financial control in each case as will enable improper proceedings to be detected by the official whom the Bill sets up—as the Bankruptcy Act sets up an official in Bankruptcy cases. I venture to say that if these clauses were omitted from the Bill, a most important check over these proceedings would be lost—a check which would be of advantage to the public and to the creditors and contributors of the company, and to everyone concerned. I should be happy to confer with my right hon. Friend (Sir J. Lubbock) as to the particular way in which the Bill may be improved on this point, but the effect of passing his Amendment would be to strike out of the Bill one of its most important provisions.

(7.20.) MR. MURDOCH (Reading): I hope the right hon. Gentleman will accept my right hon. Friend's offer.

SIR R. N. FOWLER (London): After the suggestion made by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, I hope the right hon. Gentleman opposite will not press his Amendment.

*(7.21.) SIR J. LUBBOCK: I should be sorry to put the House to the trouble of a Division, for in the absence of most of the mercantile Members of the House, it is evident I should have the majority against me, and I will content myself, therefore, with making a protest against the adoption of the clause.

Question put, and agreed to.

Other Amendments made.

*(7.31.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I may say it is my intention, in place of Rule 13 in Schedule 1, to insert the rule agreed to by the Standing Committee in reference to the Schedule of the Bankruptcy Bill. That Bill, for some reason or other, has not been printed, and I have not been able to get the exact words. I will, however, undertake that the Amendment shall be inserted in "another place." The same will be the case with regard to the rule as to special proxies.

Several verbal Amendments agreed to.

(7.34.) SIR H. DAVEY: In reference to the next Amendment I have on the Paper, I understand the right hon. Gentleman (Sir M. Hicks Beach) to have given us a promise that the Schedule shall be made to accord as regards proxies with the Schedule agreed to by the Committee upstairs with reference to the Bankruptcy Bill. I confess I should have liked to see that Schedule in print before we parted with this Bill, but, on the assurance of the Government,

I will not move my Amendment, and my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) has authorised me to say he will not move his.

(7.35.) MR. WARMINGTON (Monmouth, W.): I should like to know why the decision of the Committee on this Bill is to be overruled by the decision of the Standing Committee on the Bankruptcy Bill?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The fact is, that questions raised by the right hon. Gentleman opposite were not dealt with by the Committee on this Bill, and I do not think they were put forward as prominently before that Committee as before the Committee on the Bankruptcy Bill. Of course, there were Members of the Committee who, like the right hon. Gentleman the Member for London University (Sir J. Lubbock), wished to go further, and to insert an Amendment dealing generally with proxies. That was a proposal of so much importance, and calculated, in my opinion, to do so much harm, that I opposed it with all my power, and it was eventually negatived by the Committee. I do not propose in this Bill to go as far as that.

*(7.37.) SIR J. LUBBOCK: No doubt what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman is quite accurate, but I think the House ought perhaps to know that the Grand Committee was evenly balanced on the question of special proxies, and I believe we should have carried the Amendment, but that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade stated that if we succeeded in doing so he should be compelled to oppose the Bill in the future, whereupon one or two Members arose and said, while they sympathised with the Amendment, they would not take a course which would lead the right hon. Gentleman to oppose the Bill as a whole. In spite of this, the Committee was still divided equally, and the matter was only decided by the casting vote of the Chairman, who stated that he gave it so that the matter might be re-considered. I am not complaining in any way of the Government bringing the Bill on now, but it was not understood that the Bill would come on at the present time, and few of the mercantile Members are present. We shall, however, have the same question before us on Wednesday on the Bankruptcy Bill, and if the House assents to the passage of the Bill now, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to insert in the present Bill, in "another place," whatever words the House on Wednesday may introduce into the corresponding section of the Bankruptcy Bill.

*(7.40.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I quite accept what the right hon. Gentleman says, namely, that on Wednesday on the Bankruptcy Bill this matter may be fully discussed. Whatever decision the House may arrive at with regard to it, it certainly shall be embodied in the other Bill as well as in this.

(7.41.) MR. COZENS-HARDY (Norfolk, N.): I hope the right hon. Gentleman will allow the further consideration of the question to be adjourned until Wednesday.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: It could not be taken on Wednesday. It is essential, considering the character of this Bill, that it should as soon as possible go to another place.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK: I hope my hon. Friend will not press for an adjournment. It would serve no useful purpose to have two Debates on precisely the same question.

*(7.42.) MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): The difficulty might perhaps be met by allowing the Third Reading to stand over till Thursday.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I hope the House will read the Bill a third time to-day. I beg to move that.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Sir M. Hicks Beach.)

(7.43.) SIR H. DAVEY: I wish to take this opportunity of thanking the right hon. Gentleman for the very fair way in which he has received the suggestions of hon. Members for amending the Bill.

MR. WARMINGTON: I must protest against the Third Reading of this Bill being taken now. The Grand Committee on Trade spent a day and a half on the consideration of that which, without a word, has been excluded from this Bill, namely, Sub-section 2 of Section 10. That was represented to us as the most important part of the Bill, and yet, without a word, it has been cut out.

(7.44.) SIR R. WEBSTER: Some time was spent in discussing the sub-section; but as the consideration of the Bill occupied eight or 10 days, it was not anything like a substantial part of the time. It having been pointed out that the sub-section only provided a different remedy, and it being doubtful whether it would be prudent to enlarge the remedy under the existing section of the Companies Act, it was thought better to omit the sub-section than to jeopardise the Bill.

(7.45.) MR. W. P. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): Will the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade take care to see that we have on Monday a reprint of the Bankruptcy Bill? We have been placed in a very awkward position this evening for want of it.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I shall be delighted to forward that matter in any way in my power. Of course, it does not rest with me, but with those great authorities—the printers.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £258,400, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Salaries and Miscellaneous Charges of the War Office, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1891."

(7.47.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I want to say one or two words about the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War yesterday. I do not propose to speak except with extreme brevity, or to go into the Report of the Commission, presided over by the noble Marquess (Lord Hartington). I prefer, as this is an extremely practical matter, to apply myself to the practical business that is before the House, namely, that part of the Report that has been adopted by the Secretary of State and the alterations that have been proposed. As far as I can see, the right hon. Gentleman has proposed to make two very important alterations in the organisation of the War

Office, and I most gladly testify that they are both of them—one of them being very important—steps in the right direction. I have no desire to say anything on the subject of the abolition of the office of Commander-in-Chief or as to whether the office of that high functionary ought to be continued or not, because I understand that the Secretary of State has postponed the consideration of that question entirely on personal grounds, to which I need not refer; and the right hon. Gentleman has stated that when that question comes before the House, if the present Government are at that time in Office, he will then state what are the opinions of the Government with regard to the recommendations of the Commission. When that time arrives I shall express my opinion on the point, and it will be the same as that which I expressed 20 years ago, namely, that the appointment to the office of Commander-in-Chief should be for five years only. At present, however, I wish to express no opinion on the subject. The recommendations of the Secretary of State are three. In the first place, in obedience to the recommendations of the Commission, the right hon. Gentleman proposes to adopt the idea of having a Council of War within the Cabinet. I must say I very much prefer the practical proposal of the Secretary of State on this point to the proposal, as far as I can gather it, of the Commission. Every one who knows from actual experience, or can guess from analogy derived from outside, how matters are conducted in the Cabinet, must know that a Council of War must always exist in the Cabinet if war is in prospect or is being actually waged, and that in a well-ordered Cabinet that Council must consist of the high officials in charge of the Army, the Navy, and the colonies, and also of every other Cabinet Minister who has any special aptitude for the direction of military operations. I think it a matter of great importance that no one else should have a right to sit upon that Council and to advise the Cabinet. It would be a most unfortunate thing if military or naval men, however eminent, were to sit on the Council as a matter of right. The greatest military man of this century was not ashamed to always consider it the highest honour to be called upon to give his opinion to the Cabinet in reference to military matters. The most glorious war we were ever engaged in was carried on successfully under those conditions, when Lord Chatham used freely to ask for the opinions of eminent military men. If the Government intend to adopt a similar course, I think that they will be giving effect to just as much of the recommendation of the Commission on this point as they ought to do. I now come to deal with two other propositions which have been made by the right hon. Gentleman. First of all, he proposes to have a somewhat more systematised and authoritative Council of War. In this, and in other proposals, the right hon. Gentleman has paid a very great tribute to the manner in which the Admiralty has been governed for some generations continuously in this country, it having been governed under a system to which, I believe, we owe the admirable condition in which the British Navy has been maintained for a number of years, and the immense and almost continuous success it has enjoyed. That system requires that there shall be a certain number of eminent professional men, each of whom is responsible for some particular work at the Admiralty, who shall meet at certain stated times for the purpose of freely interchanging their ideas, and thus keep in touch and in mutual confidence with each other. That I understand to be exactly the proposal of the Government with regard to the suggested Council of War. I now come to the last of the suggestions of the right hon. Gentleman, which I believe to be of very vast importance. The very essence of a well-ordered Service is that promotion shall be properly regulated. It was in order to regain the right of regulating promotion in the Army that the country paid £7,000,000 sterling for the abolition of purchase. The question then was, What was the best system of promotion to adopt, so as to insure that our Forces were commanded by the best men? The system that has prevailed in the Admiralty is that the First Lord of the Admiralty is surrounded by three, four, or five experienced officers, who have served all over the world, and who have watched young men growing up around them, who no doubt have their protégés, but who, by consulting together and exchanging opinions, are prevented from giving too much advantage even to protégés. I am now about to say something which, perhaps, may be considered somewhat rude, but I find that Admiralty promotion is conducted in this way. I find that when a great number of promotions are going to be made the political and civil members of the Board are prepared with a certain number of names for promotion. Amongst those names are, I suppose, a number which were put upon the list from a feeling in favour of the relatives of those members of the Board. ["Oh!"] Let hon. Members permit me to finish my story before they cry "Oh." Then the Naval Lords of the Admiralty have each his own list of names for promotion. The whole body then consult together, and, in the end, the names are cut out of the list of all those who have not earned their promotion fairly and honourably by service. The result is that no inefficient person is promoted, and no efficient man is passed over for long. I believe from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman that he has endeavoured to provide a Board of that nature at the War Office. Such a Board already exists, but the right hon. Gentleman sees what immense issues will depend upon its decisions, and has determined that it shall be thoroughly efficient. He hopes its decisions will be authoritative, and, as far as possible, final. If the right hon. Gentleman makes his Board large enough and able enough, and, above all, if he takes care that neither he, nor any one else, shall correct the decisions of the Board, except upon evidence which is of immense importance, then I believe that the principle which General Trochu called the corner-stone of an army will be established in our own Army—namely, that the right man shall be in the right place.

*(8.0.) GENERAL SIR E. B. HAMLEY (Birkenhead): The chief value of this Report, and I estimate it very highly, is that, in view of a most important change that may occur at any time in the administration of the Army, it endeavours to provide a military system which shall be suited to the needs of the time. I need not remind the House that for generations we have been lamenting the cumbersome, inefficient character of our military system. It has never satisfied, or come near satisfying, the House, or the public, or the Army. There has never occurred a crisis in our military affairs without the exposure of a breakdown in our military system, most wasteful in men, money, and material. Now, for the first time since we have had a War Office we have had an opportunity offered to us by the Report of putting this right—of establishing a system which shall work well and put our military affairs on a sound basis. If we neglect this we shall deserve any military misfortune which may happen to us in the future, and I doubt not that all the evils we have so long laboured under will be perpetuated and intensified. Now, I do not pretend to think that the Report can be adopted as it stands. The Commission itself did not, I imagine, expect that. But it contains excellent materials on which a sound system may be established, and I will endeavour to point out in what particulars it may be accepted, and in what it may be advantageously modified. And I will deal mainly with the Report itself, for the departure from it which has been formulated in the statement of the Secretary for War, and which the Government reserves to itself to decide on, would leave out so essential a condition that, without it, the scheme will fall to pieces, and we shall have little left to consider or to found new schemes on. The most important proposals for reform in the Report are those which deal with the military part of the system, and its relation to the Parliamentary chief. Prominent among the defects of that part of the system is said to be the excessive accumulation of power and responsibility in a single official—the Commander-in-Chief—on whom, the Report says, the whole executive command, administration, and supply of the Army now devolves, besides the duties formerly those of the Surveyor General of the Ordnance. After detailing these duties, the Report draws attention to the immense range of subjects, all large and onerous, here brought together, and the extremely various ability which alone could deal with them. And it is not merely intellectual power; other qualities are needed—practical ability, experience, the faculty of keeping touch with the time; and also, in these days, when science has so much to do with war, when Von Moltke has shown us what effect a scientific chief can exercise, it is necessary that large and diverse military scientific knowledge should enter into the control of the Army. It is vain to expect to find all these qualifications united in one person. Therefore, supposing the recommendation of the Committee to take effect, and the work to be placed in the hands of several military officials, properly chosen, these functions would, by being divided and distributed, be infinitely better performed than is possible when they are concentrated in a single chief, even if he should possess the rarest acquisitions and endowments. Can it be doubted that this division of duties among several able men is a most essential step for those interests which we are engaged in considering—the interests of the Army and the country? But this is the very proposal which we learn may, perhaps, not be adopted. The Report proceeds to consider how the duties of administration should be re-assigned—

“On the occurrence of a vacancy in the office of a Commander-in-Chief or on any favourable opportunity.”

It proposes to create a chief of the staff, whose duties shall be to prepare plans of military operations, collect information, and advise on matters of organisation and the preparation of the Army for war. His Department is to include the present Intelligence Department, which deals with the collection of information and the defence of the Empire outside the United Kingdom, and such part of the Adjutant General's business as deals with the mobilisation of troops and the interior defence of the Kingdom. His Department will be, in fact, the culmination of the military system—the preparation of the Army for war, and the defence of the Kingdom and the Empire; what are these but the very end and object of all branches of military administration? and if they do not each and all bear their part in it they have no meaning whatever. Therefore, that such a Department should be formed and placed under a qualified officer is a matter of urgent necessity. That this officer should superintend the duty of collecting information, of preparing and revising general schemes of defence, and possible plans of action, and deal with questions of military policy, and make an annual Report of our military requirements—all these duties which are assigned to him in the Report may be regarded with complete approval. But there is another duty attributed to him, which is much more questionable—he is to advise the Secretary of State on all matters of general military policy, and other important questions. To this I venture altogether to demur, for this would place a single individual behind the Secretary of State, the one wire-puller, whom it would be very difficult to make amenable to public criticism; and, moreover, our military policy would be controlled to an unknown extent by the views and opinions of one particular person, whether they happened to be sound or unsound. Now, I venture to say that there is no sort of administration more open to objection than that which makes an official personage, like a civilian Secretary for War, responsible for measures which he admittedly does not possess the experience to enable him to devise for himself, and who depends on inspiration received from another person in the background. It is evident that this person in the background would possess more influence, and use it more freely, than if he stood forward as a recognised adviser, responsible not only to the Minister, but to the public, for his own counsels. The Army ought not to be governed from the background. This, then, would form a most serious objection. But, happily, the Report contains another provision which could be so applied as exactly to meet the difficulty. For it proposes that there should be a War Office Council presided over by the Secretary for War, the first military member of which is to be the Chief of the Staff; the other military members being the Adjutant General, the Quartermaster General, the Director of Artillery, and the Director of Fortifications. But these officers are the very persons who would form a Council exactly fitted to deal with the matters which are specially assigned to the Department of the Chief of the Staff. I would suggest, therefore, that it should be part of the duties of this Council to deal with those matters. The initiation of measures in his own Department would, of course, rest with the Chief of the Staff; and when he desired to bring forward a measure, it would be for him to describe it to the Council, to give them necessary information on which to form a judgment, and to set forth his own view of it. It would then be discussed, and the proceedings and opinions recorded. After that it would be perfectly right and expedient that the Chief of the Staff should, apart from the Council, give advice to the Secretary for War in the form of necessary explanation and comment, when, if his views were at variance with those already expressed in Council by others, reference might be made to these, or, in case of serious difference, the Council might again be brought together. In this way the Chief of the Staff would no longer be that most objectionable person, an adviser in the background, but would be the public and recognised adviser, as the chief military member of the Council and exponent of its views. Here, then, we should at last have what we have so long been vainly seeking—the means of giving to the Secretary for War the best military advice obtainable in the most responsible and unimpeachable form, always provided it were accompanied by one most essential modification, to which I will now advert, and which is in some measure anticipated by the decision of the Government—that promotion should be placed in the hands of a Board. Now, this proposal I would modify in two ways. I would propose to place the recommendation, not only for promotion, but also for appointments, honours, and rewards, in the hands of a Board of officers, who should be absolutely independent. And to insure their independence they should be beyond the sphere of favour, having nothing to hope for, nothing to apprehend. To that end they should be retired officers. They must also be men of well-known character for fairness, of considerable experience, and of recognised ability. I could, at this moment, name more than one retired officer who would be very generally recognised, in and out of the Service, as to be depended on as a member of such a Board. And I would ask the Committee to consider what an inestimable advantage it would be to the Army that its members should feel that their destinies were in the hands of such a body. How different this from having to submit to an irresponsible decree inspired by we do not know what! And what an advantage it would be to the nation that its military servants shall neither be pushed forward nor suppressed except for reasons not only avowable, but arrived at upon due impartial inquiry and in the face of the world! Now, I said that the future Adjutant General is to be a member of this War Office Council; the second military member. But this is the officer who, according to the Report, is to have the patronage of the Army. Does anyone suppose that, in that case, he would be the second military member? He would (if he so desired it, and were a self-assertive man) be the first—very far the first. But deprive him of the patronage by placing it under a Board, and he would fall into his proper place and exercise only that weight in Council which may fairly be due to his knowledge and ability. I now come to a passage in the Report, a very unobtrusive passage, easily escaping particular notice, which I view with great satisfaction, where it is said—

“That the proceedings and decisions of the War Office Council should be formally recorded.”

Recorded, and therefore, I presume, accessible, and capable of being subjected, if need be, to inquiry. Here, then, we should have a pledge that what I have so often ventured to descant upon as a necessity of the time would be accomplished—that our military business should not be transacted in secret conclave, but by persons known to all the world, and justly possessing confidence. Here, again, what an immense improvement this would be in our system! How often has the right hon. Gentleman, in laying some proposal before the House, told us that he did so after consulting his military advisers, and how often has the result left him but too much reason to doubt the wisdom of those mysterious oracles? But in dealing with the proposed Council, he would receive from his recognised advisers opinions not hasty, partial, or prejudiced, but matured and tested, and delivered under the sense that they will be recorded, and, if necessary, scrutinised. Under such conditions, the proposals which a Secretary for War may bring forward will be entitled to a degree of respect which can never attach to the secret inspirations of unknown advisers—

no, these can only awaken distrust. Now there is one point in the Report which does not seem to have been quite appreciated by the Commission, and which has received from them only a partial recognition. It is this—after measures shall have been finally decided on by the Secretary for War, with the advice of the Council, there must be an executive officer to put them in practice; and the question is, Who should he be? Should he be one of those who are members of the Council, or a separate officer? Now, it will be observed that a certain part of the executive duties is provided for in the Report. It proposes that there should be a “general officer commanding the forces in Great Britain,” who should perform the executive duties of the command and inspection of troops in Great Britain. But I know not why his functions should be thus limited. Why should not the functions of this officer be exactly commensurate with the functions of command which are now exercised by the Commander-in-Chief, extending so far as at present outside Great Britain, and including not only routine orders, but those necessary to give effect to measures newly decided on in the War Office Council? This would of itself form a large amount of business; it should not, therefore, I think, be given to an ordinary member of the Council, because it would be too great an addition to his duties, and because it would make him much too superior in importance to the rest. He should, therefore, be a separate functionary, and his title might be General Officer commanding the Forces. As he would be able to give valuable and necessary information to the Council, especially as to whether measures proposed by them would be feasible with the means at his disposal, he should be a member of the Council; but as he would represent no Department and ought not, in the absence of the President, to preside over those who did, he should be an extraordinary member, when his position would exactly correspond to that of the Commander-in-Chief in India on the Governor General's Council, to which Council, indeed, this that we are discussing would be in many respects analogous. I have now endeavoured to set before the Committee a broad and general scheme easy to understand, and which, I believe, would thoroughly answer our purpose. It will be seen that I have dealt only with that part of the Report relating to the division of the duties of Commander-in-Chief among various officers, and the formation of those officers into a Council to advise and assist the Secretary for War. It is said in some quarters that the Report has fallen flat on the public. It may be so; but why? Because it cannot be supposed that many members of the public or of this House are able to give the time or have the technical knowledge necessary to examine the mass of details in this Report or to arrive at an appreciation of its value. Now, I hope the present discussion will supply this knowledge, that it will cause the House and the people to understand thoroughly that we have come to a crisis in our military affairs, and how vitally important that crisis is. If the Government should seek to evade the true bearings of this great question, they will incur the gravest responsibility. I trust that the House and the country will resolutely take the matter in hand, thoroughly inquire into it, and press it to a right conclusion. If we neglect this, if we suffer this opportunity which has come to us so unexpectedly, out of the clouds as it were, to slip, then, whatever we may have to lament in military enterprises of the future, extravagant expenditure, failure of men and supplies, the collapse of our military establishments, or even graver disasters, and the consequent decline of England in the scale of nations—we shall have only ourselves to thank for it. (8.30.)

(9.0.) SIR E. REED (Cardiff): The object I have in view is to call attention to what appears to me to be a singular oversight in regard to the first recommendation contained in the preliminary Report of the Royal Commission. That Royal Commission, among other things, and, indeed, before any other thing, dealt with the question of the mutual relation and the co-operation of the Army and Navy. They state in several paragraphs that great deficiencies exist in that respect in our present system, and they point out that no combined plan of operations for the defence of the Empire in any given contingency has ever been worked out or decided upon by the two Departments. They state that there does not appear to exist sufficient provision for the consideration by either Service of the wants of the other, and, after making other statements of a similar character, they go on to speak of the remedy for this unsatisfactory and dangerous condition of affairs. Now, Sir, when it is found by a Member of this House, who feels some interest in, and some concern for, the well-being of the country that such a Commission as this—a Commission which the Minister for War last night extolled in the highest terms, and certainly did not extol too highly—I say that when such a Commission as this points out that this country is in an unsatisfactory and dangerous condition from the want of the means of co-operation between the Army and Navy, it is very natural that we should give our closest attention to the consequences to be anticipated from such a conclusion. After reviewing certain proposals which had been made before, and had been laid before the Commission for correcting this state of things, to which I will make no further reference at this moment, the Royal Commission go on to make one, and only one, important recommendation expressly designed to remedy the dangers they point out, and the remarkable thing about it is that when one reads paragraph 20 of the preliminary Report of the Commission, and then, in the light of that paragraph, listens to a speech such as that made by the Secretary for War last night, and the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow to-night, he will find the total absence of every indication of the nature of the recommendation of the Royal Commission being, to the last degree, understood or appreciated. In the first place, the Secretary for War passed over altogether the first half of paragraph 20, and took no account of it at all. I am bound to say that the right hon. Gentleman has a slight and shadowy justification for this course, because the Royal Commissioners themselves, although adverting to the grave question, spoke of it only as one which the Council recommend they ought to consider. The Secretary for War went on to deal with the second part of that paragraph, but only did so in part. He referred to the unsettled questions which exist between the different Departments of the War Office, and before I deal with the conclusion which the Government appear to have drawn on this subject and the decision they appear to have come to regarding this recommendation, I will refer to what the Royal Commission originally proposed. And I think the Committee will see that no kind of recognition has been given to what the Royal Commission did actually recommend. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton spoke of the Council within the Cabinet as if it were a Council of War, and he had no difficulty, as no one else would have, in suggesting that a Council of War of the highest class should be a Cabinet Council. But a Council of War was not at all contemplated, and certainly nothing was said about a Council of War, in the recommendations of the Royal Commission. They first speak of the constitution of the Council which they recommend. It is to be a Council presided over by the Prime Minister, and to consist of the Parliamentary heads of the two Services, with their professional advisers. They go on to state, and I do not consider it to be a very wise opinion, that in this Council might also be included one or two officers of great reputation and experience, who might not happen to hold official appointments either at the Admiralty or at the War Office for the time being. On that point I am bound to say I agree entirely with the Government in dropping that part of the recommendation. I think that, looking at the constitution of the great Services of the country, it would be a very doubtful thing indeed to import into a Council of this character outside persons, not holding office, and therefore not bearing the responsibility which rests on public officers. But, leaving out of consideration these outside persons, and taking the Council as being constituted, the Committee will observe that the Council proposed by the Royal Commission is eminently adapted for the purposes to which it is proposed it should be applied. Now, what are these purposes? They are first that of reviewing the naval and military Estimates of the year, examining and ascertaining whether the proper relations exist between the Estimates of the two Departments with a view to the efficient service of the coming year, and advising the Government upon these Estimates before they go to the Cabinet. This is obviously a piece of work lying wholly below the level of Cabinet work. The next thing the Council is to do is to consider and authoritatively decide unsettled questions between the two Departments. Its third duty would be to decide as to any matters of joint naval and military policy. It must be obvious to the Committee that not one of these objects has anything whatever to do with the work of the Cabinet, except in a very subordinate manner. The object is to get both the Ministers of the Army and Navy, with their professional heads of Departments, to come together, and consider whether the proposed Estimates for the year have due regard to the relations between the two Departments, and to deal with any unsettled questions in connection with them; also to consider any questions of general or joint policy which might require to be dealt with. That is the recommendation of the Royal Commission, and I am bound to say that to me it seems to be a very wise recommendation indeed, and one which, if adopted by the Government, would lead to great public good. At present this House when in Committee of Supply has no guarantee that sufficient care has been taken to suitably distribute the expenditure as between the Army and Navy. The manifest object of the Commission was that before the Estimates went up to the Cabinet and the Government became committed to them, not only the two Ministers, but their chief professional advisers, should meet together to make suggestions, leaving, of course, untouched the responsibility of the two Ministers themselves, and not at all compromising or interfering with the Cabinet authority, because those Estimates are not to be sent to the Cabinet until after the proposed consultation and revision has taken place. Well, Sir, how do the Government deal with this proposal? I do not know what my right hon. Friends on this Bench may think about the matter, and of course the Committee will perfectly understand that anything I may say on the subject is said purely on my own personal responsibility, and that I have no authority whatever to speak on behalf of my friends on this Bench. I claim, however, the right of one who is deeply interested in the Public Service of the country to consider what effect the Government have given to this wise and valuable recommendation. In the first place, the Secretary for War has dropped out of consideration the primary question of the revision of the Estimates before sending them to the Government. Having done that he went on to say that with regard to the other questions, namely, the unsettled questions remaining as between the two Departments and also the question of joint policy, he did not think the Royal Commission had taken a sufficiently broad ground. He said that upon such a Council the Colonial Office, the India Office, and the Foreign Office might have to be represented, and because, under certain contingencies and for certain purposes, all those Departments might have to be represented on the Council, he threw overboard altogether the recommendation of the Commission concerning the bringing together of these two great Departments. The right hon. Gentleman did not say in explicit terms, but he implied it, that as far as the Government were concerned they would take no steps even on the advice of this friendly Commission to bring the Army and Navy into closer relations, unless in a method which will bring the Colonial, the India, and the Foreign Office into consort with them. I know not what may be thought by others on this point, but the position taken up by the Secretary for War seems to me to strike a fatal blow to the Council recommended by the Royal Commission under head A of their Report. At this point I would refer to what the Royal Commission say their object was—to remedy what they regarded as an unsatisfactory and dangerous condition of affairs. To remedy this unsatisfactory condition of affairs, they say that the Army and Navy should be brought closer together. The Government say now that the Army and Navy shall not be brought closer together. The Secretary for War does not deny the dangerous state of things, and, therefore, admitting that they exist, he says no remedy shall be applied by the closer bringing together of the Army and Navy. Look at the next step the Government take. They say—"Well, but if we have the Admiralty, the War, Colonial, Foreign, and India Offices represented on the Council, everyone of those Departments is already represented in the Cabinet, and all you have got to do is to put the Prime Minister in the chair, to remove the other Cabinet Ministers around him, and there you have the Council of the Royal Commission." That was the position assumed by the Secretary of State last night. It seems to me to distinctly overthrow the recommendation of the Royal Commission, that before the Estimates reach the Cabinet they shall be considered by professional officers of both the Army and Navy. If the Committee will consider what the proposal of the Government really means, they will see that it amounts to this. The Royal Commission recommended that these Estimates of the Services should be revised by a Council consisting of the First Lord of the Admiralty and the Secretary for War, and a Board which could consider questions between the Departments. That recommendation is thrown over, and a Committee of the Cabinet is chosen. Does it not come to this. You appoint a Royal Commission of the greatest authority. That Commission, among other questions, goes with the greatest fulness into the question of whether the Army and the Navy are sufficiently brought together for the safety of the country. That

Royal Commission decides that for want of proper concert between the two Services the condition of affairs is unsatisfactory and dangerous. And they recommend the appointment of a Council, far different from a Committee of the Cabinet, which shall perform preliminary investigations before going to the Cabinet. The Government say: "No, you must take a few Members of the Cabinet and put them out of the door, and leave the rest to consider the matter." That is the outcome of the Government proposal. I ask the Secretary for War to say in what respect I misrepresent the case. In my humble opinion, it is a most unsatisfactory conclusion to the labours of the Royal Commission. I hope it will not be supposed for a single moment that I object to a Committee of the Cabinet taking into their consideration these naval and military matters. But I object to the positive recommendation of the Royal Commission being set aside and spoiled, and having substituted for it a proposal of very small value. How can it be suggested for a single moment that a Committee of the Cabinet can perform the work contemplated by the Royal Commission, and as set forth in paragraph 20 of the preliminary Report? Is it possible for such a Committee to ascertain, before sending the Estimates to the Cabinet, whether a proper relation has been set up between the charges for the Naval and Military Services of the country for the ensuing year? It is preposterous to suppose that a Committee of the Cabinet could go into that question in the manner contemplated by the Royal Commission. I think Members will agree that the recommendation of the Commission, if adopted, would have rendered services to the country which cannot be rendered by a Committee of the Cabinet. Valuable services will be rendered by that Committee, no doubt; but I think the country will be disposed to ask, "Is it true that there is an unsatisfactory and dangerous condition of affairs arising from the neglect of work which a Cabinet Committee could have done?" That is the inference to be drawn. I do not know why the Cabinet should suggest such a proposition as that. I do not believe there is any truth in the statement that the Cabinet have neglected their work. But what I believe is that there is a want of proper concert between the Army and the Navy; it must be due to the fact that the heads of the Departments, and the Ministers themselves have not been sufficiently brought together. The Commission say—

“There does not appear to us to exist sufficient provision for the consideration by either Service of the wants of the other.”

How are the Government going to meet that want? By adding to the Secretary of State for War and the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Colonial, Indian, and Foreign Ministers. How are they going to perform this operation? Why, Sir, they cannot touch this operation. They have no means of doing it. It is only by bringing professional heads and officers of the Services and Ministers into communication that the object can be accomplished. It appears to me as a technical man—I hope the Committee will forgive me if I speak somewhat in that capacity—that, owing to the enormous transformation in the Naval and Military Services due to the progress of mechanics and military engineering, you require co-operation not only between Ministers, heads of Departments, and officers of the Services, but between the Fleets and the Army. It is the idlest thing in the world for a set of politicians and officers to say, “We are so closely possessed of all the information that is necessary to regulate the Fleets and Army in these days that we do not want the advice and assistance of any engineer. We can do it off our own bat.” That absurdity is one degree less than the absurdity of supposing that the Government could perform the operation which the Royal Commission desires to be discharged by a Council. I believe that paragraph 20 contains recommendations of the greatest value to the State, and that it has been completely ignored by the Government, who have substituted a proposal which is not in any satisfactory degree qualified to remove the unsatisfactory and dangerous state of things referred to by a most powerful Royal Commission. The Government have set at naught that recommendation. They have thrown aside the sole practical suggestion of the Royal Commission, which was designed to remedy this dangerous state of things.

(9.31.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): A very definite recommendation has been made by the Royal Commission—and I may say that the Commission itself was a very important one, having upon it either three or four ex-Secretaries for War. The recommendation to which I refer was that there should be a Council, which should be composed of heads of Departments, and one or two leading Generals and Admirals. Such a Council would be of the greatest value, as I think it would lead to a healthy competition between the Admiralty and the War Office for money, which would mean efficient Estimates. For instance, if the Military Departments were spending too much money, the Naval Departments would take note of it, and draw attention to it, in the hope of getting some of the money for the Navy, and vice versa. I think that suggestion an excellent one, and it could not but be extremely useful to have the heads of the various branches of both Services meeting together under proper control. But what is the proposal of Lord Salisbury and Her Majesty's Cabinet? It is a proposition which, if carried out, would effect an innovation in the Constitution. It should be borne in mind that such a Committee of the Cabinet as is proposed, can at present be appointed at the will of the Prime Minister, and I do not see that it is the business of the House of Commons, or of the public, to interfere with the matter in any way. As to the selection of the Departments to serve on the Committee, I do not think it is a very happy one. No doubt the Secretary for War and the First Lord of the Admiralty should be on such Committee. The Prime Minister should be on it, and, at the present moment, if you have the Prime Minister on a Committee, you cannot exclude from that Committee the Foreign Secretary. But it seems to me that the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and the Secretary of State for India, have only a very indirect interest in the matter. The Secretary for India is directed by the Military Authorities in India. He would only appear in the Cabinet Committee as the Representative of the Commander-in-Chief in India, and would be unable to bring technical knowledge to bear on any subject under discussion. The same thing might be said in regard to the Secretary for the Colonies. The colonies of Australia, in case of necessity, would only be able to put some 3,000 or 4,000 men in the field, so that their military resources would hardly be sufficient to entitle the colonies to be represented on the Committee. It is a great change in the Constitution which is proposed. As the matter at present stands, every Member of the Cabinet is responsible for advising Her Majesty on subjects which are made Cabinet matters.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I said most distinctly that the proposal of the Government was that the new arrangement should not take effect until it had been discussed by the Cabinet as a whole.

COLONEL NOLAN: Yes, but I would point out that if a Committee of the Cabinet is appointed, and a disaster occurs, Ministers will be relieved from the responsibility which they have hitherto borne. It certainly seems to me desirable to make the whole Cabinet responsible for any important step which may have to be taken, but the appointment of the Committee suggested by the Government will have an opposite effect. I will now pass on to my second point. Last night the Secretary of War made two proposals. One of them was that a Board of Officers should be appointed to regulate promotion in the Army. On the whole, I think that is an absolutely inevitable step since the country departed from the system of purchase.

Colonel Nolan

It becomes necessary that there should be some power of selection. The responsibility of making promotions is at present too heavy for those who have to bear it. The responsibility is too great to be in the hands of one man. The hon. Member for Birkenhead found fault with the constitution of the proposed Board, and suggested that it should be reinforced by having upon it some General Officers not associated with the War Office. That is, no doubt, a good suggestion. I do not say that all General Officers will be free from jobbery, but any Board which you may appoint will have to be closely watched by the House of Commons. Valuable and important appointments will have to be made, and every influence which London contains—Court, social, and political—will be brought to bear on those exercising patronage. The Board of Promotion, therefore, will have to be very narrowly watched. It would not do for a Minister, in defending the action of the Board, to get up and say, "Oh! but the Board has been appointed by the House of Commons." There is always an amount of influence brought to bear on these selections, and always a certain amount of jobbery, watch the matter as closely as you can. It will be the duty of the House to see that we get full value for our money. As this country gets more and more Democratic, we find that Conservative Members become more and more anxious to secure the control of the Army. They desire to have that control exclusively in the hands of the upper classes; therefore, it will be necessary to see that the Board is fairly constituted, and is not likely to go in favour of one particular class. I think care should be taken that no officer should be passed over by the Board without the reasons for passing him over being set forth. There is no use in getting the old stereotyped declaration that you do not wish to hurt the feelings of officers. The Board will have power to pass over officers, and if we be satisfied to give a Board such power, I certainly think that the grounds on which a man is passed over should be stated. The right hon. Gentleman has not stated how the Board of Promotion is to act.

Under the new rules the number of Generals is to be very greatly reduced, and in a very few years there will be very few more Generals than there are appointments in the Army. Is the Board to promote Generals to such a position that it will be inevitable that they will have a command in the field? The way in which Generals are appointed in the field is this: The Secretary for War is responsible for the appointment of command of an expedition or a force, and he appoints the Generals of Divisions on the recommendation of the Commander-in-Chief. Of course, this is a matter of the very greatest constitutional and political significance. At present the Secretary for War and the Cabinet bear responsibility for the success or failure of an expedition or a war. If, however, the Secretary for War is able to throw the onus of the choice of officers on any Board of Promotion, or on anyone else not responsible to the House of Commons, he will be able to say that the failure of an expedition is no fault of his. In my opinion, everything should be done by this country to prevent a minority entering into a great war without being ready to take the responsibility for it.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: There is no question that the Secretary of State will continue to have full responsibility.

COLONEL NOLAN: Then I understand that in the event of a campaign the choice of the General Officers will be left unaffected by any direct action on the part of the new authority. But what the right hon. Gentleman says does not altogether invalidate my argument, except as far as the Commanding General is concerned. With regard to the officers commanding divisions the Board of Promotion will have selected them, so that the choice of the Secretary for War will be considerably circumscribed, and, in the event of failure, he will be able to say, "There were only a certain number of Generals I could select from, and, consequently, I had very little choice." I do not find fault with the right hon. Gentleman, but I think the whole of the matter should be laid before the House of Commons before we sanction it. I have only to say a few words as to what the Government have not done. It seems to me they have not attempted to face the principal question that was laid before the Royal Commission, and on which the Commission reported. That question was how the Army should be managed after the present Commander-in-Chief ceased to hold the office. The Duke of Cambridge has created a position for himself—not perhaps a constitutional one. He has paid a considerable amount of respect for the House of Commons. It would be an extremely dangerous thing to put any man we do not thoroughly know, who may be a good General, but a man who may not have sufficient respect for the institutions of the country, in the position of Commander-in-Chief. I think it would be far better to confine that position as proposed by the Royal Commission. It would be well to follow the precedent of Continental countries, and have a Chief of the Staff. The Chief of the Staff would regulate the Staff and superintend the Intelligence Department; but the Government have entirely failed to pay any attention to this part of the Report of the Royal Commission. By having a Chief of the Staff to take charge of the Staff and Intelligence Department, by having a Board of Promotion, and an Adjutant General to attend to the Manufacturing Departments, you would cut up and divide the duties which are at present discharged by the Commander-in-Chief, and for which he is more or less nominally responsible. It is quite impossible to make the Commander-in-Chief responsible for all practical details. Again, there is a political aspect to the question. It is a most unconstitutional thing to have any man, unless he is absolutely the Sovereign, or next to the Sovereign—the Prince of Wales—Commander-in-Chief for 25 years. I am sorry to have trespassed so long on the time of the Committee; my only excuse for doing so is that the question is one of vast constitutional and military importance.

(10.3.) GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith): I must congratulate the Government on adopting the course they have, but I hope they will go a little further still for the good of the country in promoting harmonious action between the two Services. I do not agree with the proposal that the office of Commander-in-Chief should be abolished, but I think it should be relieved of many duties which now attach to it. It is impossible for any one man to perform the duties required to be discharged by the Commander-in-Chief. With reference to the Board of Promotion, let me say it will be very necessary to exercise great care in the selection of officers who are to form the Board. The whole future of every man in the Army will depend upon the recommendations of the Board, and everything must be done to prevent injustice being done. There are immense numbers of officers in the Army; many are serving in India, Canada, and elsewhere, and it is possible to conceive that these men will be unknown to the members of the Board, and, therefore, will have their claims to promotion overlooked. I hope the Secretary for War will pay particular attention to the recommendations of the Royal Commission with reference to the Ordnance Department, for that is one of the most important matters to be dealt with. It is important to the Army and Navy alike, and nothing will more contribute to the efficiency and confidence of both than full and careful attention in this direction.

*(10.9.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): Perhaps the Committee will allow me, as a member of the Royal Commission, to say a few words on this question. I do not desire to go over the whole ground of the question, but I cannot help expressing some regret that the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) has not been in the House during the Debate. The noble Lord has recently developed a faculty of being absent when he is expected to be present, though on some occasions when he is present in the country he does not appear to be present with much good effect. His Memorandum, which is included in the Report of the Royal Commission, has attracted attention no less than the more elaborate provisions contained in the Report, and I, for one, should have been very glad if the noble Lord had been here to explain his scheme and hear the reasons which some of us have for dissenting from it. Failing that, we have to deal with the steps which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War has stated the Government propose to take in the matter. The first point I will refer to is the important question of a Naval and Military Council proposed in paragraph 20 of the Report. I signed the Report, but I am bound in frankness to tell the Committee that I should have appended to my signature an expression of dissent in respect to this particular paragraph if it had not been that my attention was called to the exceedingly vague and indefinite way in which the recommendations of the paragraph are put. If the Committee will look at the Report they will see that, after rehearsing at some length what the Royal Commission found to be the want of harmony between the two Departments and the evils which may result from it, it proceeds, not in paragraph 20, but in paragraph 19, to disclose the remedy which the Commissioners propose for that want of harmony. Paragraph 19 says—

“ We think that means might be devised for bringing about more regular and constant communications between the Admiralty and the War Office. These might be found in Departmental changes, the nature of which we shall hereafter indicate, which might provide for very constant communication and consultation between two highly-placed responsible naval and military officers on all questions where common action and preparation on the part of the Departments is required.”

Now, that appears to me to cover the whole ground, and the subsequent recommendation referred to consists in the suggestion that the First Naval Lord at the Admiralty should have the duty imposed on him of communicating with the War Office on all occasions where the interests and duties of the two Departments overlap, and that, correspondingly, the Chief of the Staff at the War Office should perform the same duty with respect to the Admiralty. And then, as it were by an afterthought, and as a subsidiary and almost superfluous suggestion, the Commission go on in paragraph 20 to say :—"There might be some advantage in the formation of a Naval and Military Council," and that in this Council might be included one or two officers of great reputation and experience, and so forth. The very conditional tone and mood in which this recommendation is expressed conveys my frame of mind towards it. I am no believer in the establishment of any such Council if it is in any respect to supersede or interfere with the direct responsibility either of the Minister or of the Cabinet. I am altogether opposed to the introduction of outsiders. It is no doubt suggested that certain Generals and Admirals of distinction and experience should be added to the Council to assist in its deliberations. I entirely object to put in so important a position officers, however distinguished, who have no direct or recognised responsibility in administration. Let the responsible officers of the two Departments, who ought to be the best that can be secured, give their advice, and let that advice be acted upon, modified, or rejected by the Minister responsible for it, but do not expose them to have their views set aside or their decisions overruled by an amateur Council composed of men who may themselves have no direct knowledge of the facts, and, at all events, will not have the responsibility of carrying into action the decisions which may be arrived at. I am, therefore, glad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman that the Council which he proposes is practically to be little more than a Committee of the Cabinet. But if merely a Committee of the Cabinet, we could have had that without all this trouble about it. On the point of want of harmony between the two Departments, I am one of those who think that it has, after all, been greatly exaggerated, and I believe that most of those instances of friction of which we heard could have been overcome by a little goodwill on the part of the two Departments respectively. We all know that the two Departments overlap and intertwine to a very great extent. Take the case of a maritime fort. The construction and maintenance of it, the manning and supply of guns for it, would seem to belong exclusively to the War Office, and yet, as a part of the defence of the fortress, they run very closely into the question of Naval support and submarine mines and torpedo vessels, and so forth. The limits of responsibility are thus difficult to define. It is no wonder, therefore, and no ground of blame to either of the two Departments, that there may have been misunderstanding or difficulty in coming to a unanimous conclusion on points affecting such a case as this, and I speak after considerable experience of both Departments. As to the second point, the Board of Promotion, if I remember rightly, there has been a Board of Promotion at the War Office for some years; but I am opposed to any Promotion Board which will be formed by the nomination of individual officers for that special purpose. I quite admit there ought to be placed on such a Board officers totally unconnected with the War Office itself and with the Headquarters Staff of the Army, but this should be done by making a place upon that Board the appanage of some high position of command in the country, and we should thus secure that it will not be the individual who will be appointed, but the occupant of a particular post. In that way we should escape the danger of some personal appointment which would be objected to; and if such a Board is made large enough so that it may include officers of varied experience, I believe it will be a great source of strength to the responsible officers at the head of the Army who are responsible for promotion. But I would not go so far as to make the recommendations of this Board supersede the responsibility of the officers at the head of the Army and the Secretary of State. Then I come to the third step, and that is the establishment of a War Office Council. The principle which the Royal Commission proposes both for the Admiralty and the War Office is identical. In the first place, they recommend the recognition of the absolute responsibility of the Minister who at once represents the Department in Parliament, and Parliament in the Department. It is too often forgotten what the form of Government under which we live really is. We live under a Parliamentary form of Government. Every Department of the State is governed in the same manner, and it implies that the Representative Chamber shall have the real governing power. We are told very often that a civilian Minister, selected because of some supposed Parliamentary pre-eminence which he has gained, can know nothing of the Army or the Navy, and therefore must be an incompetent Minister. I deny that altogether. That is not the principle upon which the whole of our Government is founded. An Indian Minister may never have been in India; an Education Minister may never have been an Inspector of Schools. Every Minister may be ignorant of the technical details of the Department he administers, but he is presumed to have capacity for administration and public experience, and he knows, or ought to know, represents, or ought to represent, the tone of thought and feeling on the subject of his Department of those whom this House represents, namely, the body of the people for whose benefit the Public Services really exist. One of the great objections I should have urged to the scheme of the Member for Paddington, if he had been here, is that it failed to recognise this principle, because it reduced the Minister of State to a mere financial Minister who was to be responsible for the Estimates, and for the making of good bargains in the purchase of material, and for the proper auditing of the accounts. If we insist with pertinacity on the exclusive right of this House to control finance, it is in order that, through the medium and by the instrument of finance, we control policy. I hold that it is constitutionally necessary, especially in the present day, when some strange theories are afloat, to assert the absolute necessity of Parliamentary control over each of those two great Departments of the State. The next recommendation the Commission makes is this: that the Minister should have the assistance of competent professional officers, each responsible directly to him for his own department of duty, but all available on equal terms for consultation and information. Now, I am afraid such a Council as the right hon. Gentleman has described does not, in the least, fulfil this condition. I do not speak of the Admiralty just now, as that Vote is not before the Committee; but as to the War Office, if I were to express in plain terms my opinion of the present organisation of Army administration, I would say that the hierarchy of officers at the head of the Army is arranged perpendicularly, whereas it ought to be arranged horizontally. Every matter requiring decision, every suggestion or idea originated among the capable military officers on the Headquarters Staff, has to pass upwards from grade to grade, and to pass through the Adjutant General and Commander-in-Chief before it reaches the Secretary of State. The consequence is waste of time, circumlocution, a discouragement of independent initiative, and a slackening of the sense of direct responsibility. There is another evil which, if it does not actually exist, is always threatening to occur at any particular time, the tendency towards that which is certainly the least conducive to the harmonious working of the administration of the Army, namely, that the officer who is nominally responsible for particular matters to the Commander-in-Chief is passed over, and that advice is offered by or sought from subordinate officers without the official knowledge of the head of the Army, and in a more or less irregular way, I believe that no more certain cause of friction and loose administration can exist than this. I make no assertion that it exists now, but the right hon. Gentleman will admit that there is a standing danger of it, and tendency to it. I think that is one of the most grave reasons for change. But the main fact is that the affairs of the Army are much too complicated and diffused in area to be treated in this way—namely, by forcing any idea up through this long channel before it reaches the Minister whose duty it is to consider it. A more natural and wholesome mode of proceeding would be for the administration of the Army to be concentrated into large departments, the high military heads of which, being equal, would form a consultative council, whose advice should be sought by the Secretary of State. Of course, that suggestion involves the abolition of the office of Commander-in-Chief, at least in its present supreme and centralised form, a step upon which Her Majesty's Government gives no decision, and which no one would propose to take as long as the present Commander-in-Chief holds that office. I trust that there will be no misapprehension on this matter, but the subject is of such huge and enormous importance to the country that every one who is called upon to discuss this question is bound to express his opinion freely and frankly and without reserve, and to put aside altogether all personal considerations. We are bound to look at the matter from a purely impersonal point of view. I re-echo all that has been said by the Secretary of State with regard to His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, whose claims upon the gratitude of the Army and of the country are so great, and whose public services during the last 30 years have been so conspicuous, that surely in any recommendation which may be made we need not be afraid of being accused or misunderstood as casting any slight upon him. I agree with the Secretary of State in saying that precisely in the proportion as persons have had an opportunity of intimately observing the way in which the Duke of Cambridge has discharged the duties of his high office, must be their appreciation and admiration of his unequalled knowledge of all the affairs of the Army, the untiring energy he has displayed, and his devoted attachment to the Service of which he is the head. But this is not a question of persons, but of system, and I am satisfied that until we adopt what I have called the horizontal instead of the perpendicular arrangement of duties and responsibilities, we shall not obtain the advantage of a frank and independent expression of opinion given to the Secretary of State by those who have a full and direct sense of responsibility, not only to him, but to the country for the opinion which they give. Up to this point I go with my Colleagues on the Royal Commission; but here, I am sorry to say, I part company with them, because they have proposed to set up in the place of the Commander-in-Chief a Chief of the Staff; a proposal which, if adopted, would really re-produce all the evils of the present system without any corresponding advantages that I can see. If you create a Chief of the Staff, who is to be the intimate adviser, above all his colleagues, of the Secretary of State, you will destroy that sense of equality which is absolutely essential to a free and loyal expression of opinion. I also attach great importance to the condition that whoever advises the Secretary of State should himself be daily concerned in the administration of the Army. If a Chief of the Staff were to be appointed he would remain shut up in his room by himself, and he would feel bound to justify his existence by inventing magnificent schemes, which, most probably, would do more harm than good to the country. Therefore a Chief of the Staff would be not only superfluous, but absolutely mischievous and dangerous to the State. If we are not to have a Council of officers of equal position, such as I have advocated, if there is to be one officer above all the others who is to be the confidential adviser of the Secretary of State—then let him be the Commander-in-Chief, and if we retain the Commander-in-Chief let us relieve him from some part of his duties involving the consideration of details, and let the condition of the appointment be that it is for five years only. I believe that a great and serious evil to the administration of the Army arises from the knowledge that the power of promotion and of patronage in the Army is vested in the Commander-in-Chief, and that he is the permanent fountain of honour, and that, therefore, it is thought, wrongly but naturally, that the best way to obtain advancement is to seek his friendship. I believe that a great change for the better in the efficiency of the administration of the Army would be brought about by the knowledge that the Commander-in-Chief only held his office for a term of five years. Though for special reasons he might be appointed for another term of five years, there would be no permanent appointment. If these conditions are attached to it, I greatly prefer the retention of the office of Commander-in-Chief to the creation of a Chief of the Staff. I have thought it right to give these explanations of the sense in which I agree with the recommendations of the Commission, and in that sense I hope that those recommendations will ultimately, if not immediately, be adopted by the right hon. Gentleman.

*(10.40.) MR. E. STANHOPE: I think it will be convenient, after the various speeches we have had, to take this opportunity of replying to some of the points raised in the course of this discussion. In the first place, I should like to say that upon the whole I am very glad to hear the generally favourable reception that the proposal of the Government for the constitution of a Naval and Military Council has received. I think that the proposal is one that is desirable in the interest of the Empire. With reference to the deliberations of the Committee of the Cabinet, we desire that any decision come to shall be placed on permanent record, and in a form in which it may be presented to any Government that may follow us. Other speakers who have addressed the House to-night take a wholly inadequate view of the objects of the Council. I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman opposite that the main function of the Council will not be to reconcile the differences that exist between the Army and Navy. That there are differences I admit, but it will not be the main object of the Council to reconcile them. There are many questions connected with the defence of this great Empire in connection with which, after their full consideration by the Departments, the Council could promote common action. The hon. Member for Cardiff expressed a strong opinion that professional advisers should be present at the deliberations of the Council. I have had a good deal to do with technical advisers in other walks of life, and my conclusion is that they are the worst judges, but the best witnesses, and the Council, desiring to do its duty and to lay down the best course of action, would call before it the best technical advice it could get, and would then arrive at the best conclusion it could form as to the line of action to be taken.

SIR E. REED: I never suggested that technical advisers should attend a meeting of the Cabinet Council, but I did suggest that they should take part in deliberations on a level with the heads of Departments.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: For my own part I think it very desirable that the Council itself should be on the highest level. If the defence of the country is to be authoritatively laid down it ought to be laid down by the highest authorities, who are responsible to the country. Of course, I entirely accept what the right hon. Gentleman said—that it is not intended for a moment by the appointment of a Promotion Board to divest the Secretary of State of his responsibility. He is absolutely responsible, both in time of war and in time of peace, and no Board ought to be allowed to divest him of that responsibility. The right hon. Gentleman argued that the Council ought to be worked upon a lateral rather than a vertical system; and in the Council I am establishing that principle is, in many respects, carried out. Every one in the Council has an equal right of bringing forward questions for discussion, and of discussing them in the Council. Having had the discussion, it remains for the Secretary of State to form his decision as to the action to be taken. I cannot help thinking the right hon. Gentleman leaves out of view what is one of the main considerations in this matter. I am going to say a thing which may seem rather severe. My experience of the War Office includes a time when, in consequence of there being no one Military Authority able to harmonise all Parties, the result was chaos. We know well that we had defences put up without the smallest reference to the garrisons who were to man them, and without the consideration of many other essential questions. There ought to be some Military Authority responsible to the country, taking care that all these branches of defence are considered at the same time, so that when this House believes that a particular fortress is going to be put in a perfect state of defence they will know that not only the works and the guns but also the garrison have been thought of, and they will know that the construction and armament of the fortress are part of a well-considered plan. This was what was desired and aimed at by the noble Lord and his Colleagues. I am not going to discuss their proposal now. The Government have decided to put it aside for more careful and complete consideration. I will only say that in my time I have felt the want of one military head. At the present time there is first of all the Commander-in-Chief, who is responsible to me and to the country for seeing that all branches of defence are adequately looked after. There is also the chief Staff officer, the Adjutant General, who, under him, is responsible for all military branches. I do not say that the new scheme is at all perfect, but I do claim that it is a great improvement upon any system which preceded it. I am quite sure that if the right hon. Gentleman were to consult Military Authorities he would find that, in their opinion, considerable advantage has been gained from the fact that all the branches of defence have been brought completely and entirely under the consideration of Military Authorities. Other points it is not necessary for me to go into tonight. I would only now suggest that, as there is no substantial difference of opinion as to the steps the Government propose to take with regard to the organisation of the War Office, we might be allowed to proceed to the discussion of one or two special questions with regard to which Notices of Motion have been given.

(10.50.) THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON (Lancashire, Rossendale): It may, perhaps, be desirable before the discussion concludes that I should say a few words as Chairman of the Commission whose Report has formed the subject of this discussion. On the whole, I have no reason to complain of the reception which has been given to the Report of the Commission, either by the Government or by hon. Members who have discussed it. It is quite true, as was said yesterday by the Secretary of State, we have touched upon, without deciding, several questions which go to the root of military organisation. We have recommended some important, extensive, and far-reaching changes, and it is true that very few of these recommendations have been adopted in their entirety by the Government. I quite admit that the more important and far-reaching the changes are that are suggested, the more necessary it is that they should receive full and ample consideration before they are finally decided upon. I should be sorry, indeed, if the present Government, or any Government, were to accept the recommendations contained in that Report as in any degree absolving them from the duty of considering for themselves all the questions of organisation, and if they treated our recommendations as forming a plan which they might safely adopt throughout. Looking at the composition of the Commission, and at the very small military element it contained, it was thought desirable that we should abstain, as far as possible, from proposing anything in the nature of a plan, and that we should confine ourselves, if we could, to the laying down of certain principles which we thought ought to be kept in view in any re-organisation. But as we proceeded we found that it was impossible for us to adopt that method. The mere enunciation of general principles unaccompanied by something in the nature of definite recommendations, even if those recommendations were only for the purpose of illustration, would, I think, have been scarcely intelligible. We have, therefore, endeavoured to bring before the Government and Parliament a sketch of War Office administration as it exists now, to point out what we consider to be defects of principle in that administration, and to sketch what, in our judgment, might be a scheme of War Department organisation if founded upon sounder principle. It did not occur to us in the limited time at our disposal, and especially considering the military element in the composition of the Commission, that we were capable of producing a scheme which this or any Government could adopt without more consideration than it was possible for us to give. We have also been assured, in the course of our inquiry, that very considerable progress is being made in solving a good many practical questions. I quite admit that the adoption of many of the recommendations we have made would lead to a considerable amount of temporary dislocation and disorganisation. If it be the case that progress is being made in work of a practical character at the War Office, I should consider it would be a very great misfortune that that practical work should be interrupted by a desire to place the administration of the Office upon a more perfect footing theoretically. What I consider to be the value of the discussion on the subject by the Royal Commission is this: It is not reasonable to suppose that the administration of the War Office under the present Commander-in-Chief can continue for an indefinite period, and some changes will probably have to be made shortly. I do not think any one would say that when the office is vacated it will be possible or desirable to appoint a successor to the actual position the present Commander-in-Chief occupies. Therefore, it is desirable that the subject should undergo thorough examination, in order that the Government may be in a position to say what the future organisation of the Office should be when the time comes to effect some considerable alteration. There has been a good deal of discussion of our recommendation as to the appointment of a Naval and Military Council. The Secretary of State has informed us of the steps he has taken in the direction of that suggestion. Certainly I admit that the recommendation of the Commission has not been adopted by the Government, and their proposal is open to the criticism which has been made upon it—that the proposed Naval and Military Council is to be little more than the Cabinet itself, minus some of its members. I very much doubt whether the inclusion of the Representatives of so many Departments will not make the Council somewhat unwieldy and weaken the sense of responsibility of its members. Certainly it was the intention of the Commission to recommend a Council of a rather different kind—a Council on which the principal professional advisers of the Secretary of State for War and the First Lord of the Admiralty should sit as ordinary members. I do not, however, attach the greatest importance to the exact form which this Council should take, and I quite admit that, as I understand the proposal of the Government, the Council will be something more than an ordinary Committee of the Cabinet. I understand that it is intended that professional advisers, naval and military officers, should be invited to assist at the deliberations of the Council, although they will not be members of the Committee of the Cabinet; and, further, it is intended that permanent records of the proceedings of the Council shall be kept for the advantage and information of their successors. But the main point which I had in view was that the principle of joint consideration of matters of common importance to both Services should be established, that matters affecting the naval and military establishments in ensuing years should be discussed, not behind the back of, but in the presence of Representatives of both Services, and that naval and military matters of equal importance, relating to the settlement of the amount of the establishments, should be decided in the same way in the presence of the responsible Representatives of the Services. Something has been said as to the exaggeration which is indulged in with respect to the friction that occurs between the two Departments. I think the right hon. Gentleman opposite himself said last night that, in his opinion, the amount of misunderstanding between the War Office and the Admiralty had been very much exaggerated. Now, I do not look upon the desirability of establishing this Council as in any way dependent upon the amount of friction or misunderstanding between the two Departments. If the members of the Committee will refer to the paragraphs of our Report which lead up to this recommendation, they will find that the establishment of a Naval and Military Council, or of some other better method of communication between the two Departments, is not at all solely recommended in consequence of the existence of unsettled questions between the Departments, or questions giving rise to controversy. It may, indeed, be the fact that sometimes there is too little controversy and misunderstanding between the Departments, because, as I think, the real evil to be redressed is that there is a want of communication between the two Departments; that each Department goes its own way, without reference to the wants or necessities of the other, and it is too much taken for granted that each Department will be able, in time of emergency, to do that which is absolutely essential for the efficiency of the other. The evil is not so much the disagreement between the Departments as that questions of the highest importance are never thoroughly considered, never thoroughly debated, never thoroughly decided between them. It may be found that the Naval and Military Council, the Committee of the Cabinet proposed by the Government, will not entirely meet all the necessities of the case, but I admit that it is a step in the direction suggested by the Commission. It is a recognition of the principle that every important question affecting one Service ought to be decided with the full knowledge of and in the presence of Representatives of the other Service. As to the permanent retention of the office of Commander-in-Chief, I desire to say that I cordially join in all that has been said by the right hon. Gentleman opposite and my right hon. Friend near me as to the personal services which have been rendered by His Royal Highness the present Commander-in-Chief. The paragraphs in the Report of the Commission which bear testimony to those services I believe express as fully the convictions of every member of the Commission as any other paragraphs which are found in the Report. I may go further, and add the expression of my own opinion that it is only due to the tact and discretion of His Royal Highness, to the superiority to any personal or petty interest, which his exalted position has enabled him to show, that what I conceive to be the radically defective system of administration at the War Office has been worked during his tenure of office with the amount of success that has attended it. But what we have to look to is the future, and I certainly entertain very strongly the conviction expressed in our Report that the retention of the office of Commander-in-Chief in its present form is not a desirable basis upon which to rest the future constitution of the office. Our conception of the future organisation of the War Office has been very well described by my right hon. Friend near me. We have felt that the Secretary of State must be the Minister responsible to the House, must be the Minister who shall be all-powerful in the Office itself. We have felt that under our Constitution it is impossible to place any direct control over the Army, over Army organisation, in the hands of any man except one who shall be directly responsible to the House of Commons. That being so, the question is narrowed to this: whether it is desirable to place between the Parliamentary chief and the heads of the various Departments into which the office must be divided one great military officer to whom all other departmental officers shall be subordinate, and in whom all the lines of administration shall centre. In my opinion that is not a desirable link in the chain of War Office administration. I think that the existence of such an office tends to weaken the sense of responsibility of each of the officers at the heads of the Departments. It also tends to diminish the efficiency of the War Office Council. I do not think it is possible, if you have an officer of the weight and influence of the Commander-in-Chief, however much you may modify his functions, that you will have that freedom of discussion in the War Office Council which will alone enable a civilian Minister adequately to decide, rightly and justly, the question of War Office administration. There is one other point I would urge. It is said that the creation of an office in the nature of Chief of the Staff is not a matter pressing for immediate consideration. My right hon. Friend who has just spoken has given, in a note which he appended to the Report, his reasons why he does not concur in this recommendation of the Commission. I fail, however, to see why in our system of military administration a Department should be unnecessary which has been found so essential in every other system of military organisation in Europe. My right hon. Friend says that the conditions of our military administration are very different from those of Germany or France. They are very different, I admit, but that merely proves that the work of the Department of the Chief of the Staff would be of a different character, and it does not prove at all that such Department would have no work whatever to do. Although our Army is not so great, or likely to play so large and prominent a part in great wars, as the Armies of foreign nations, yet I do believe that the questions of military administration which have to be considered, or which ought to be considered, by a Secretary of State for War, are problems of as difficult and complex a character as those which come up for decision by the War Minister of any other country. The new organisation of the more or less efficient, but still numerous, bodies of armed men who exist in this country for defence against invasion, is alone a subject which ought to be considered by the Department of the

Chief of the Staff. And we have not only protection to consider. We may be involved in hostilities with a foreign Power at some future time, and although the brunt of the conflict may be borne by the Navy, yet, as has been pointed out, the Navy depends to a very large extent upon military co-operation; and what the amount of that co-operation should be, and in what mode the Army could best assist the Navy, are matters which, it seems to me, afford just as much consideration for a Department of the Chief of the Staff as do the military operations which may be undertaken by any other Power. My right hon. Friend suggests that these questions could be better dealt with by the executive officers who are in touch with the Army, and who are better able to give opinions than the officer who, as my right hon. Friend says, has simply to sit and cogitate. I think it is extremely dangerous that we should leave the consideration of these questions to men whose time is, or ought to be, fully taken up by the executive duties of their offices. I believe that there is sound reason for the principle, which has been adopted by every other nation, of placing the consideration of these matters under a Department which shall be absolutely free from every administrative and executive duty; I think it is, at all events, to take a very great responsibility upon ourselves to absolutely disregard the experience of every other great military nation, and to say that we alone can dispense with those duties of forethought, study, and mature judgment which have been found necessary by every other nation. I hope, therefore, that when Her Majesty's Government have had time for a fuller and more mature consideration of the recommendations contained in the Report, they will, above all, take into consideration the necessity of there being some such Department. I do not say that it need be a servile imitation of the General Staff Departments of foreign countries, but I beg them to consider the propriety, and the necessity, and the urgency of the formation of a Department, the duty of which shall be to work out, study, and give judgment upon some of the most difficult questions of military policy which can be presented to any country.

(11.15.) ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I desire to offer a few words in regard to the Naval and Military Council; and I wish to emphasise what the noble Lord has just said, and to express a hope that the Government will re-consider their determination on this point. I am assured that a Sub-Committee of the Cabinet would be totally inadequate for dealing with these questions. The Royal Commission have made a decided recommendation; and if any value is to attach to their Report some weight should be given to this particular recommendation, and it should be loyally accepted. Naval and military men should be allowed to discuss the important question of fortifications on a Council of this description, before the country is allowed to embark on an enormous expenditure. If such assistance had been sought and acted on a few years ago the Government of the day would not have advised the country to enter upon an outlay of many millions, nine-tenths of which, in the opinion of naval and military men, was unnecessary. Money was wasted on land defences which never could be brought into requisition, unless we were prepared to part with the supremacy of our naval power. I hope the Government will re-consider their decision on this point. Unless you have naval and military men on this Council there will never be any possibility of defending at its meetings the views of the authorities on the questions discussed. I have great respect for Cabinets, but it will not be sufficient to allow a meeting of a Sub-Committee of the Cabinet to be attended by naval and military men without power to vote. That is not what the Royal Commission recommends. It recommends a Naval and Military Council for an entirely different purpose. I am aware that the discussion of naval questions would be out of order on this Vote, and therefore I must defer my observations on the naval aspect of the case until we reach the Navy Vote. But I want to know from the Secretary for War if the Government have come to any decision on that part of the Report which deals with the question of ordnance. Have the Government consulted naval and military opinion on that point? We have heard strong complaints from the noble Lord, and from other sources, that the naval and military element on the Royal Commission was very small indeed. We, as naval men, did our best to get another naval officer put upon it, and I believe that the Army asked to have another military officer on it, but these efforts failed. Now, the Report shows that the organisation of the Ordnance Department is altogether unsuited to the magnitude, variety, and vast importance of the duties which have to be administered. Naval men are not at all satisfied with the present system of administering the Vote for naval ordnance. I do not presume to say what is the proper remedy, but, at any rate, the Royal Commission have spoken with no uncertain voice upon it, and I do trust the Secretary for War will tell us that the Government are willing to consider this point in all its bearings. I am well aware that great reforms have been initiated and carried out by the War Office, and probably things are now working more smoothly, but still it is desirable the state of the Ordnance Department should have attention. I trust I shall, on another occasion, have an opportunity of dealing with matters affecting naval administration, on which I have very burning convictions.

(11.25.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, S.): Two observations of the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale were so interesting. One was that the Commission over which he presided was so very inadequately supplied with professional assistance, that there had been no time to elaborate any big scheme of administrative reform; and the other was that the only alteration of existing arrangements adopted by the Government was not that which the Commission itself recommended. A good deal of the discussion which has taken place on the present Vote appears to me to have turned on matters which are of comparatively slight importance. The mere proposal to establish a Board of Promotion in lieu of the existing arrangement, though it may be very interesting to officers who are now in the Service is, after all, a comparatively small portion of a very large question which this Vote covers. What is now before us is a proposal to re-cast the whole of the superior Administration of the War Office, and, in connection with it, to modify the organisation of the Admiralty Administrative Department. It is a large problem put into the simple form—How to make the most of the Forces of the country for purposes of defence and aggression, having regard to the Parliamentary Institutions of the country, and the Parliamentary responsibilities of the Secretaries of State. As a matter of fact, the military history of this country is remarkable for the proofs which it affords of the behaviour of the two Services, not in co-operation with each other. This is not merely a question of co-operation; it is also a question of administration. We are now dealing with the Army Vote. The Army is a weapon placed in the hands of the authorities for public services. It consists of a fighting force of organised and disciplined men, which is necessarily under the Commander-in-Chief, but which for its efficiency is entirely dependent on a number of administrative services, which are necessarily controlled by a series of officers of importance, and yet of secondary rank. The whole history of the campaigns carried out by this country in the present century, except, I believe, in the case of Wellington's campaign in the Peninsula, is remarkable for the proof of the want of administrative combination, which, indeed, has been seldom attained to any large extent in any Armies. I believe it was obtained by the first Napoleon, by Sherman in one of his remarkable marches, and by the German Army in their last great war with France, but beyond these cases I do not think it possible to find a single instance in which an Army has been brought into the field with all its administrative services ready for co-ordination and co-operation. The result has been a great deal of unnecessary expenditure, and a great waste of power and of efficiency, and into this want of co-operation between the Naval and Military Forces, the Royal Commission was appointed to inquire. It was directed to inquire and report upon both the civil and professional administration of the Military and Naval Services, their relations to the Treasury, and the possibility of making any alterations in the existing system, to secure efficiency and economy. The Report has been received with a chorus of approval, in which I do not see my way to join, and I think, in some respects, the conclusions and recommendations of the Commission are of the most illogical and unconsequential kind. The Commissioners make some observations upon the Reports of other bodies which have preceded them in inquiry, and upon the action the War Office took on these Reports. The Commissioners dwell with great emphasis on the fact that in a single year, 1887, there were three different Reports furnished to the War Office. First there was the Departmental Committee under Lord Morley, which Committee reported in favour of the Ordnance Factory and the inspection of stores being placed under the control of the Surveyor General. In the same year there was the Report from the Royal Commission under Sir James Fitzjames Stephen, which recommended the appointment of an officer whose duties should be, in some respects, those which fell to the share of the Surveyor General of Ordnance. Again, in the same year, Sir Matthew White Ridley's Committee on the Civil Services recommended the appointment of a military officer not in Parliament to the post of Surveyor General of the Ordnance. So there were three Reports of independent bodies, all concurring in the recommendation that the office of Surveyor General should, under some name, be retained, and going to the extent of adding to the existing powers and authority of the office. What was the result? In December of that very same year the office of Surveyor General of Ordnance was abolished by Order in Council, and by that same Order in Council the duties, or the most important of them, were transferred to the Commander-in-Chief, but the control of the Manufacturing Department was transferred to the Financial Secretary. That is to say, the Commander-in-Chief, already overburdened with multitudinous duties, was further burdened with duties which have at all times been found exceptionally heavy in connection with the Supply Service. The Commissioners point out what is perfectly true—that it is impossible for any single officer fully and adequately to discharge such a number of miscellaneous duties, and what is their conclusion? Why, just as the War Office in 1887, after repeated recognitions of the importance of the post of Surveyor General, got that post abolished by Order in Council, so do these Commissioners, after recognising the overburdened condition of the office of Commander-in-Chief, go on to propose—what? Not that he should be relieved; not that some of his duties should be transferred to other officers, but that the post of Commander-in-Chief should be abolished. Well, I fail to see any logical connection between the premises and the conclusion. I invite anybody who approaches the matter dispassionately, without any connection officially with the Naval or Military Services, to read this Report and say whether he does not detect in it, in every page, the inspiration of a mind, or of minds, not of or among the Commissioners themselves. We are not furnished with the evidence upon which this conclusion has been arrived at; the evidence is not to be published. We do not even know who the witnesses were, but it is not very difficult to gather from the Report what kind of witnesses they were. It is a very important proposal this, to abolish the post of Commander-in-Chief. This, at any rate, can be said for the illustrious Duke, that he is not a member of any ring; this, at least, can be said of him, that he is looked upon, and has been for a long time looked upon, by the great mass of the officers in the Army as not open to the suspicion of favouritism or jobbery, and it will be very difficult to replace him in that respect by any officer who may be appointed to the high post which presently may be vacant. The Commissioners recommend that the duties of the Commander-in-Chief shall be distributed among other officers, and that the officer in command of the troops in this country shall be placed in a position practically the same as though nominally a little higher, perhaps, than that of the officer commanding the troops in Ireland, or on some foreign station; in fact, he is only to be in command of the combative forces in Great Britain, and then there is to be established a Chief of the Staff with a separate Department. Well, I should like to ask, to whom is he to be Chief of the Staff? The Commander-in-Chief is gone; is he to be Chief of the Staff to the officer commanding the Forces in Great Britain? Is he to be Chief of the Staff to the Department generally? Is he to be Chief of the Staff to the War Minister? Well, if that is to be the proposal, it is an entire departure from existing arrangements—a departure of a very novel kind. It cannot possibly be that he is to be Chief of the Staff of the Army. No; he is not to be Chief of the Staff at all; he is to be a permanent War Minister in uniform, behind the Parliamentary Civil War Minister who represents the Department in this House. Well, that is again a very extraordinary change, a change not to be summarily discussed in a very short Debate in Committee upon a Vote in the Army Estimates; it is a matter which comes very near an important constitutional question. But whether it be constitutional, or unconstitutional, I venture to say it is against the elementary principle of our Army administration in this country which is governed by Parliamentary institutions. What is your Chief of the Staff to do? He is to advise the Secretary of State in general matters of military policy; on the strength and distribution, and employment of the Forces; in collecting military information; in preparing schemes for military operations; to examine military estimates as drafted; to consult with the First Naval Lord of the Admiralty on inter-Departmental questions; to examine correspondence with other Departments; to conduct correspondence with General Officers commanding on all questions of military policy, and to report to the Secretary of State on all military requirements. Well, what are these but the duties of a kind of permanent Secretary of State in uniform? He is not to be Commander-in-Chief; he is not to be Chief of the Staff to the Commander-in-Chief, but a novel creation occupying a post never before filled, perfectly new to the Army and to the Constitution. It is not adopted yet, I am glad to say, by the Secretary of State for War, but I have no doubt that, in spite of his retirement, in a very short time we shall see Lord Wolseley occupying the post of Chief of the Staff. That, I presume, is the whole secret of this long discussion and re-arrangement. The appointment of General Buller as Adjutant General is, no doubt, a good one; but however eminent the abilities of Lord Wolseley, however distinguished and heroic his services, I do trust before this business is completed the Cabinet will pause, and Parliament will be allowed the opportunity of more fully discussing this question, and the country at large will be allowed the opportunity of realising the character and scope of the proposal before us. There is one point upon which I think the Secretary of State will have clearly gathered the minds, not only of the Commissioners, but of the House as expressed on both sides, and that is, that any arrangement by Cabinet Ministers for the consideration of high questions of general policy connected with military or naval matters cannot possibly furnish that working arrangement between the Services which has to deal with matters of a purely technical description very often. If it is a question of manning marine fortifications, or of the transport of troops by the Navy, what on earth is the use of bringing the Secretary of State for India, or the Secretary of State for the Colonies into consultation? It is because there has been a want of inter-communication in the past that there has been a great deal of money wasted, and valuable opportunities have been allowed to escape. I will not take up any further time, although there are a great many features in the present administration of the Army which might be usefully discussed if time allowed, and there is much, also, besides what has been mentioned in the Report of the Commission that ought to receive more consideration than has yet been given to it.

*(11.45.) MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel): I may be allowed a few words on a matter of local importance pertinent to this Vote. Last year upon this Vote I moved a reduction as a protest against the refusal of the Secretary for War to re-admit the public to the river-side walk at the Tower of London. If the right hon. Gentleman will intimate that he is prepared to give a more favourable response to the request now I need not trouble the Committee, or perhaps I had better move to report Progress, for there are friends of mine now absent who desire to take part in the discussion. Well, I will proceed, and if the right hon. Gentleman does not yield our request I may move the reduction. I need scarcely remind the Committee that the East End of London is ill-provided with open spaces for public recreation, and there are exceedingly few in my constituency of Whitechapel, in which the Tower is situated. No part of the Tower Hamlets Division is more crowded, and the conditions of life are a source of danger not only to the inhabitants there, but in the whole Metropolis. From the crowded state of dwellings and the absence of fresh air and open spaces, fevers are engendered, which are not confined to the places where they originate, but frequently spread into other districts. If from selfish motives only there should be an inducement to provide breathing spaces for the East End of London, and the necessity of open spaces all over this crowded City has been universally recognised. The action of the London County Council is checked by the cost of providing such open spaces, but here is an open space of great public utility which might be availed of without any cost to the ratepayers. Really the space is not required for Government purposes. For a considerable distance in the neighbourhood of the Tower there are no open spaces worthy of the name except the Tower Gardens of an acre and a half. I am not ungrateful for the boon conferred upon the inhabitants by the opening of these gardens three years ago in response to a Petition signed by nearly 5,000 of my constituents; but we want the right hon. Gentleman to complete the good work, and give the people access to the fresh air of the pleasant riverside walk. There is no doubt of the right hon. Gentleman's ability to do this; but he is influenced, I fear, by the residents in the Tower, and has persistently refused to grant this, which would be a great benefit to the working-classes of the East End of London. The admission of the public to the Tower Gardens has been a great success. People resort to that narrow strip of land to the average in summer of 3,000 daily, and they are most orderly. Formerly people were admitted to the riverside wharf, and it was considered the most enjoyable promenade in the district, and if this was so before the improvements in our sewage system how much more must it be so now. The population has vastly increased, and the river has been greatly purified. We can appreciate our riverside walk outside this House, and the people of West London have miles of such provided at the cost of millions. Why refuse to the toilers of the East this small benefit, which will entail absolutely no cost whatever? The Secretary for War, before throwing open the Tower Gardens, required and obtained a formal guarantee that no expense should fall upon the Government, and that engagement has been kept to the letter. The cost of laying out the gardens and the maintenance of the place for public recreation has been met from private sources, and the same guarantee will be given in regard to the river wharf. The objections made by the right hon. Gentleman last year were, I must say, trivial. There might, he said, be danger to the public. I suppose he means danger of tumbling into the river, but no one tumbled into the river in former times. We will, however, relieve him from any anxiety by putting up a railing, as we did round the moat, where a fall would be much more dangerous and more likely to occur. Then the right hon. Gentleman said the people might get into danger when stores were being landed at the wharf. There are several ways of obviating such danger. In the first place, do not land stores there; let them come by land. But the right hon. Gentleman says the stores come from Woolwich and water carriage is much cheaper, but I do not think the difference would be very great. The Committee might imagine that stores were being landed every day and all day; but no such thing; barges are not alongside the wharf once a week. The right hon. Gentleman, in answer to a question last year, said that 47 barges were moored at the wharf in 12 months, and doubtless they could be unloaded immediately they arrived. (I am quite prepared to stop and let the Vote pass if the right hon. Gentleman will give me a favourable reply.) If the Government will not send stores by land on account of expense, then let the landing be carried on before the public are admitted. It is a simple matter of arrangement; a chain might be stretched during the landing to keep the people at a distance, and they could still enjoy three-fourths of the promenade. The new Tower Bridge, erected at a cost of over £1,000,000, will soon be completed, and throwing open this wharf would save people making a long detour round the Tower when they want to cross the bridge. In reply to a Petition signed by 7,000 or 8,000 of the inhabitants of Whitechapel, and the right hon. Gentleman wrote to me on June 17 expressing sympathy with the object of the petitioners, but he said the wharf was required for numerous and important military purposes; but what are these purposes which prevent the public from using the wharf as they did in former times? I am informed the wharf is rarely used; infants and not infantry are sometimes found there; the walk is used by a few privileged persons. Does the right hon. Gentleman think there is any danger to the Crown jewels? A wide moat, thick walls and sentries on duty ought to be security enough; but if there is still apprehension, let the jewels be removed elsewhere, or replace them with paste imitations which will give equal satisfaction to visitors. I think assurances are not wanting that the working classes always respect national property. Let the Government enjoy the novel pleasure of restoring a privilege of which a former Government deprived the people. I do not think we ought to wait for a change of Government for this little act of justice.

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

(12.0.) MR. DUFF (Banffshire): When do the Government intend to go into the naval part of this question?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I cannot say at this moment. The Leader of the House has promised to make a statement with regard to Public Business in the course of the week.

MR. DUFF: I will put the question on Monday.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): Do the Government intend to take Wednesday?

*MR. JACKSON: I cannot answer that.

MR. JENNINGS (Stockport): When will Vote 10 be taken, upon which we have been promised a discussion?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I sympathise with my hon. Friend on this question, he having for 12 months endeavoured to bring this important subject before the House. I would ask him to repeat his question on some other occasion.

RESERVE FORCES BILL.—(No. 272.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(12.5.) MR. E. STANHOPE: This is a Bill of great importance, to make certain that the position of Volunteers who have enlisted in the Reserves is legal. The object of the Bill is to enable us to use Reserve men training in the Volunteers in cases of emergency.

Mr. Montagu

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. CONYBEARE: No doubt this is a valuable Bill, and, as an old Volunteer, I should be delighted to facilitate its progress at a reasonable hour. As, however, this is a Government Bill, it cannot be allowed to pass after 12 o'clock at night.

Objection being taken to Further Proceeding, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Monday next.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolution [3rd July] reported.

ARMY ESTIMATES.

"That a sum, not exceeding £3,467,600, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Provisions, Forage, and other Supplies and Clothing Establishments and Services, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891."

Resolution agreed to.

POOR LAW (IRELAND) RATING BILL. (No. 350.)

Bill, as amended, considered; read the third time, and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

On the Motion for Adjournment:—

(12.14.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): We are told that the Irish Estimates will be taken next week, but we have had no specific intimation as to the order in which they will be dealt with. We know that the Constabulary Vote will be taken on Monday. How shall we go on after that?

*MR. JACKSON: I would ask the hon. Member to put a question later on. It is proposed to take the Constabulary Vote first on Monday, and after that the Vote for the Chief Secretary.

MR. SEXTON: I doubt if that would be convenient.

MR. JACKSON: I would ask the hon. Member to put a question on Monday.

House adjourned at a quarter after Twelve o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 7th July, 1890.

REPRESENTATIVE PEERS FOR SCOTLAND.

The following Question was upon the Paper:—

The Duke of SUTHERLAND:—"To call attention to the fact that certain protests tendered by several Peers of Scotland at the last election of Representative Peers for Scotland at Holyrood, on 6th January last, regarding the calling, responding to, and voting under, a Peerage not to be found on the Roll of the Peerages of Scotland, accepted at the Union in 1707 as the 'authentic Roll,' have not been transmitted to this House; and, seeing that there is no Act of the Legislature prohibiting protests, and that the attempt failed to prohibit the long-established right of protest at Holyrood, by means of the 'Representative Peers (Scotland) Election Procedure Bill,' introduced in 1883 by the Earl of Selborne, which failed to become law; and, seeing that the protests of Scotch Peers, on the same subject, were received at the election at Holyrood, on 10th January, 1889, and were printed 'by order' of this House on the following 22nd of February; to ask Her Majesty's Government on what grounds the unprecedented course was taken at the said election at Holyrood, on 6th January last, of refusing to accept the protests of Peers, thus infringing long existing usage and precedent which have prevailed since the Union."

*THE EARL OF MAR: My Lords, as, unfortunately, I do not see the Duke of Sutherland in his place, I would beg your Lordships' indulgence for a single moment while I venture to ask if it should be the pleasure of the House that I, as one of the protesting Peers at Holyrood last January, might be allowed to ask the Question which stands in his Grace's name. I do not at all wish to press it upon the House, but I put it to your Lordships, if it should be quite convenient and agreeable to you, that, as I fancy the Government are prepared and are ready and anxious to give an answer to this important question, if that be the case, I shall be very happy to facilitate the matter by asking the question, and, if it be agreeable to your Lordships, I propose to read the Question standing in the name of the Duke of Sutherland.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I beg to ask whether there is any Question before the House?

VOL. CCCXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

*THE EARL OF MAR: I only ask for permission if it should be agreeable to your Lordships that I should state the question. ["No, no!"] I am quite in your Lordships hands, and as the House expresses dissent, I will at once sit down.

BERKELEY PEERAGE.

Petition of the right hon. Francis William Fitzhardinge, Baron Fitzhardinge, of Berkeley Castle, Gloucestershire, and of Cranford House, Hounslow, Middlesex, praying their Lordships that the Petitioner may be allowed to appear and be heard before their Lordships' House and before their Lordships' Committee for Privileges by his counsel and agents in opposition to the claim of Randal Mowbray Thomas Moreton Berkeley to the titles, honours, and dignities of Earl of Berkeley and Viscount Dursley, and that he be allowed to adduce evidence in support of his said opposition, and that he may have a sufficiency of time allowed to him to fully prepare his case and evidence, and fully instruct counsel and agents in his behalf, and that he may have all the privileges and facilities usually granted in such cases; and also that the further hearing of the Petition of the said Randal Mowbray Thomas Moreton Berkeley may be postponed until the next Session of Parliament; read, and referred to the Committee for Privileges.

TELEPHONE COMPANIES.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH, in rising to call the attention of the House to the fact that the period within which Her Majesty's Government can serve notices to terminate the existing licenses to the National Telephone Company expires the end of this month, and to move a Resolution, said: My Lords, the subject upon which I have placed a Motion on the Paper is one upon which I have had the honour to address your Lordships on two previous occasions; and though the subject is perhaps one which is not of interest to every Member of this House, yet, at the same time, it is one which is of great interest to a vast number of persons, and it is one with regard to which I think really I need make no excuse for venturing to trespass upon the time of this House by stating the case in somewhat fuller terms than I did on the previous occasions. On the first occasion of my bringing the subject before the House last year Lord Salisbury stated, on behalf of the Government, that the whole question of the telephone system was one which would have to be considered at some time during this year, as the patents under which the telephone is worked would lapse at the end of 1890. I put a question on the Paper at the beginning of this year, and I then alluded further to the subject; and the answer given me was that the matter was under the consideration of the Government, but that the Post Office Authorities had not come to any decision as to the line they would adopt, still that the Government recognised that the time was rapidly drawing near when a decided line of action would have to be resolved upon. Now, my Lords, a question was asked the other day in another place of the Postmaster General, whether the Government intend to exercise the powers they have under the licences granted to the National Telephone Company, to buy up the telephones, and the answer of the Postmaster General was that the Government have no such intention. Therefore, the question arises whether the remarks made by the Prime Minister last year do not call for some further statement now. The Prime Minister admitted that the matter was one of great public importance, that a decision must be come to, and that some steps should be taken; and I venture now to urge very strongly that the Motion which I have put upon the Paper is one of considerable public interest. I do not think I need go into the whole story of the telephone, because your

The Duke of Marlborough

Lordships must be acquainted with the uses to which it is applied, and to which when perfectly organised it can be applied. In every large town, certainly in every capital town in Europe, the use of the telephone is considerably extending. In Paris, for instance, there must be three or four times the number of subscribers that exist in London. Unfortunately, during the whole history of the telephone in London it has been met with two difficulties, one the amount of money which the monopolists, the present company, wish to make out of the thing, and the other the limited facilities which that company has been able to acquire from the Government. I think, therefore, I cannot do better than lay the case as it exists between the company and the Government before your Lordships. When the telephone was first introduced, and the lawsuit between the company and the Government was brought to an end by a compromise, the company acquired a licence from the Government. That licence was in a particular form, and in that licence, which was for 30 years, to carry on the work of the telephone under certain regulations from the Post Office, a clause was inserted giving the Government power at each period of seven years during the 30 years to exercise an option of purchasing out the Telephone Company. The clause in that licence is so very vague and so very peculiar that it would be almost impossible, I venture to say, for the Government to have succeeded in that, or to have known beforehand to any extent the amount they would have to pay upon a valuation for the telephones. The clauses of the agreement regulated the conduct of the Telephone Company with regard to the Government, and provided a period for the process of buying them out. The company agree to pay a 10 per cent. royalty on all gross receipts to the Post Office, and the company also undertake that they will neither assign, underlet, or dispose of the powers, privileges, or authorities thereby given, or any such powers, privileges, or authorities without the consent in writing of the Postmaster General. I wish particularly to point out that clause to your Lordships, because I shall have to allude to it further on in regard to what has taken place. The last and most operative clause of the agreement is with regard to the power of purchasing outright the Telephone Company. It is to the effect that the Government shall buy out the Telephone Company

"With all their rights, powers, privileges, and works, and all the property of the company appertaining to and forming part of the business of the company," and that in case of difference it shall be determined by arbitration as thereafter provided; and then, further on, the award of a single arbitrator is to be sufficient, and they are to conform to the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854. Now, your Lordships will have observed that in this licence there is nothing stated as to the mode of the valuation. It does not say whether is shall be a valuation of plant; whether there is to be a valuation of goodwill; whether there is to be a valuation of unearned increment or what. In fact, it simply says "the powers, privileges, works and other property of the company." That is an extremely vague condition, and if Her Majesty's Government had exercised the power which they possessed up to the 30th June last of giving notice for the next seven years—because it was on that date that the power of giving notice to the company expired—they would, of course, have had to purchase. The proviso is that the Postmaster General may at any time, by giving six calendar months' notice in writing, terminate the licence on the 31st December, 1890, the 31st December, 1897, and so on. Therefore, the six calendar months' notice would have required to be given on the 30th June; and as the Postmaster General did not then serve notice, he is unable to do so until the 30th June, 1897. That is a very important point. If the Postmaster General had served notice on the Telephone Company to terminate their licence, the Government would have had to pay a valuation for the goodwill or plant, or whatever the arbitrator appointed might say was the valuation to be paid, since the provision in the clause which I have referred to is "the powers, privileges, works, and other property of the company." No person of any practical experience would venture to say whether it would be £1,000,000, £2,000,000, £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 that Government would have to pay to buy out the Telephone Company under the terms of the licence which they had themselves granted to the company. This is a very important fact, because I wish to bring to your Lordships' attention the position of this company, not because I have any feeling with regard to the company whatever, and there is nothing that I should have heard with greater satisfaction than an announcement from Her Majesty's Government that they were prepared to go to the country for a grant of £3,000,000, for that it has been estimated, I think, would be the sum required in order to establish a Telephone Department of the Post Office, like the Parcels Post, to acquire the whole of the telephones of this country, and to afford to the country one inexpensive system. That would have been the best thing, I think, for the country that could have been carried out. But as they have not done that, we must look not only to what the Government intend to do, but at the position of the present companies, because we have the question of the public interest to consider in this matter. Now, with regard to the public utility of the telephone, where it is used properly as a system, you can save half your correspondence. You can have a little box at your side, and talk into it from this place where I am standing to a friend at Brighton, and you would hear each other just as clearly as you hear me at this moment. You can sit at your writing desk, having that little box beside you, and go on with your ordinary work, and communicate with anybody within reach, and in that way do half your correspondence in writing and the other half by actual speech. But, in order to do that, you must have an efficient system. Now, the history of the present company is really a very curious one. This company, which obtained a licence from Her Majesty's Government, issued a certain amount of capital. Upon that capital they found that, even with the experimental system which they possessed, and which really was only used in the City among stock-brokers and business people, that the profits were very large, and last year they paid $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. dividend, before the amalgamation to which I shall presently refer. They have pooled their interest with certain other companies. The process was this. In the first instance, a company was started called the United Telephone Company. They possessed all the Bell patents, for which they paid about £37,000. They then formed subsidiary companies, called the Lancashire and Yorkshire Company, the National Company, and one or two others, which each had their particular capitalisation. When the telephone was proved to be successful, after a certain number of years, about the beginning of last year the shares of the United Company had risen from £5 to £15, and the shares of the other companies had also risen very considerably. Those other companies were subsidiary, and were, in fact, children of the father concern, the United Company, which held a large interest, to the extent of many thousands of pounds, in each of those companies. It was then agreed between them that the whole value of those shares—the market value, not the par value—should be pooled, and certain other considerations were added, and that a Joint Company should be formed which should be called the National Company. Now, my Lords, when this took place a very strong remonstrance was issued by the Postmaster General to try and prevent the amalgamation, on the particular ground that it was a breach of the agreement; but the thing was not pressed, and I venture to say that, as a matter of fact, the formation of those companies was in direct contravention of the 12th clause of the Agreement, which I have read to your Lordships, that the company should not assign, underlet, or otherwise dispose of their powers. However, that would have been a case for legal decision. No doubt the Postmaster General offered a very strong resistance against what then took place. What took place was that the National Company was formed with a capital of £720,000. The United Telephone Company pooled its capital of £1,000,000 at £1,250,000, and the Lancashire Company pooled its capital of £400,000 at £520,000. The holding of the National in the United was £225,000 and in the Lancashire £65,000. There were deductions added to the money paid to the United £742,000, and to the Lancashire £125,000; and further capital added

£177,960, making a total of £3,250,000. Now, before I go further, I want to know this, supposing Her Majesty's Government had exercised their right under the licence of purchasing out the National Company, were they prepared to pay £3,250,000, of which, if I were to go into the thing, I could show that over £2,000,000 is what is vulgarly called "water"—that is to say, it is not subscribed capital. Well, then, such being the case, the question would arise as to whether the Government would have to pay on the basis of the £3,250,000. I venture to say that any appraiser or arbitrator would have said, "If you once allow this pooling to take place, once you allow these companies to amalgamate in this form, you cannot treat it as absolute value." Besides that, there will be the question of the plant or goodwill which may have arisen. Then what is the present condition of things? Here is the public paying £20 a year a-piece for the use of the telephone. I may say that I have seven telephones in my own house, but there is not one with which I can speak in the City, and there is no gentleman I know who is able to speak in the City with his. I will tell you why that is. The telephone is simply useless unless it is on two wires. If you have not two wires, they are subject to inductive disturbances; you get all the currents of the electric lighting, telegraphs, and the different things that are going on; but if you have two wires, it does not matter what is going on, and you can talk easily from here to Brighton. The whole of the system of the National Company at present is on single wires, and for that we are bound to pay £20 for each apparatus. The number of subscribers to the National in London is not over 12,000, while in Paris it is 36,000; and the thing is only beginning there. Let me state to your Lordships what the position of the telephone might be in regard to the public. We should have in the West End, every one of us, one of these instruments, and not be bothered with it in any way. We might put them in the basements of our houses, and only connect them up when we wanted to speak to a friend. There are here and there a few isolated people who have telephones, but if you try to talk to them, you find that the exchange is so badly arranged, and the wires so badly managed, that you cannot really use the instruments. Now, the Motion which I have put on the Paper here is, that it is advisable in the public interest that, as Her Majesty's Government have decided that they will not buy out the National Company, the work should be put to competition. Competition made the railways of England, and competition must give us the telephone. If, on the other hand, you are going to say you will not let anybody else come in, because you have retained to yourselves, under this clause in the Agreement, power to step in and set up business on your own account, in competition with any company you have given licences to, at any time you choose, I say that such an exercise of discretion as that would be altogether unjust and improper for any Government to undertake. I venture to say that neither your Lordships' House nor the other House would agree to such a thing as making a grant of £3,000,000 for the purpose of competing with a company to which you had given a licence, and on the faith of which licence people have honestly subscribed for shares. The Agreement provides that—

"Nothing in these presents contained shall affect or prejudice the right of the Postmaster General, from time to time, to establish, maintain, or work any system or systems of telegraphic communication of a like nature to the aforesaid system of the company, or otherwise in such manner as he shall in his discretion think fit."

If the Government were to go, say next year, to Parliament, and say, "We wish for £3,000,000, in order to establish a telephone system for the use of the public throughout the United Kingdom," I venture to say it would be an extremely unfair thing, whether to the National Company or any other company which has a licence from the Postmaster General; because the shares of the National Company would naturally at once fall to zero. The National Company has not got the facilities which the Postmaster General has, because the Postmaster General has not conceded to them the powers which he has of laying cables wherever wanted under ground, and, therefore, the National or any other company would compete at enormous disadvantage with the Postmaster General. I think therefore it would be an extremely unfair thing for the Postmaster General to enter into competition with the National or any other company on such terms. One thing I venture to say, and that is, that Her Majesty's Government, having decided that they will not purchase out the present company and set up a Department similar to the Parcels Post, cannot honestly come to Parliament and ask for £3,000,000 in order to starve a company which, although it has behaved to some extent in an improper manner, has got a capital of £3,000,000 sterling subscribed under the authority of the licence from the Postmaster General. But I say, although that cannot be carried out by the Postmaster General, Her Majesty's Government are bound to give us the use of the telephone, and that can only be done by enabling any responsible persons who apply for a licence and can show that they are prepared to obtain sufficient capital for the purpose, and are ready to establish a really good municipal system in this town, to obtain from the Postmaster General a licence for this work, because, without a licence from the Postmaster General, of course no such company can start. Now, my Lords, the thing can be done with a very small capital from subscribers. I should like to state here the rates at which this is done in other countries. Speaking from recollection, as far as I can make out, about £6 is the average of what is charged in most of the capitals of Europe for the use of the telephone; in London, as I have mentioned, you are paying £20, and you must go on paying £20, as long as you are left in the hands of the National Company, because the National Company have added £2,000,000 of "water" to their capital, and they cannot pay 5 per cent. on their shares unless you allow them to charge £20 for their instruments. Now, those shares were issued again at £5; they are still going up in value; and are quoted at £6; that is, £1 premium, showing that the telephone business is an extremely paying one. There is no doubt, therefore, that if Telephone Companies were started in that way in this Metropolis, they would do a paying business. The charge made does not matter possibly very much to your Lordships. It does not matter much to you whether it is £20 or £6; but you must remember that to the business people in this town the use of the telephone is of enormous advantage.

There are people right and left who are demanding these facilities, and who are deprived of them because they cannot, and will not, pay £20 a year. The time has come, I think, when Her Majesty's Government should really give an answer. They have stated that they will not undertake the work themselves, and they are bound not to behave unfairly to the existing companies. On the other hand, they are bound to behave fairly to the public, and I think, therefore, that we should have a clear statement from Her Majesty's Government as to the line they are going to take with regard to the telephone. If we are really going to have the telephone, we must not adopt a suicidal policy. I have already advocated in this House that the Postmaster General should keep in his hands the main lines between London and Birmingham, London and Brighton, and other large towns. Those main lines should be kept in the hands of the Government, and facilities should be given to private companies for working in the towns, if Her Majesty's Government have decided not to go in for that work as a branch of the Post Office. But do let us know what is going to take place. We should not, of course, act unfairly to the National Company; the National Company, as I have told your Lordships, have pooled their shares at an enormous value, though they have "watered" their capital. If you leave them in possession of their present monopoly, they would, I think, have a right to say afterwards: "What right have you to give those powers to another company, we having done the work upon the strength of the monopoly which we possess?" Now, my Lords, I think that the time has come when Her Majesty's Government should state what their policy is to be in this matter; whether they will grant facilities to other companies for the purpose of starting competition, which competition need not in the least interfere with the working of an efficient telephone system in this country, and yet which will give to the public the use of this valuable invention at the moderate sum of from £6 to £10 a year.

Moved, "That in consequence of the recent declaration of the Postmaster General in another place, that the Post Office do not intend to undertake the work of the telephone as a branch of that Department, it is advisable that licences be granted to responsible parties who will be willing to undertake the business of forming new telephone companies on the expiry of the present patents owned by the National Company; and that competition is advisable in the interests of the public in order that the present exorbitant rates may find their level."—(The Duke of Marlborough.)

*THE PAYMASTER GENERAL (The Earl of JERSEY): My Lords, I quite agree that the question which my noble Friend has raised is one of considerable interest, for anything which will improve the means of communication will always be welcome to the public. It is not necessary that I should follow at any length the remarks of the noble Duke, neither do I feel called upon to either defend or attack the existing companies. I have observed that the noble Duke has placed a construction upon the answer of the Postmaster General in another place which it can hardly be said to bear. The Postmaster General said that the Government did not intend to give notice to purchase the undertakings of the Telephone Companies at the end of the year; but that answer does not debar the Post Office from undertaking telephonic work in cases where it may be thought necessary or desirable. The Government do not intend to adopt the policy of purchase by the State of the Telephone Companies. To do so would be to involve the State in a gigantic enterprise into which the Government are not prepared to enter. But I think the answer which I have to give to the noble Duke is one of which he will approve. The policy which the Government intend to pursue is to grant licences to new companies which may apply for them, but, of course, each company will have to show that it is able to undertake the work for which it applies. The most important patent rights, which give a sort of monopoly to the present companies, will expire in the middle of next year, and then competition will most likely arise, and in that way the public will reap with the least possible risk the benefits which the noble Duke anticipates. I trust that the noble Duke will be satisfied with the statement I have made, and will not object to withdraw his Motion.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH: My Lords, the answer which the noble Lord has given is satisfactory as far as our hopes are concerned. If the Postmaster General has arrived at a decision to give licences to other companies, that is a notice to the public generally that they are in a position to form companies if they wish; and, therefore, the notice which I have placed upon the Table of the House I now withdraw.

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

EDUCATION CODE (1890) BILL.

(No. 157.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): My Lords, the Bill which I have to propose for Second Reading is one which is necessary in order to give effect to the Code. I mentioned that on a former occasion, and I said then that the Bill which would be introduced was one of an uncontroversial character, which probably would meet with no opposition anywhere. That has been the case in the House of Commons, for the Bill comes up from the House of Commons with their approval, and I believe without any Division having taken place upon it. The first point of the scheme is that it is with a view to extending the operation and the advantages of evening schools, and to relieve them from the restriction which made it necessary that they should do elementary work. That is to say, the Bill will afford a better scope for the work of those schools. The other part of the Bill is for the purpose of removing the limit upon the 17s. 6d. grants formerly given to poorer schools. Those grants were formerly given in the cases of populations of 300; that is extended to 500. The only object is to make effective grants to those schools so that they shall not suffer from the operation of the 17s. 6d. rule. I hope that the schools will thereby be put in a better position than they are now; and that the small addition of money they will get will enable them to obtain better results and better teachers. I do not think I need add anything to the remarks I have made upon this occasion, and I beg to move the Second Reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Viscount Cranbrook.)

*LORD NORTON: Though the noble Viscount has said there is no controversial matter in this Bill, I must ask your Lordships' leave to say a few words upon it before it is read a second time. This Bill, like most others of but few clauses, contains a considerable amount of principle in a very small compass. There are only two clauses in it, and the second clause, as the noble Viscount has said, merely gives a small sum to elementary schools in rural parishes. That is to say, the Bill offers a sop to stop the cry of managers of poor schools. It only illustrates the wretched mode in which we support the schools of this country, not by offering them fixed adequate means of meeting their requirements, but by dangling little prizes before them, like this £10 a year, to stimulate them in their work. But the other clause, the first one, does involve a considerable question of principle. It is the first avowed offer of Treasury grants for schools in which elementary education is not a principal part—as evening schools. This is a proposal very much to extend the principle of former Acts. The restriction of grants to elementary education is, in this case, to be abolished, and I think we may very well anticipate that, having been abolished in evening schools, it will not be long before it will be abolished in other schools also. When Parliament has once handed over a subject to a Department, anything may be done by official schemes, without any practical check on the part of Parliament. I am as strong in favour of the extension of higher education throughout the country as anybody can be; but the question is how, and where, and what are the best means, and how not to stand in the way of better means. With regard to evening schools the Royal Commission on Education reported that the only purpose for which they were required was to fix the instruction which is found to be so soon forgotten on leaving elementary schools. The evidence before the Royal Commission showed that the attempted evening schools had utterly failed all over the country; that they had actually disappeared in places like Birmingham, no scholars could be induced to attend them. In fact, wherever they had been tried they had failed throughout the country; and the conclusion of the Commissioners was that if they are to be revived it must be by some fresh stimulus being given. The recommendation was that more encouragement should be given by larger Treasury grants, and by a freer curriculum of study. They stated that the schools were discouraged by the obligation to keep up elementary subjects. The Bill, therefore, proposes in this 1st clause to give higher instruction without the acquisition of elementary subjects; that we should, in fact, give higher education in evening schools without the obligation to keep up the instruction previously given. This Bill, therefore, proposes to supply higher education by the Treasury, without insisting on the main elementary condition—a sort of educational top-storey where the bottom has mostly perished. The Vice President in the other House, in defending this, said there was a huge gap between the time when the children left the schools and the time when they got employment, and that that gap must be filled up by these schools. But that is based upon the idea that all children are to go on to higher employment; that, in fact, manual labour, which, after all, must be the lot of three-fourths of every community, is degrading. It seems to me that children, who are capable of more skilled employment, should go to higher schools; not to these evening schools, and that that part of their education should not be undertaken by the Government. I do urge that the education of those who are preparing for higher employment should be given in such schools as are being voluntarily provided all over the Kingdom, if the Government would not profess to undertake them. As to those children who go early to manual work from school, it is no use proposing that after their day's hard work—and remember that that work is in itself an education—such children should be sent to school at night! We are expecting from this class of children more than we expect from our own children, that they should be engaged in the work of life, and in literary education also. If there is to be any provision for them in the way of education during the evenings after their weary day's work until they go to bed, it should be by such recreative occupation as proposed by Lord Meath, in the shape of light and popular reading and such games as chess or draughts. I think, therefore, that this clause will come to nothing. There is a great deal more of alteration and novelty included in the Votes of the other House for education, such as £3,000 for technical schools, not yet defined, and as yet non-existent. It is assumed that they will arise under the Mushroom Act which passed the Commons in the last week of last Session, and in this House went through all its stages in 20 minutes. I believe myself that these provisions for evening schools will be as illusory as the Technical Instruction Act has been. It is not at all by way of grudging higher education to all those who can make use of it that I suggest a better way. Attempts to revive evening schools and larger grants, and release from elementary grounding, will not promote, but will very much hinder, real education. I only hope myself that, whatever measure Parliament may pass, the good sense of the country will bring out something more practical than that which is proposed in this Bill.

On Question, agreed to.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

PARTNERSHIP BILL.—(No. 153.)

Read 3^a (according to order), and passed, and sent to the Commons.

SUPERANNUATION (WAR DEPARTMENT) BILL.—(No. 118.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

*THE EARL OF JERSEY: My Lords, this is a measure which is intended to settle the pensions of certain workmen in the manufacturing and store establishments of the War Department. Those workmen who entered before December, 1861, were provided for by the Act of 1873. This Bill allows the men who entered between December, 1861, and June, 1870, to count for pension their service up to 1889, as it is open to doubt whether they were made aware at the time of the alterations made in the pension system. The matter has been very carefully considered. The Government are anxious to meet the claims put forward on behalf of the men in a fair and equitable manner, and have, therefore, introduced this measure.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

WORKING CLASSES DWELLINGS BILL. (No. 107.)

Bill read 3^a (according to order), and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

QUESTIONS.

CHARITY AT LILBOURNE.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Penrith (Mr. J. W. Lowther) whether he is aware that for 19 years, since the 27th January, 1871, when a scheme for the regulation of the Poor's Land Charity at Lilbourne, in the County of Northampton, was established, the incumbent, churchwardens, and overseers, as Trustees of the Charity, have annually applied out of the income of the Charity, towards the expenses of the parish school, the sum of £5, in addition to the sum of £20, which they are authorised under the scheme to apply for the benefit of the school; and that the Trustees have, since the date of the scheme, paid £10 annually out of the income of the Charity to the churchwardens, but that they have applied only a portion thereof towards the maintenance or repair of the fabric of the parish church, and that a considerable amount has been applied towards the general expenses of the church; whether such application annually of such sums of £5 and £10 is in accordance with the provisions of the scheme; and whether the Commissioners will take steps to ascertain the amount of, and to recover, the part of the income which may have been improperly applied, and devote it according to the provisions of the scheme for the benefit of deserving and necessitous inhabitants of the parish?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): From an examination of the accounts it appears that since 1877 £25 has annually been spent upon the school, and that since 1880 £10 has annually been spent upon church expenses. Payments for the school above £20, and on church expenses as distinct from the maintenance or repair of the fabric of the church, are not in accordance with the scheme. Explanations will be asked for from the Trustees, on the result of which any further action by the Commissioners must depend.

INDIAN COUNCILS BILL.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury to what day he intends to postpone the Second Reading of the Indian Councils Bill?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Until Monday, Sir.

VETERANS WHO SERVED IN THE CRIMEAN WAR AND INDIAN MUTINY.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the necessitous circumstances of many of the veterans who served in the Crimean War and Indian Mutiny; and whether he can now promise any measures for their relief?

MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he has considered further the claims of the old soldiers who were engaged in the Crimean Campaign and the Indian Mutiny, and many of whom are now incapable of work and in want, and if there are any funds available for their relief; and, if not, whether the Government will award moderate pensions to those men who are found to be deserving?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I am afraid that I can add little or nothing to the answer which I gave to a similar question on the 1st of May last. I asked the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. Robertson) to postpone his question, as I am anxious to ascertain whether, in any of the cases which have been brought before me by letter, there are special circumstances of an urgent character which would justify me in setting aside the Regulations. I do not find that there are any special circumstances, but, on the other hand, I do find that the cases are such that it would be difficult to defend the grant of any pensions at all.

THE NAVAL MANŒUVRES.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to postpone until Friday the question on the Paper in my name, to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty about what time he intends holding the forthcoming naval manœuvres; how many and what type of ships are to be mobilised, and whether it is correct that the date has been postponed owing to many of the vessels having to be longer under repair than anticipated; and whether, with the large addition to the Navy of ocean cruisers, he will consent to extend the scope of the experimental operations to the protection of the leading food and cotton ocean routes, notifying to commanders of British shipping that they will be expected to avoid, as far as practicable, nominal capture by hostile experimental cruisers?

EMIGRATED PAUPER CHILDREN.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can state the number of pauper children emigrated to the colonies during the last 12 months; and whether the modification of the Rules laid down by the Local Government

Mr. Norris

Board in 1887 has perceptibly affected the progress of this movement?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The number of pauper children emigrated to Canada during the year ended December, 1889, was 428. The number during 1886, the year which preceded the issue of the revised conditions, was 164.

THE SCOTCH UNIVERSITY COMMISSION.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether it is the intention of the Scottish University Commissioners to publish within a short time the evidence which they have taken on the subject of tests in the Faculty of Divinity, and possible changes in the arrangements of that Faculty, having regard to the interest felt in the matter in Scotland, and to the desirability of eliciting expressions of public opinion on the subject before the Report which the Commissioners have been directed to make on this subject is prepared and submitted to Her Majesty?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I have no doubt the Commissioners will present the evidence to Her Majesty along with the Report; but I am not aware of any authority enabling the Commissioners to issue the evidence before their Report is presented in terms of the statute.

DELAGOA BAY RAILWAY.

MR. PAULTON (Durham, Bishop Auckland): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether there is any prospect of a settlement of the Delagoa Bay Railway question; and whether, in view of more than a year having elapsed since the seizure of the line by the Portuguese Government, Her Majesty's Government see their way to compel the Portuguese Government to settle equitably the claims of English investors thus illegally deprived of their rights and property?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): The Portuguese Government have accepted in principle the proposals of Her Majesty's Government and the United States Government for the settlement by international arbitration of the amount of compensation to be paid to the English and American claimants. Further proposals have been made by the two Powers as to the choice of the Power which will be asked to appoint arbitrators, and we are waiting for the reply of the Portuguese Government on that point. A telegram was sent on Friday to Lisbon pressing for an answer.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS IN SOUTH UIST.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Invernessshire): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will explain why and at whose instance the former convenient arrangement of having a post and telegraph office in the populous district of Howmore, in South Uist, has been altered, and a change made to Grogarry, which, though the occasional residence of the proprietrix, has no surrounding population; whether it is the fact that the telegraph office is part of Grogarry House; and by whom is it at present kept?

A LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. MAXWELL, Wigton.): In the absence of the Postmaster General I wish to say that in the year 1880 the telegraph was extended to Howmore and two other places in the Hebrides on an agreement for seven years being entered into by Lady Gordon Cathcart to contribute a substantial sum to the expenses. When this agreement expired the line was still not self-supporting, and the question of closing the offices presented itself. Lady Gordon Cathcart was, therefore, invited to continue to contribute to the expenses, and she consented on the condition that the telegraph should be removed from Howmore to Grogarry. An office for postal business has, however, been retained at Howmore, and if the persons resident at that place are prepared to enter into the necessary guarantee, the Postmaster General will be glad to consider the question of re-establishing telegraph business there. The telegraph office at Grogarry is half a mile distant from Grogarry House, and is at present kept kept by Mr. Ewan C. Macrory.

THE CROMER CHURCH SCHOOL.

MR. COZENS-HARDY (Norfolk, N.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been called to the fact that girls are refused admittance to the Cromer Church School unless they wear white pinafores; and whether it is lawful, or in accordance with the Regulations of the Education Department, to turn away a child from a public elementary school upon the sole ground that its parents object to provide a particular costume?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I am informed by the manager that no girl has ever been refused admittance to the Cromer Church School for not wearing a white pinafore: such a ground of exclusion would not constitute a reasonable excuse under Article 89 of the Code.

CAB DISTANCES IN LONDON.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the date of the last certified table of distances measured by the authority of the Commissioner of Police, under the Metropolitan Public Carriage Act; and whether there has been a re-measurement of distances since the opening of Shaftesbury Avenue, Constitution Hill, and other new thoroughfares; and, if not, whether a new measurement will now be made?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the Commissioner that the last issue of the book of table of distances was in 1878, the measurements being then up to date. A revision is now being made of all the tables, which are 10 years old, and the revised measurements will be according to the nearest routes.

OUTRAGES UPON ARMENIANS.

MR. FRANCIS STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has any further information to communicate to the House as to the recent outrages committed upon Armenians in and near Van?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No further information has yet been received.

MR. FRANCIS STEVENSON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in view of the continued refusal of the Turkish Government to carry out the reforms which they are bound by the Anglo-Turkish Convention of 1878 to effect in Armenia, Her Majesty's Government still hold themselves bound by that Convention?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: It is impossible to answer such a question until we know what are the circumstances under which the supposed appeal of the Anglo-Turkish Convention is made.

SLAVE TRADE.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to the large number of slaves carried across the Red Sea, which is estimated at from 2,000 to 5,000 a year, for the purpose of supplying the harems of the wealthier classes of Turkey and Arabia with children of both sexes; whether he is aware that only 37 children were released at Aden last year, all of whom had to be sent to hospital in consequence of the treatment they had received; whether it is true that there is only one English man-of-war available for the suppression of this traffic, and that the steam launch belonging to her is worn out, so that only open boats are available for checking this traffic, and whether the Government will adopt more active measures, especially in concert with the Italian Government, to suppress this inhuman traffic?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: (1) Report from the officers employed in the Red Sea state there is large traffic in slaves, disguised as pilgrims and otherwise. (2) We have no information as to the exact number of children released at Aden last year. (3) There is only one vessel, H.M.S. Dolphin, at present employed in the Red Sea in the neighbourhood of Suakim; but no information has been received by the Admiralty as to her steamboat being defective. A defective boat would be immediately replaced on demand of the officer in command. (4) Italy acceded in 1885 to the Slave Trade Treaty Act. Her Majesty and the Sultan and the two Governments have since been acting in concert for the suppression of the Slave Trade in the Red Sea. When the General Act, recently signed at Brussels, comes into operation it is hoped that the regulations which have been adopted by all the Powers will tend to the complete suppression of the Slave Trade.

Mr. Francis Stevenson

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, in order to avoid further delay in putting into operation the new Christ's Hospital Scheme, he will arrange that the various bodies entitled to elect representatives as Governors shall make their selections before the rising of Parliament?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: Until the scheme has received Her Majesty's approval no steps can properly be taken for carrying out its provisions. After the scheme is approved the Education Department is no longer charged with the matter, and it will then be the duty of the Charity Commissioners to see that the scheme is duly put into operation and to make the necessary arrangements for that purpose.

DISORDERS IN CRETE.

MR. LEVESON GOWER (Stoke-upon-Trent): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has any information which confirms the statements of the correspondent of the Times, in the issue of 4th July, that disorder and outrage are generally prevalent in Crete; whether Her Majesty's Government can inform the House as to the truth of the reported murder and mutilation of a Christian of Kuma, named Ciklahi, the killing of a child of 18 months in the arms of its mother, and the killing of one Andrea Ghiparis, by a detachment of gendarmery; whether they have any knowledge as to the alleged prolonged torture and murder of two Cretan Christians, within a few minutes' walk of a Turkish military post at Caro Crios, in the South-West of the Island; whether rifles and ammunition have been landed on the Coast of Kissamos, and hostilities have already taken place between the Albanians and Sphahiotas; and whether, with a view to preventing a repetition of the massacres perpetrated in time past at Scio, Batah, and in Crete itself, by the Turkish troops and auxiliaries, Her Majesty's Government will consider the advisability of ordering some portion of the Mediterranean Squadron into Cretan waters, as some protection to the Christian population of the Island?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: (1) Murders of both Christians and Mussulmans are, unfortunately of common occurrence, but, Her Majesty's Consul reports that since June 17th public tranquillity has not been disturbed. (2) The Christian and Mussulman accounts of this incident differ, but Her Majesty's Consul reports that the following facts are admitted on both sides: A squad of gendarmes, under a native Major, going their rounds, met an armed Christian, who, refusing to stop when challenged, was shot at and killed. The deceased proved to be a certain Russo Tschlaki, of the village of Kourra. His body was removed to his house. A crowd assembled, and three of the dead man's companions fired on the gendarmes. The latter returned the fire, one bullet passing through the arm of a woman, killing her child whom she was carrying, and another bullet through the neck of a man named Andrea Ghiparaki, who has since died of his wound. The gendarmes subsequently retired from the village. The Major in command on this occasion has been recalled. (3) Towards the end of May two Christians were murdered, it is believed by soldiers, in the district of Selinos. This is probably the case referred to. The murderers have not been discovered, but the commanding officer has been imprisoned for neglect of duty. (4) Early in June some armed outlaws landed in Crete. They are being hotly pursued, and have not been joined by the population. (5) Her Majesty's Government do not consider that the state of Crete calls for the despatch of a British Squadron to Cretan waters.

THE BRITISH SOUTH AFRICA COMPANY.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that Sir Sidney Shippard has recently been in the Bechuanaland Protectorate trying to persuade certain chiefs to grant the British South Africa Company rights and facilities of constructing a telegraph line, which are inconsistent with the concessions already granted by those chiefs; whether it is part of the duty of the Administrator of Bechuanaland to act as the agent for the British South Africa Company; whether this conduct is held to be compatible with Clause 2 of the charter which provides "That nothing herein contained shall prejudice or affect any other valid or subsisting concessions or agreements which may have been made by any of the chiefs or tribes;"

and whether the Secretary of State will see that the rights of concessionaires are respected by the company, in accordance with the terms of its charter?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The construction of the telegraph line in question was under consideration by Her Majesty's Government in the early part of last year as a Government work, but it was arranged that its construction should be undertaken by the British South Africa Company. The line is practically a Government concern, and, as it is essential to the policy of Her Majesty's Government, it will be carried on with or without the chiefs' consent. Sir S. Shippard has recently been in the Protectorate with the view of obtaining their willing assent to the work, and it is not anticipated that they will ultimately oppose it. As regards the 2nd and 3rd paragraphs of the question, the duties of the Administrator in relation to the company are prescribed in Clause 30 of the charter. His recent conduct is not inconsistent with Clause 2 of the charter. In answer to the last paragraph, I have to state that Her Majesty's Government intend to give effect to the terms of the charter.

THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make further inquiries into the alleged destruction of a Petition by Police Inspector Wakefield, at the Hunter Street Office, as some of the constables declare that he destroyed a signed Petition, and not merely a printed form, as stated by the Home Secretary?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have nothing to add to the answer which I gave to a similar question on Thursday. I have satisfied myself that the Petition was accidentally torn, not wilfully destroyed, by the Inspector, and I do not propose to make any further inquiry into the matter.

MR. H. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I wish to ask whether the Home Secretary can give the House any information as to the threatened strike of the Metropolitan Police, whether the statements in the newspapers are true, and what course the authorities intend to take with regard to it?

MR. MATTHEWS: The reports in the newspapers have been greatly exaggerated. Thirty-nine constables were guilty of insubordination by refusing to go on duty, on Saturday night, at Bow Street. Their cases have been considered by the Commissioner this day, and they have been dismissed the Service. They are nearly all young men who have not been long in the Force. The constables of longer standing and experience have behaved in a manner more worthy of the traditions of the Metropolitan Police, and have exhibited no insubordination. Every arrangement has been made for the due performance of police duties throughout the Metropolis.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: May I ask whether the reason for the alleged insubordination of these men, and their consequent dismissal, did not arise out of their dissatisfaction with regard to the Petition which I have several times mentioned to the right hon. Gentleman?

MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir; the dissatisfaction of these men arose from the fact that a constable was transferred from the E Division to another Division. The Petition to which the hon. Member refers had nothing to do with it.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I wish to ask whether the facts are not these—that the constable had been circulating a copy of the Petition; that he was summoned to Scotland Yard, and was informed by the authorities there that the circulating of that Petition was grossly insubordinate? How does the right hon. Gentleman reconcile the statement of the authorities with the statement he himself made in the House that the police were perfectly entitled to petition?

MR. MATTHEWS: What I said was that the police were perfectly at liberty to address Petitions to me, or to the Commissioner, in any sense they thought fit within their own divisions. The constable who was transferred had gone to a station where he had no right to be, and where, without the permission of the Inspector, he had canvassed among the men. He had, moreover, solicited subscriptions of money without the permission of the Commissioner. For this grave breach of duty he was transferred.

EJECTMENTS IN ST. LUKE'S.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the landlord of a number of small houses in the neighbourhood of Golden Lane, St. Luke's, is trying to drive out his tenants by stripping the roofs of the houses; whether he is aware that the landlord has not applied to the Magistrate in the regular way for an order for ejectment; and whether the landlord is justified in thus exposing the tenants to the inclemency of the weather without an order from the Court? I have also to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that a large number of poor tenants in the neighbourhood of Golden Lane, St. Luke's, are being turned out of their houses, the landlord having given the tenants notice to quit, but the tenants, not being able to get other places by the time of the expiration of the notice, the landlord has commenced taking the roofs off, thus causing great suffering from the storms of the past few days; and whether he has any power to take action to prevent the landlord clearing his property in this manner?

MR. MATTHEWS: Due notice to quit was given to the tenants some five weeks ago, with the result that the better class of tenants have given up possession and have left. The remaining number, who refuse to leave, have, it appears, been tempted to continue in occupation in consequence of the fact that the landlord has not asked for any rent since the notice to quit was given. Arrangements have been made for clearing the site, but only the empty houses have hitherto been pulled down. I am informed that the roofs of the houses still occupied have not been taken off, nor has anything been done, except to remove a gutter which was in danger of falling. No Magistrate's Order has yet been applied for, as empty houses only have been pulled down, but it is proposed to obtain an Order without delay in respect of the houses which yet remain occupied. The houses are being taken down solely for reasons of public health, and in order to comply with the requirements of the Sanitary Laws. Upon these facts the landlord does not appear to have done anything contrary to law.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Is it not the fact that all the houses in the neighbourhood are of the same class and the same rental; and is it not also the fact that the gutters upon the roofs of these houses have been stripped away and the tiles removed to such an extent that, on Saturday week, the water poured into the houses, and the children had to be taken out of their beds, undressed, and removed to neighbouring houses? Further, is it not the fact that this was done by the landlord without any authority from the Magistrates to evict these people?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have given the hon. Gentleman the whole of the information I am possessed of, namely, that the gutter belonging to seven houses has been removed.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Was not the gutter deliberately taken away?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have already said so. It was taken away because there was danger that it would fall.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Was it not taken away deliberately, so that these people might be driven out of these houses?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have made the best inquiry I can, and that is not the information I have received.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: In taking away the gutter was not the landlord acting beyond his legal right?

[No answer was given.]

THE WEST HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS COMMISSION.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether any Report, interim or final, has been received from the West Highlands and Islands Commissioners; and, if not, whether an effort to expedite the issuing will be made, so as to permit of legislation on the matters involved during the present Session?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have reason to believe that the Report of the West Highlands and Islands Commissioners will shortly be in the possession of the Government, who must consider it before they can decide upon the steps which may be right to be taken upon it.

ST. JAMES'S PARK.

MR. BRADLAUGH: May I ask the Home Secretary whether the regulations with regard to the use of the Parks have been changed by his directions to-day, so that Members coming to this House have been prevented from driving, as they usually do, through St. James's Park?
